rous his sonne shoulde haue the honor of the victorie, but because by this honest exercise he should growe to better manner, for that he was a dissolute younge man, and much giuen to

F wine. Yet he wanne the victorie at that tyme, and there were diuers of his fathers friendes, that prayed him to doe them that honour, that they might keepe the feast of this victorie in their houses. Phocion denyed them all, but one man, and him he suffered to shewe his good will vnto his house, and went thither him selfe to supper to him. Where amongest many fine and superfluous thinges prepared, he found passing bathes of wine and sweete smelling spices to washe the feete of the bydden guestes as they came to the feast: Whereuppon he called his sonne to him, and asked him, howe canst thou abyde Phocus, that our friend should thus disgrace thy victorie with excesse? But bicause he would withdrawe his sonne from that licentious life, he brought him to SPARTA, and placed him there amonge younge boyes brought vppe after the LACONIAN discipline. The ATHENIANS were much offended at it, to see that Phocion did so much despise his owne contrie manner and facions. Also when Demades the Orator one daye sayde vnto Phocion: why doe we not perswade the ATHENIANS to liue after the LACONIAN manner? As for me (sayde he) if thou wilt make one to sette it forwarde: I am ready to be the first man to moue the matter. In deede, q Phocion, thou art a meete man to perswade the ATHENIANS to liue LACONIAN like, in common together at their meales, and to prayse Lycurgus straight lawe: that art thy selfe commonly so perfumed, and fine in thy apparell. Another tyme when Alexander wrote letters vnto ATHENS to sende him some shippes, and that the Orators perswaded them not to graunt him, the people called vppon Phocion chiefly to saye his opinion: then Phocion tolde them plainely, me thinkes ye must eyther make your selues the strongest in warres, or beeing the weaker, procure to be friendes vnto the stronger. Pythias, a newcome Orator, beeing full of tongue, and impudent, would still make one to speake in euery matter: Wherefore Phocion sayde vnto him, good goddes, will this noues neuer leaue babling? And when Harpalus king Alexanders Lieuetenant of the prouince of BABYLON, fledde out of ASIA, and came to ATTICA with a greate summe of golde and siluer: straight these men that solde their tongues to the people for money, flocked about him like a sight of swallowes. And he stucke not to giue euery one of them a peece of money to baste them with: for it was a trifle to him, considering the great summes of money he brought. But to Phocion him selfe, he sent vnto him seuen hundred talents, and offered him selfe and all that he had into his handes of trust. But Phocion gaue him a sharpe aunswer, and tolde him, that he woulde make him repent it, if he corrupted the citie of ATHENS in that manner. So Harpalus beeing amated therewith, left him at that tyme, and went vnto them that had taken money of him. But shortly after, when the ATHENIANS sate in counsell about him, he perceiued that those which had taken his money, were shronke from him, and that they did accuse him, where they should haue excused him, to bleere the world, that men should not suspecte them they had beene corrupted: and that Phocion on thother side which had refused his money, hauing respect to the common wealth, had also some regarde to saue his life: he once more attempted all the wayes he could to wynne him. Howbeit he found him so constant, that no money could cary the man. Then Harpalus falling in friendshippe with Charicles (Phocions sonne in lawe) he made him to be ill spoken of, and greatly suspected, bicause men sawe that he trusted him in all thinges, and employed him in all his affayres. As, in committing to his trust the making of a sumptuous tombe for Pythonicé, the famous Curtisan that was deade, whom he loued, and by whome he had a Daughter: the taking apon him whereof was no lesse shame vnto Charicles, then the finishing thereof was disgrace vnto him. This tombe is seene vnto this daye in a place called Hermium, in the hie waye from ATHENS to ELEVSIN: the workemanshippe thereof being nothing like neare the charge of thirtie talents, which was reported to be giuen by Harpalus vnto Charicles, for the finishing of the same. Furthermore, after Harpalus death, Charicles and Phocion tooke his Daughter, and carefully brought her vppe. Afterwardes also, Charicles beeing accused for the money he had taken of Harpalus, he besought his father in lawe Phocion, to helpe to ease him in his iudgement. But Phocion flatly denyed him, and sayde: Charicles, I tooke thee for my sonne in lawe, in all honest and iust causes onely. Furthermore, when Asclepiades, the sonne of Hipparchus, brought the first newes of the deathe of Kinge Alexander, Demades the Orator woulde not beleeue him: for, sayde he, if it were true, all the earthe woulde smell of the sauour of his corse. Phocion then perceyuing the people beganne to bee highe minded, and sought innouacion: he went about to brydle and pacifie them. But when many of the Orators gotte vppe-

A to the pulpitte for orations, and cryed out, that Asclepiades newes were true of Alexanders deathe: well then, q Phocion, if it bee true to daye, it shall be true also to morrowe, and the next day after. And therefore my Maisters, bee not too hastye, but thinke of it at better leysure, and sette your affayres at a sure staye. When Leosthenes also by his practise had brought the citie of ATHENS into the warre called the GREEKES warre, and in skorne asked Phocion, that was offended at it, what good he had done to the common wealth so many yeares together as he had beene Generall ouer the ATHENIANS: Phocion aunswered him, no small good, sayde he, for all my contrye men haue beene buryed at home in their owne graues. Another tyme Leosthenes speaking prowdely and insolently to the people, Phocion one daye sayde vnto him: younge man my friende, thy wordes are B lyke to a Cypres tree, which is highe and greate, but beareth no frute. Then Hyperides rising vppe, asked Phocion: when wilt thou then counsell the ATHENIANS to make warre? when I shall see younge men, sayde he, not forsake their rancks, ne the men liberall, and Orators leaue to robbe the common wealth. When the ATHENIANS wondred to see suche a goodly greate armie as Leosthenes had leauied: and that they asked Phocion howe he lyked it: A goodly armie, q he, for a furlonge, but I feare their returne, and the continuance of this warre: for I doe not see the citie able to make any more money, nor moe shippes, neyther yet any moe souldiers than these. The which proued true, as it fell out afterwardes. For at the first, Leosthenes did notable exployts. He ouercame the BOEOTIANS in battell, and draue Antipater into the citie of LAMIA: the which did put the ATHENIANS in suche a hope and C iolitie, that they made continuall feastes and sacrifices through the citie, to thanke the gods for these good newes. And there were some amonge them, that to take Phocion in a trippe, asked him if he did not wish that he had done all those things? yes in deede, aunswered he, I would I had done them, but yet I would not haue giuen the counsel to haue done them. Another tyme also when letters came, dayly, one after an other, bringing good newes, good gods, sayde he, when shall we leaue to ouercome. When Leosthenes was deade in this voyage, they that feared Phocion shoulde bee appoynted Captayne in his place, and that he woulde pacifie the warre: did thrust in a man of meane hauior, and vnknowen, that sayde in the assemblie, he was Phocions friende and schoolefellowe, and therefore besought the people that they woulde spare Phocion, bicause they had not suche another man as he, and that they D woulde make Antiphilus Generall of their armie. The people were contented withall. But then Phocion stoode vppe, and sayde, that this man was neuer scholler with him, neyther did he euer knowe him before that tyme: but nowe sayde he, from henceforth I will take thee for my friende, for thou hast giuen the people the best counsell for me. The people notwithstanding determining to make warre with the BOEOTIANS, Phocion spake agaynst it all he coulde. Thereuppon, his friendes bidding him beware of suche speeches, howe he did offende the people, least they killed him: he aunswered them, they shall wrongefully put me to death, q he, speaking for the benefitte of my contrye, but otherwise they shall haue reason to doe it, if I speake to the contrarye. But when he sawe nothing woulde pacifie them, and that they went on still with their intent: then he commaunded the Herawlde E to proclayme by sownde of tromper, that all Citizens from fourteene yeares to three score, able to cary weapon, shoulde presently vppon breaking vp of thassembly, arme themselues, and followe him with fiue dayes prouision for victells. Then was there greate stirre amonge them in the citie, and the olde men came and complayned vnto him, for his ouerstraight commaundement. He tolde them agayne, I doe you no wronge: for I am fourescore my selfe, and yet will goe with you. By this meanes he pacified them at that tyme, and quenched their fond desire of warre. But when all the sea coast was full of souldiers, both of the MACEDONIANS, and other straungers which were ledde by Alcetas their Captaine, that landed in the territorie of the village RHAMNVS, and spoyled the countrey thereabomes: then Phocion ledde the ATHENIANS thither. But when he was there, diuers taking vpon them the F office of a Lieuetenant, and going about to counsell him, some to lodge his campe vpon such a hill, and others to send his horsemen to such a place, and others to campe here: O Hercules, q he, how many Captaines doe I see, and how fewe souldiers? Afterwardes which he had set his footemen in battell raye, there was one amonge them that left his rancke, and ſtepped out before them all. Thereuppon one of his enemies alſo made towardes him, to fight with him: but the ATHENIANS hart failed him, and he went backe againe to his place. Then ſayd Phocion vnto him: art thou not aſhamed young lowte to haue forſaken thy rancke twiſe? the one, where thy Captaine had placed thee, and the other in the which thou haddeſt placed thy ſelfe? So Phocion giuing charge apon the enemies, he ouerthrew them, and ſlue Micion their Captaine, with diuers others. Furthermore, the armie of the GRÆCIANS being at that time in THESSALY, wanne a battell againſt Antipater, and Leonatus, that ioyned with him with the MACEDONIANS which he had brought out of ASIA: where Leonatus was ſlaine in the field, Antiphilus beeing generall of the footemen, and Menon THESSALIAN, Colonell of the horſemen. Shortly after, Craterus comming out of ASIA into EVROPE with a great armie, they fought a battell by the citie of CRANON, where the GRÆCIANS were ouerthrowen: yet was not the ouerthrowe nor ſlaughter greate, although it came through the diſobedience of the ſouldiers to their Captaines, which were but young men, and vſed them ouer gently. Moreouer, when Antipater practiſed to make their cities reuolt, they betrayed them, and ſhamefully forſooke to defend their common libertie: Whereuppon Antipater marched forthwith with his armie, to the citie of ATHENS. Demoſthenes and Hyperides vnderſtanding that, forſooke the citie. Then Demades, that was in diſgrace and defamed for lacke of payment of ſuch fynes as were ſet vpon his head (being ſeuen ſeuerall times condemned, bicauſe he had ſo many tymes moued matters contrary to the law) and could not therefore be ſuffered any more to ſpeake in the aſſembly, was then diſpenſed withall, and licenſed to ſpeake: whereuppon he moued the people to ſend Ambaſſadors vnto Antipater, with full commiſſion & authoritie to treate with him of peace. The people fearing to put to any mans truſt this abſolute authoritie to treate of peace: they called for Phocion, ſaying, that he onely was to be truſted with the ambaſſade. Then Phocion aunſwered them: if you had beleeued my former counſells I alwaies gaue you, ſuch weighty matters ſhould not now haue troubled you at all. So the decree being confirmed by the people, Phocion was ſent Ambaſſador vnto Antipater, that laye then in the caſtell of Cadmea, being ready at that time to inuade the contrye of ATTICA. Phocion firſt requeſted him, that before he remoued from thence, he would make peace with the ATHENIANS. Craterus preſently aunſwered him: Phocion, thy requeſt is vnreaſonable, that lying here we ſhould eate out our friendes, and deſtroy their contry: when we may liue of our enemies, and enriche our ſelues with their ſpoyle. But Antipater taking Craterus by the hand, tolde him: we muſt needes doe Phocion this pleaſure. And for the reſt, touching the capitulacions of peace, he willed that the ATHENIANS ſhould ſend them a blancke, and referre the condicions of peace vnto them: like as he him ſelfe being beſeeged in the citie of LAMIA, had referred all capitulacions and articles of peace, vnto the diſcreſſion of Leoſthenes their generall. So when Phocion was come backe to ATHENS, the ATHENIANS ſeeing there was no remedie, were compelled to be contented with ſuch offer of peace, as the enemie made them. Then Phocion was ſent back againe to Antipater at THEBES, with other Ambaſſadors ioyned in commiſſion with him: amongeſt whom alſo, was that famous Philoſopher Xenocrates. The eſtimation of his vertue was ſo great with all men, that it was thought there was no liuing man ſo prowd, cruel, diſdainful, nor haſty of nature, but that the onely looke of Xenocrates would ſoften and qualifie him, and make him to reuerence him. But yet with Antipater it fell out contrary, by his peruerſe nature, which hated all vertue: for he imbraced all the reſt, & would not once ſalute Xenocrates. Whereuppon, ſome ſay, that Xenocrates ſaid then: Antipater doth well to be aſhamed, to ſee me a witnes of the diſcurteſie and euill he meaneth vnto the ATHENIANS. So when Xenocrates beganne to ſpeake, Antipater would not abide to heare him, but interrupted him, and checked him, and in the ende commaunded him to holde his peace. When Phocion had ſpoken, Antipater aunſwered them: that he would make peace with the ATHENIANS, ſo they deliuered him Demoſthenes and Hyperides: that they ſhould keepe their auncient lawes and gouernment, that they ſhould receiue a garriſon into the hauen of Munychia, that they ſhould defray the charges of this warre, and alſo paye a raunſome beſides. All the other Ambaſſadors but Xenocrates, willingly accepted theſe condicions of peace, as very reaſonable and fauourable: but he ſayde, that

A that for slaues, Antipater did handle them fauorably: but for free men, he delt too hardly with them. Then Phocion besought him that he would yet release them of their garrison. But Antipater (as it is sayde) aunswered him: Phocion, we would gladly graunt thee any thing, saue that which should vndoe thee, and vs both. Some other write notwithstanding, that Antipater sayd not so, but asked him, if he would become suertie for the Athenians, that they should attempt no alteracion, but faithfully keepe the articles and conditions of this peace, if he did release them of this garrison. Phocion then holding his peace, & delaying aunswer, there was one Callimedon surnamed Carabos, (a bolde man, and hated the libertie of the people) that brake forth in these words: if Phocion were so fond to giue his word for the Athenians, wouldest thou, Antipater, beleue him therefore, and leaue to doe that thou hast determined? Thus B were the Athenians driuē to receiue the garrison of the Macedonians, of the which Menyllus was captaine, an honest man, and Phocions friend. This commaundement to receiue the garrison within the hauen of Munichya, was found very stately, and done by Antipater, rather of a vaine glory to boast of his power: then for any profit could otherwise come of it. For not long after, on that day when he tooke possession of the castell, he further increased their griefe: bicause the garrison entred the twenty day of Boedromion (to wit, the moneth of August) on the which the feast day of their misteries was celebrated, at what time they make their procession called Iacchus, from the citie of Athens, vnto Elevsin. Therefore the solemnitie of this holy feast beeing thus confused, many beganne to consider, that in olde tyme when their Realme did flourishe, there were heard and seene voyces and images of the goddes on that C day, which made the enemies both afraid, and amazed: and nowe in contrary manner, in the very selfe same solemnitie of the gods, they sawe the greatest calamitie that could haue happened vnto Græce. And the holiest feast which was kept all the yere through before, became then too prophaned with the title of the greatest misfortune and euent, that euer happened vnto the Græcians, which was, the losse of their libertie. For not many yeares before, there was brought an oracle from Dodone vnto Athens: that they shoulde looke well to the rockes of Diana, that straungers shoulde not possesse them. And about that tyme also, the couerings with the which they doe adorne the holy beddes of the mysteries, beeing wette with water, became from a purple culler which they had before, to looke yellowe and pale, as it had beene the couering of a deade bodie. Yea, and that which was moste to bee won-D dered at of all other, was this: that taking other couerings which were not holy, and putting them in the same water, they did without chaunging keepe their culler they had before. When one of the Ministers of the temple also did washe a litle pygge in the sea, in a cleane place by the wharfe: there sodainely came a greate fishe that bytte at it, and caryed the hinder partes of the pygge cleane awaye with it. Whereby men coniectured that the goddes did signifie vnto them, that they should lose the lowest parte of their citie neatest to the sea, and should keepe the highest partes thereof. This notwithstanding, the garrison did not offend nor trouble the Athenians, bicause of the honestie of their Captaine Menyllus. Now there were aboue twelue thowsand Citizens, that for their pouertie lost the benefit of their freedome: of the which, parte of them remayned at Athens, vnto whome it seemed they E offered great wronge and iniurie: and parte of them also went into Thracia, where Antipater assigned them townes and landes to inhabite. They seemed to be men like vnto them that had beene taken by assaulte, or by seege within a citie, which had beene compelled to forsake their contrie. Furthermore, the shamefull death of Demosthenes in the Ile of Calavria, and of Hyperides, by the citie of Cleones, (whereof we haue written heretofore) were almost occasion giuen them to lament the tymes of the raigne of king Philip and Alexander. As it is reported, that when Antigonus was slayne, they that had ouercomen him, were so cruell vnto their subiectes: that a laborer in the contrie of Phrygia digging the earthe, beeing asked what he sought for, aunswered, sighing: I seeke for Antigonus. Then many men beganne to say as much, when they remembred the noble myndes of those F two great Princes, howe mercifull they were to pardon in their anger, forgetting their displeasure: not like Antipater, who craftily cloked his tyrannicall power which he vsurped, by beeing familliar, going simplely apparelled, and faring meanely: and yet showed him selfe notwithstanding a more cruell Lorde and tyrant vnto them whome he had ouercome. A Neuertheles, Phocion obtayned of him the restoring agayne of diuers men, whome he had banished: and those whome he coulde not gette to bee restored, yet he procured that they shoulde not be banished into so farre contries, as others which had beene sent beyonde the Mountaines Acroceraunians, and the head of Tænarus out of Græce, but that they had libertie to remayne within the contrie of Peloponnesvs: amonge the which, was one Ag- nonides a Sycophant, and false accuser. Furthermore, he gouerned them that remayned in Athens with great iustice and lenitie, and such as he knewe to be good men and quiet, them he alwayes preferred to some office: but such as he sawe were fantastyke people, and desirous of chaunge, he kept them from office, and tooke all occasion from them, so that they vanished awaye of them selues, and learned in tyme to loue the contrye, and to followe til- B lage. When he sawe Xenocrates also paye a certeine pension or tribute to the common wealth, which all straungers dwelling in Athens did vse yearely to paye: he woulde haue made him a free man, and offered to put his name amongest the number of free Citizens.

But Xenocrates refused it, saying, he woulde haue no parte of that freedome, for the hinderance whereof, he had beene sent Ambassador. And when Menyllus had sent Phocion money, he made him aunswer: that Menyllus was no greater Lorde then Alexander had beene, neyther had he at that tyme any greater occasion to receyue his present, then when he had refused King Alexanders gyfte. Menyllus replying agayne, sayde: that if he had no neede of it for him selfe, yet he might let his sonne Phocus haue it. But Phocion aun-swered: if my sonne Phocus will leaue his naughtye lyfe, and become an honest man, that C which I will leaue him, shall serue his turne very well: but if it bee so that he will still holde on the course he hath taken, there is no riches then that can suffice him. An other tyme also he aunswered Antipater more rowndely, when he woulde haue had him done an vnhoneste thinge: Antipater, sayde he, can not haue me his friende, and flatterer both. An- tipater selfe was wont to saye, that he had two friendes in Athens, Phocion and Demades: of the which, he coulde neuer make the one to take any thinge of him, and the other, he coulde neuer satisfie him. And truely Phocions pouertye was a greate glorye of his vertue, sythe he was growen olde, continuing in the same, after he had beene so many tymes generall of the Athenians, and had receyued suche friendshippe and curtesie, of so many Kinges and Princes. Where Demades to the contrarye delighted to shewe his riches in D thinges that were contrarye to the lawes of the citie. For, a decree beeing made at Athens, commaunding that no straunger, vppon forfeyture of a thowsand Drachmas to bee payed by the defrayer of the daunces to the citie, shoulde bee any of the Dauncers that daunced at any common playes or sportes: Demades one daye making certeyne games and sportes at his owne charges, brought a hundred Dauncers of straungers at one tyme, and with-all, brought also a hundred thowsand Drachmas to paye the forfeyture thereof. Another tyme when he maryed his sonne Demus, he sayde vnto him: sonne, when I maryed thy mother, there was so small roste, that my next neyghbour knewe not of it: where nowe at thy maryage, Kinges and Princes are at the charge of the feaste. Furthermore, when the Athenians were importunate with Phocion to goe to Antipater, to intreate him to take E his garrison out of their citie: he still refused the ambassade, eyther bycause he had no hope to obtayne it, or for that he sawe the people more obedient vnto reason, for feare of the garrison. Howebeit he obtayned of Antipater, that he shoulde not bee too hastye in de-maundinge of his money, but shoulde deferre it tyll a further tyme. So the Athenians perceiuing they could doe no good with Phocion, they intreated Demades, who willingly tooke the matter vpon him, and went with his sonne into Macedon, whether doubtles his destinie caried him to his vtter destruction, euen at that very time when Antipater was fallen sicke of a dissease whereof he dyed: Whereby the affayres of the Realme went through the handes of Cassander his sonne, who had intercepted a letter of this Demades, which he had sent vnto An- tigonus in Asia, willing him to come in all possible speede to winne Græce and Macedon, F which hong but of an old rotte threde, mocking Antipater in this maner. Wherfore Cassander being aduertised of his arriual, he made him presently to be apprehended, & setting his sonne

A hard by him, slue him before his father, so neere him, that the blood of his sonne sprang vpon him: so that the father was all bloodied with the murther of his sonne. Then Cassander casting in Demades teeth his ingratitude, and trecherous treason against his father, geuing him all the reproachfull words he could deuise: at the length he slue him with his owne hands. Now Antipater before his death, had established Polyperchon Generall of the armie of the MACEDONIANS, & Cassander his sonne, only Colonell of a thowsand footemen. He notwithstanding, after his fathers decease, taking vpon him the gouernment of the realme: sent Nicanor with speede to succeede Menillus in the Captainship of the garrison of ATHENS, before his death should be reuealed, commaunding him first in any case, to take the castell of Munychia, which he did. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS vnderstanding of the death of Antipater, they accused

B Phocion, for that he had knowen of his death long before, and yet kept it secret to please Nicanor. But Phocion regarded not this accusation, but fell in acquaintance notwithstanding with Nicanor: whom he handled so wisely, that he made him not only friendly vnto the ATHENIANS, but furthermore perswaded him to be at some charge to geue the people the passime of common playes, which he made to be done at his cost. In the meane time, Polyperchon, who had the gouernment of the kings person, meaning to geue Cassander a stampant and blurt, he sent letters pattentes vnto the people at ATHENS, declaring how the young king did restore vnto them their popular state againe, and commaunded that all the ATHENIANS should vse their former auncient lawes of their citie. This was a wile & craftie fetche against Phocion. For Polyperchon deuising this practise to get the city of ATHENS into his hands (as it fel out afterwards

C by proofe) had no hope to obtaine his purpose, vnles he found meanes first to banish Phocion: and thought that he shoulde easily bring that to passe, when suche as had before bene put of their freedom, by his meanes, should come againe to haue voyces in thassembly, and that the seditious Orators and accusers might be turned at liberty againe, to say what they would. The ATHENIANS hauing heard the contentes of these letters pattentes, beganne to be somewhat quickened, and moued withall: whereupon Nicanor desiring to speake with the ATHENIANS in their Senate, which was assembled in the hauen of Piræa: he went and hazarded his person amongest them, apon Phocions faith and word. Dercyllus Captaine for the king, being secretly aduertised thereof, and in the field, not farre from the citie, did what he could to take Nicanor: but Nicanor hauing warning of it in time, saued him selfe. Then it appeared, that Ni-

D canor would presently be reuenged of the citie, and they accused Phocion bicause he kept him not, but did let him goe. Whereunto he answered: that he trusted Nicanors word, and that he did not thinke he would offer the citie any hurt, but if it should fall out otherwise, he had rather the world should know, that he had the wrong offred him, then that he should offer any. This truely appeared to be nobly spoken, in respect of him selfe. But considering that he being then Generall, did thereby hazard the safety of his countrie: I can not tell whether he did not breake a greater faith which he ought to haue had, to the safetie of his countriemen. Neither coulde he also alleage for his excuse, that he did not laye handes on Nicanor, for feare to bring the city into manifest warre: but that for a colour he did preferre the faith which he had sworne and promised vnto him, and the iustice that he would obserue in his behalfe: that for

E his sake, Nicanor should afterwards keepe him selfe in peace, and doe no hurte to the ATHENIANS. Howbeit in troth it seemed, that nothing deceiued Phocion: but by the ouer trust he had in this Nicanor. The which seemeth to be so, bicause when diuers came to him to complaine of Nicanor, that he sought all the secret meanes he coulde to surprise the hauen of Piræa, and that he dayly passed ouer souldiers in the Ile of SALAMINA, and practised to bribe certaine of the inhabitants within the precinct of the hauen: he would neuer heare of it, and muche lesse beleue it. Furthermore, when Philomedes LAMPRIAN made a motion, that the ATHENIANS should prepare to be in readines to waite apon their Captaine Phocion, to do as he commaunded them: he made no account of it, vntill he saw Nicanor come out with his souldiers from the fort of Munychia, and that he beganne to cast trenches to compasse in the ha-

F uen of Piræa. But then, when Phocion thought to lead out the people to preuent him: he found they mutined against him, and no man would obey his commaundement. In the meane time, Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon came with an armie, pretending to aide them of the citie

againſt Nicanor, where in deede he ment (if he could) to get the reſt of the city into his hands: then ſpecially, when they were in greateſt broile one againſt an other, and the rather, becauſe the baniſhed men entred hand other head with him, and diuers ſtraungers alſo, and other defamed men: ſo that there was a confuſed counſel and aſſembly of Ommigatherum kept within the citie, without any order, in the which Phocion was depriued of his office of Generall, and others were alſo choſen Captaines in his place. And had they not ſeene this Alexander talking alone with Nicanor, and returning many times hard to the walles of the citie, which made the ATHENIANS affrayed and miſtruſtfull: they had neuer ſaued it from taking. At that time Phocion was preſently accuſed of treaſon by the Orator Agnonides: the which Callimedon and Pericles fearing, got them out of the citie betimes. And Phocion alſo with his frends that were not fled, went vnto Polyperchon: with whom alſo Solon PLATÆIAN, and Dinarchus CORINTHIAN, went for company, who thought to haue found frendſhippe and familiarity with Polyperchon. Howbeit Dinarchus falling ſicke by the way, in the citie of ELATIA, they ſtayed there many dayes, hoping of his recouerie. But in the meane time, the people at the perſwaſion of the Orator Agnonides, and at the requeſt of Archeſtratus, ſtabliſhed a decree, to ſende Ambaſſadors vnto Polyperchon, to accuſe Phocion: inſomuch as both parties met at one ſelfe time, and found him in the field with the king about a village of the contrie of PHOCIDE, called PHARYGES, ſtanding at the foote of the mountaine Acrorion, which they ſurname alſo Galaten. There Polyperchon commaunded a cloth of gold to be ſet vp, and cauſed the king to be ſet vnder the ſame, and all his chiefeſt frendes about him. But to beginne withall, he made Dinarchus to be taken, and commaunded them to put him to death after they had racked him: then he willed the ATHENIANS to tell what they had to ſay. Then they beganne to quarrell, and to be lowde one with an other, accuſing one an other in the preſence of the king and his counſell: vntill Agnonides at length ſtepped forth, and ſayd: my Lordes of MACEDON, put vs all in priſon, and then ſend vs bound handes and feete to ATHENS, to geue accompt of our doinges. The king laughed to heare him ſay ſo. But the noble men of MACEDON that were preſent then, and diuers ſtraungers beſides to heare their complaints: made ſigne to the Ambaſſadors to vtter their accuſations before the king, rather then to referre them to the hearing of the people at ATHENS. Howbeit both parties had not alike indifferent hearing: for Polyperchon checked vp Phocion oftentimes, and did ſtill cut of his tale, as he thought to purge him ſelfe: inſomuch as in anger, he bet his ſtaffe he had in his hand againſt the ground, and commaunded him at length to hold his peace, & to get him thence. And when Hegemon alſo told Polyperchon, that he him ſelfe could beſt witneſſe, howe Phocion had alwayes faithfully ſerued and loued the people: he angrily aunſwered him, come not hether to lye falſely vpon me, in the preſence of the king. Therewith the king roſe out of his ſeate, and tooke a ſpeare in his hand, thinking to haue killed Hegemon: had not Polyperchon ſodainly embraced him behinde, and ſtayed him. So the counſell roſe, and brake vp, but preſently Phocion was apprehended, and they that ſtoode by him. Certaine of his frends ſeeing that, which ſtoode further of, muffeled their faces, and ſtraight conueyed them ſelues away. The reſt were ſent priſoners to ATHENS by Clitus, not ſo muche to haue their cauſes heard there, as to haue them executed for condemned men. Furthermore, the manner of the carying of them to ATHENS was ſhamefull. For they were caried vpon cartes through the great ſtreete Ceramicum, vnto the Theater: where Clitus kept them, vntill the Senate had aſſembled the people, excepting no bondman, no ſtraunger, nor defamed perſon out of this aſſemblie, but left the Theater wide open to all comers in whatſoeuer they were, and the pulpit for Orations free for euerie man that would ſpeake againſt them. So firſt of all, the kings letters were read openly, by the which he did aduertiſe the people, that he had found theſe offendors conuicted of treaſon: notwithſtanding, that he referred the ſentence of their condemnation vnto them, for that they were free men. Then Clitus brought his priſoners before the people, where the noble men when they ſaw Phocion, were aſhamed, and hiding their faces, wept to ſee him. Howbeit, there was one that roſe vp, and ſayd: my Lordes ſith the king referreth the iudgement of ſo great perſons vnto the people, it were great reaſon all the bondmen and ſtraungers which are no free citizens of ATHENS, ſhould be taken out of this aſſembly. The people would not agree to it, but cried

A cried out, that ſuch traitors ſhould be ſtoned to death, that fauor the authoritie of a few, and are enemies of the people: whereupon ſilence was made, and no man durſt ſpeake any more for Phocion. Neuertheleſſe when Phocion with muche a doe had obteyned audience, he asked them: my Lords, will ye iuſtly, or wrongfully put vs to death? Some aunſwered him: iuſtly. Howe then can ye doe it, q he, that will not heare our iuſtifications? Yet coulde they not be heard for all this. Then Phocion comming neerer, ſayd vnto them. For my ſelfe, my Lordes, I confeſſe I haue done you wrong, & haue in gouernment committed faults deſeruing death: but for theſe priſoners with me, what haue they done, why you ſhoulde put them to death? The common people aunſwered him: bicauſe they are thy frends. With this aunſwere Phocion departed, and ſpake neuer a word more. Then the Orator Agnonides holding a decree in B his hand ready wrytten, red it openly to the people, declaring how they ſhould be iudged by voyces, whether the offendors had deſerued death or not: and if it were found they had, then that they ſhould all be put to death. And there were that when this decree was red, cried out, that they ſhould adde further vnto the decree, that before Phocion ſhould be put to death, they ſhould firſt torment him: & therewithall commaundement was geuen that the wheele ſhould beſette vp to breake his ioints apon it, and alſo that the hangman ſhould be ſent for. But then Agnonides perceiuing that Clitus was offended with it, and thinking beſides it were too beaſtly and barbarous a parte to vſe him in that ſorte, he ſayd openly: my Lordes, when you ſhall haue ſuch a varlet in your handes as Callimedon, then you may caſt him on the wheele: but againſt Phocion, I would not wiſh ſuch cruelty. Then roſe vp a noble man among them, and ad- C ded to his words: thou haſt reaſon to ſay ſo, Agnonides: for if Phocion ſhould be layed on the wheele, what ſhould we then doe with thee? The decree being confirmed, according to the contents thereof, iudgement was geuen by voyces of the people, no man ſitting but all ſtanding vp, and moſt of them with garlandes on their heades, for the ioy they had to condemne theſe priſoners to death. With Phocion there were condemned, Nicocles, Thudippus, Hegemon, and Pythocles: but Demetrius Phalerian, Callimedon, and Charicles, were alſo in their abſence condemned to dye. Now when the aſſembly was broken vp, and that the perſons condemned were caried backe to priſon, from thence to be conueyed to execution: others imbracing their frends, and taking their laſt leaue of them as they went, wept, and lamented their curſed fortune. But Phcion looking as cheerefully of it as he was wont to doe being Generall, when D they honorably waited on him to his houſe, from the aſſembly: he made many of them pitie him in their harts, to conſider his conſtancie, and noble corage. On thother ſide alſo, there were many of his enemies that came as neere vnto him as they could, to reuile him, amongſt whom there was one that ſtepped before him, and did ſpit in his face. Then Phocion turning him vnto the Magiſtrates, ſayd: will you not cauſe this impudent fellow to leaue his rayling? When they were in priſon, Thudippus ſeeing the hemlocke which they brayed in a morter to geue them to drinke: he beganne deſperatly to curſe and banne, ſaying, that they wrongfully put him to death with Phocion. Why, ſayd Phocion againe: and dooſt thou not rather reioyce to dye with me? When one that ſtoode by asked Phocion, if he would any thing to his ſonne Phocus: yes, q he, that I will: bid him neuer reuenge the wrong the Athenians do me. Then E Nicocles one of Phocions deareſt frendes, prayed him to let him drinke the poyſon before him. Phocion aunſwered him, thy requeſt is grieuous to me, Nicocles: but bicauſe I neuer denyed thee any thing in my life, I wil alſo graunt thee this at my death. When al the reſt had dronke, there was no more poyſon left, and the hangman ſayd he would make no more vnleſſe they gaue him twelue Drachmas, for ſo much the pound did coſt him. Phocion perceiuing thē that the hangman delayed time, he called one of his frends vnto him, and prayed him to geue the hangman that litle money he demaunded, ſith a man can not dye at Athens for nothing, without coſt. It was the nineteenth day of the moneth of Munichion, (to wit, Marche) on which day the Knights were wont to make a ſolemne proceſſion in the honor of Iupiter: howbeit ſome of them left of the garlandes of flowers which they ſhoulde haue worne on their F heades, and others alſo looking towards the priſon dore as they went by, burſt out a weeping. For, they whoſe harts were not altogether hardned with crueltie, & whoſe iudgements were not wholly ſuppreſſed with enuie, thought it a grieuous ſacriledge againſt the goddes, that they did not let that day passe, but that they did defile so solemne a feast, with the violét death of a man. His enemies notwithstanding, continuing still their anger against him, made the people passe a decree, that his bodie should be banished, and caried out of the bondes of the contry of ATTICA, forbidding the ATHENIANS that no fire should be made for the solemnising of his funeralls. For this respect no frend of his durst once touch his body. Howebeit a poore man called Conopion, that was wont to get his liuing that way, being hyered for money to burne mens bodies: he tooke his corse, and caried it beyond the city of ELEVSIN, and getting fire out of a womans house of MEGARA, he solemnised his funeralls. Furthermore, there was a gentlewoman of MEGARA, who comming by chaunce that way, with her gentlewomen, where his body was but newly burnt: she caused the earth to be cast vp a litle where the body was burnt, and made it like to a hollow tombe, whereupon she did vse such sprincklings and effusions, as are commonly done at the funeralls of the dead: & then taking vp his bones in her lappe in the night, she brought them home, and buried them in her harth, saying: O deare harth, to thee I bequeath the relikes of this noble and good man, and pray thee to keepe them faithfully, to bring them one day to the graue of his auncesters, when the ATHENIANS shall come to confesse the fault & wrong they haue done vnto him. And truly it was not long after, that the ATHENIANS found by the vntowardnes of their affaires, that they had put him to death, who only maintained iustice, and honesty at ATHENS. Whereupon they made his image to be set vp in brasse, and gaue honorable buriall to his bones, at the charges of the citie. And for his accusers, they condemned Agnonides of treason, and put him to death themselues. The other two, Epicurus and Demophilus being fled out of the citie, were afterwardes met with by his sonne Phocus, who was reuenged of them. This Phocus as men reporte, was otherwise no great good man, who fancying a young maide which a bawde kept, comming by chaunce one day into the schoole of Lycæum, he heard Theodorus the Atheist (to wit, that beleued not there were any goddes) make this argument. If it be no shame, sayd he, to deliuer a mans frend from bondage, no more shame is it to redeeme his leman which he loueth: euen so it is all one to redeeme a mans leman, as his frende. This young man taking this argument to serue his turne, beleuinge that he might lawefully doe it, got the young maide he loued from the bawde. Furthermore, this death of Phocion did also reuiue the lamentable death of Socrates vnto the GRECIANS: for men thought that it was a like hainous offence and calamitie vnto the citie of ATHENS.

THE LIFE OF Cato Vtican.

THe family and house of Cato, tooke his first glorie and name of his great grandfather, Cato the Censor: who for his vertue (as we haue declared in his life) was one of the famousest and worthiest men of Rome in his time. This Cato whom we nowe wryte of, was left an orphan by his father and mother, with his brother Capio, and Porcia his sister. Seruilia was also Catoes half sister, by his mothers side. All these were brought vp with their vncle Liuius Drusus, at that time the greatest man of the citie: for he was passing eloquent, and verie honest, and of as great a corage besides, as any other ROMANE. Men report, that Cato from his childhood shewed him selfe both in word and countenance, and also in all his pastimes and recreacions, verie constant, and stable. For he would goe through with that he tooke apon him to doe, and would force him selfe aboue his strength: and as he could not away with flatterers, so was he rough with them that went about to threaten him. He would hardly laugh, and yet had euer a pleasaunt countenance. He was not choller like, nor easie to be angred: but when the blood was vp, he was hardly pacified. When he was first put to schoole, he was very dull of vnderstanding, and slow to learne: but when he had once learned it, he would neuer forget it, as all men else commonly doe. For such as are quicke of conceite, haue commonly the worst memories: and contrarily, they that are hard to learne, doe keepe that better which they haue learned. For euery kinde of learning is a motion and quickening of the minde. He seemed besides not to be light of credit, & that may be some cause of his slownes in conceite. For truely he suffereth somewhat that learneth, and thereof it commeth, that they that haue least reason to resist, are those which doe giue lightest credit. For young men are easelyer perswaded then old men, and the sicke then the whole. And where a man hath least reason for his douts: there he is soonest brought to beleue any thing. This notwithstanding, it is reported that Cato was obedient vnto his schoolemaister, and would doe what he commaunded him: howbeit he would aske him still the cause and reason of euery thing. In deede his schoolemaister was very gentle, and readier to teach him, then to strike him with his fist. His name was Sarpedo. Furthermore, when Cato was but a young boy, the people of ITALIE which were confederats of the ROMANES, sued to be made free citizens of Rome. At that time it chaunced one Pompedius Silo, a valliant souldier, and of great estimacion among the confederats of the Romanes, and a great frend besides of Drusus: to be lodged many dayes at his house. He in this time falling acquainted with these young boyes, sayd one day vnto them: good boyes, intreate your vncle to speake for vs, that we may be made free citizens of Rome. Capio smiling nodded with his head, that he would. But Cato making no aunswere, looked very wisely apon the straungers that lay in the house. Then Pompedius, taking him aside, asked him: and thou, my pretie boy, what sayest thou to it? Wilt thou not pray thine vncle, as well as thy brother, to be good to his guestes? Cato still held his peace, and aunswered nothing, but shewed by his silence and looke, that he would not heare their requeste. Then Pompedius taking him vp in his armes, did put him out of the window, as if he would haue let him haue gone: and speaking more sharply to him then he did before, he cast him many times out of his armes without the window, and sayd, promise vs then, or else I will let thee fall. But Cato abid it a long time, and neuer quinched for it, nor shewed countenaunce of feare. Thereupon Pompedius setting him downe againe, told his frends that stoode by him: O what good happe doth this child promise one day vnto Italie, if he liue? sure if he were a man, I beleue we should not haue one voice of all the people of our side. An other time, there were some of Catoes neere kinsemen, that keeping the feast day of his birth, bad many young boyes to supper, & amongest others this Cato. The boyes to occupie them selues till supper was ready, gathered them selues together great and small, into some priuate place of the house. Their play was, counterfeating pleadinges before the iudges, accusing one an other, and carying them that were condemned to prison. Amongest them, a goodly young boy was caried by a bigger boy into a litle chamber, bounde as a condemned person. The boy perceiuing he was locked vp, cried out vnto Cato: who mistrusting what it was, went straight to the chamber dore and putting them by by force that withstoode him to come vnto it, he tooke out the young boy, and caried him very angrily with him to his owne house, and all the other young boyes followed him also. So Cato had such name among the young boyes, that when Sylla made the game of young boyes running a horsebacke, which the Romanes call Troia: to appoint them before that they might be redy at the day of the show, he hauing gotten all the young boyes of noble houses together, appointed them two Captaines. Of them, the boyes tooke the one, bicause of his mother Metella, which was the wife of Sylla: but they would none of the other called Sextus, who was nephewe to Pompey the great, neither would they be exercised vnder him, nor followe him. Wherefore Sylla asked them, which of them they would haue: they all cried then Cato, and Sextus him selfe did willingly geue him the honor, as the worthier of both. Sylla was their fathers frend, and therefore did send for them many times to come vnto him, & he would talke with them: the which kindnes he shewed to few men, for the maiestie and great authority he had. Serpedo also (Catoes schoolemaister) thinking it a great preferrement and safetie for his schollers, did commonly bring Cato vnto Syllaes house, to waite vpon him: the which was rather like vnto a iayle or prison, for the great number of prisoners which were dayly brought thither, and put to death. Cato being then but foureteene yeares of age, and perceiuing that there were many heades brought which were sayed to be of great men, and that euery bodie sighed and mourned to see them: he asked his schoolemaister, how it was possible the tyran scaped, that some one or other killed him not? Bicause, q. Serpedo, that all men feare him, more then they hate him. Why then, replyed Cato againe, diddest thou not geue me a sword that I might kill him, to deliuer my contry of this slauery and bondage? Serpedo hearing the boy say so, and seeing his countenaunce and eyes on fire with choller, he maruelled much he at it, and afterwardes had a very good eye vnto him, least rashly he should attempt some thing against Sylla. When he was but a litle boy, some asked him whom he loued best? My brother, sayed he. Then the other continuing stil to aske him, & who next: he answered likewise, his brother. Then the third time againe, likewise his brother. Till at length he that asked him, was weary with asking him so oft. Yea and when he was comen of age also, he then confirmed the loue he bare to his brother in his deedes. For twenty yeares together he neuer supped without his brother Capio, neither went he euer out of his house into the market place, nor into the fields without him: but when his brother did noynt him selfe with sweete oyles of perfume, he would none of that, and in all things else, he led a straight and hard life. So that his brother

A Capio being commended of euery man for his temperaunce, honesty, and sober life, he graun-ted in deede that in respect of others, he led a sober and temperate life: but when I doe (sayd he) compare my life with my brother Catoes, me thinkes then there is no difference betweext me and Sippius. This Sippius was at that time noted and pointed at, for his fine and curious effeminate life. After that Cato was once chosen Apolloes Priest, he went from his brother and tooke his portion of the goods of his father, which amounted to the summe of a hundred and twentie talentes. Then he liued more hardly then he did before. For he fell in acquaintaunce morall and ciuill Philosophie, imbracing all exercise of vertue with suche an earnest desire, that it seemed he was prickt forward by some god: but aboue all other vertues, he loued the B seueritie of iustice, which he would not wrest for any gift nor fauor. He studied also to be eloquent, that he might speake openly before the people, bicause he would there should be certaine warlike forces entertained in ciuill Philosophie, as also in a great citie. Notwithstanding, he would not exercise it before any bodie, neither would he euer haue any man to heare him speake when he did learne to speake. For when one of his frends told him one day, that men did mislike he spake so litle in company: it skilleth no matter, q. he, so they can not reproue my life, for I will beginne to speake, when I can say some thing worthy to be spoken. Hard by the market place there was the common pallace or towne house of the citie, called Basilica Por-cia, the which Porcius Cato the elder had built, in the time of his Censorship. There the Tribunes were wont to keepe their audience: and bicause there was a piller that troubled their C seates, they would either haue taken it away, or else haue set it in some other place. That was the first cause that made Cato against his will to goe into the market place, and to get vp into Catoes act for Basilica Porcia.

the pulpit for orations, to speake against them: where hauing geuen this first proofe of his eloquence and noble minde, he was maruelously esteemed of. For his oration was not like a young man, counterfeating finenes of speache and affectation, but stout, full of wit and vehemency: and yet in the shortnes of his sentences, he had such an excellent grace withall, that he maruelously delighted the hearers: and furthermore, shewing in mature a certaine grauetie besides, it did so please them, that he made them laugh. He had a very full and audible voyce that might be heard of a maruelous number of people, and such a strong nature besides, that he neuer fainted, nor brake his speache: for many times he would speake a whole day toge-D ther, and was neuer wearie. So when he had obtained his cause against the Tribunes, he re- Catoes exercises.
turned againe to keepe his former great silence, and to harden his bodie with painefull exercises, as to abide heate, frost, and snow bare headed, and alwayes to goe a foote in the fielde, where his frendes that did accompany him rode a horsebacke, and sometime he would come and talke with one, somtime with an other, as he went a foote by them. He had a wonderfull pacience also in his sickenes. For when he had any agew, he would be alone all day long, and suffer no man to come and see him, vntill he perceiued his fit was of him, and that he founde he was better. When he supped with his frendes and familiars, they drewe lottes who should choose their partes. If he chaunced not to choose, his frendes notwithstanding gaue him the preferrement to choose: but he refused it, saying it was no reason, sith the goddesse Venus was draught only, he would straight rise. But when he came to be elder, he sate long at the table: so that oftentimes he would sit it out all night with his frends, till the next morning. But they seeking to excuse it, sayd, that his great busines and affaires in the common wealth was the cause of it. For following that all the day long, hauing no leasure nor time to studie when night came, he delighted to talke with learned men, and Philosophers, at the bord. Wherefore when Memmius on a time being in company, sayed, that Cato did nothing but drinke all night: Cicero taking his tale out of his mouth, aunswered him, thou doest not adde this vnto it, that all the day he doth nothing but play at dyse. To be short, Cato thinking that the ma- Ciceroes saying of Cato.

ners and facions of mens liues in his time were so corupt, and required such great chaunge F and alteracion: that to goe vprightly, he was to take a contrarie course in all thinges. For he saw that purple, red, & the lightest colours were best esteemed of: he in contrarie maner desired to weare blacke. And many times also after dinner he would goe abroade bare footed without shooes, and without any gowne: not bicause he would be wondered at for any suche A straungenes, but to acquaint him selfe to be ashamed only of shameles and dishoneſt things, and to despise those which were not reproued, but by mens opinions. Furthermore, land being left him to the value of an hundred talentes by the death of a cousin of his, that likewise was called Cato: he put it all into ready money, to lend to his frendes that lacked, and without vsury. And there were some of his frends also that would morgage his land, or his slaues, to the chamber of the city, for their owne priuate busines: the which he him selfe would either giue thē to morgage, or else afterwards confirme the morgage of them. Furthermore, when he was Lepida had bene precontracted vnto Metellus Scipio: but afterwardes the precontract being broken, he forsooke her, so that she was free, when Cato was contracted to her. Notwith- B meanes he could to haue her againe: & so he had. Cato tooke it so grieuously, that he thought to goe to lawe for her: but his frendes diswaded him from it. Then seeing no other reme-die, to satisfie his angrie minde, he wrote verses against Scipio, in the which he reuiled him all he coulde: vsing the bitter tauntes of Archilocus verses, but not suche impudent, lewde, wished, shewe his valliantnesse and good seruice, bicause of the insufficiencie of the Prætor that gaue ill direction. This notwithstanding, in the middest of al the riot & insolency of them in the campe, he shewing him selfe a stayed man in all his doinges, valliant where neede was, and very wise also: all men esteemed him to be nothing inferior vnto Cato the elder. Where-uppon Gellius the Prætor gaue him many honors in token of his valliantnes, which are giuen in reward of mens good seruice: howebeit Cato refused them, and sayd, that he was nothing worthie of those honors. These thinges made him to be thought a maruelous straunge man.

Furthermore, when there was a lawe made, forbidding all men that sued for any office in the D speake vnto euery one of them, and to call them by their names: so that he was enuied euen of them that did commend him. For, by how much they knew his deedes praiseworthie, by so muche more were they grieued, for that they could not followe them. So Cato being chosen should prepare two beds in his chamber, that Munatius also might lye there: who was rather pleasantly him selfe looked vnto by Cato, then Cato by him. He had fiftene slaues with him, two free men, & foure of his frends, which rode, & he himselfe went a foote, somtime talking with one, otherwhile with an other as he went. When he came to the campe, where there were many legions of the ROMANES, the Prætor immediatly gaue him charge of one of them: who

So dreadfull they shewed them selues to their enemies, and curteous to their frendes: fearefull to doe euill, and readie to winne honor. Whereof followed that which Cato least accounted of, that is, he wanne fame, and good will: for his souldiers did greatly honor and loue him, bicause he him selfe would euer first set his hande to any thing he commaunded them, and bicause also both in his diet, in his apparrell, and in any iorney or paines, he was rather like vnto the meanest souldier, then any of the other Captaines. In contrarie maner also, in good nature, noble corage, and eloquence, he farre exceded all the other Colonells and Captaines. For the true loue of ver-

When Cato vnderstoode that Athenodorus surnamed Cordylion, a Stoicke Philosopher, excellently well learned, dwelt at that time in the city of PERGAMVM, being a very old man, and one that stiffely refused the frendshipp of kings, Princes, and noble men, desirous to haue him about them: to write to him, he thought it was but lost labor. Wherefore hauing two moneths liberty by the lawes of the ROMANES, to followe his owne affaires: he tooke sea, and went into ASIA to him, hoping he should not lose his iorney, for the great vertues he knew in him. So when he had spoken with him, and talked of diuers matters together: at length he brought him from his first determination, and caried him to the campe with him, esteeming this victorie more, then all the conquestes of Lucullus or Pompey, who had conquered the most parte of all the prouinces

In the meane time, whilest he lay at his charge in the campe, being Colonell of a thowsand footemen: his brother preparing to go into ASIA, fell sicke in the citie of ÆNVS, in the contrie of THRACIA. Cato hauing speedie intelligence thereof, tooke sea presently, when it was maruelous rough and boysterous, and imbarked in a litle crayer of a marchaunts of THESSALIE, with two of his frends, and three bondmen only, and did scape drowning very narrowly: and yet by good fortune arriued safely, a litle after his brother Cæpioes death. He tooke his death more sorowfully, then became a Philosopher, not onely mourning and lamenting for him, imbracing the deade corse of his brother: but also for the exceding charge and sumptuous funerals, which he bestowed vpon him, in perfumes,

Some did mislike this vaine charge that Cato bestowed, considering the modestie and temperance he vsed in all things else, not regarding with iudgement his tender loue and affection towards his kinsemen, which was mingled in him with his seuerity and hardnes, against all voluptuousnes, feare, and shameless requests. Diuers cities, Princes and noble men sent him many sundrie presents, to honor the funeralls of his brother Cæpio: howbeit he tooke no money of all them, saiing only spyces, and sweete sauors, & such other ornamentes, as honored the obsequies of the dead, and yet payed for them, vnto those that brought them, as much as they were worth. Furthermore, in the land that fell vnto him, and a litle daughter of his, by the death of his brother: notwithstanding the charge he had then they prepared his supper in an Inne, and troubled no man: but if there were no Inne, then they went to the Gouernors of the towne, and prayed them to helpe them to lodging, and did content them selues with the first that was offered them. Oftentimes the townes men did not beleue they were Catoes men, and made no accompt of them: bicause they tooke all things so quietly, & made no a do with the officers. Insomuch as Cato somtime came himselfe, & found nothing ready for him, & when he was come, they made as small account of him, seeing him set apon his cariages, and speake neuer a word: for they tooke him for some meane man, and a timerous person. Notwithstanding, sometime he called them vnto him, and tolde them. O B they would haue: bicause you vnwillingly also do graunt them the things they would, & nede.

A laughing matter happned vnto Cato.

There is a report of a pretie ieast happened him in SYRIA. When he came to ANTIOCHE, he found a great number of people deuided on either side of the streete, standing a row one by an other verie decently: the young men by them selues in fayer clokes, boyes by them selues in seemely aray, and priests & other officers of the city also, all in white garments, crowned with garlands. Cato thought straight they had made this solemne precession to honor him, and fell C out with his men he had sent before, bicause they did suffer thē to make such preparacion for his comming. So he made his frends light from their horses, & go a foote to accompany him.
But when they came neere to the gate of the city, the maister of these ceremonies that had assembled all that company (an old man, hauing a rodde in his hand, and a crowne on his head) came to Cato without saluting of him, and asked him only, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come. This Demetrius had bene one of Pompeis slaues, & bicause Pompeis fame was great with all men, his seruant Demetrius also was much honored and made of aboue his deserte, for that he was in great credit with Pompey. Catoes frendes hearing what question the olde man asked him, burst out a laughing as they went through this precession. Cato being ashamed of it, sayd no more then: but, O vnfortunate citie. Afterwards notwithstanding, when D he told it to any body, he would laugh at it him selfe. So Pompey rebuked them, that through ignorance had failed to honor Cato. When Cato came to the citie of EPHESVS, and was com-ming towardes Pompey to salute him, being the elder man, and of greater dignitie and estima-cion then he, who at that time also was Generall of a great and puisant armie: Pompey seeing him comming towards him a farre of, would not tary till he came to him, sitting in his chaire of estate, but rising vp went to meete him, as one of the greatest and noblest persons of ROME, and taking him by the hande, after he had imbraced and welcomed him, he presently fell in praise of his vertue before his face, and afterwards also commended him in his absence, when he was gone from him. Whereuppon, euerie man after that had him in great veneracion for those things, which before they despised in him, when they considered better of his noble & E curteous mind. For men that saw Pompeis entertainment towards him, knew well enough that Cato was a man which he rather reuerenced, & for a kinde of duty obserued, more then for any loue he bare him: & they noted further, that he honored him greatly while he was with him, he was nothing desirous of his company, for that in his presence he thought he could not cōnotwithstanding his seuerity asked Cato if he would go see Asia, when his charge were expired. Cato answered againe, that it was his full determination. Oh well sayd, quod Cato, I hope then thou wilt returne more pleasaunt and ciuill. And these were Curios wordes. But furthermore, Deiotarus king of GALATIA, being a very old man, sent for Cato to come into his countrie to recommend his sonnes & house vnto him: who, when he arriued there, had great rich presents of all sortes offered him by the king, intreating him all he could to take them. This so much displeased and angered Cato, that he comming thither in the euening, (after he had taried there one whole day onely) the next morning he went his waye from thence at the thirde hower. Howbeit he had not gone one dayes iorney, but he found greater giftes that tarried him, with Deiotarus letters, at the citie of PESSINVNTA: in the which he instantly requested him to take them, or at the least if he would refuse them him selfe, that then he would let them be deuided amongest his frendes, sith euery way they did deserue it, but specially for his sake, for that his goodes also were not so great, as could content all his frends. But Cato would not suffer them to take any iot of it more then before, although he saw well enough that there were some of them so tender harted, that they complayned of him, for that he woulde not suffer them to take any of it. For he tolde them, that otherwise, corruption and briberie could lacke no honest colour to take: and for his frends, they should alwayes haue parte with him of that which was his owne iustly. So he returned king Deiotarus presentes backe againe. Nowe when he was readie to imbarke, to passe ouer the sea againe vnto BRVNDVSIVM: some of his frendes perswaded him, that it was better to put the asshes of his brother Capiones bones into an other shippe. But he answered them, that he would rather lose his owne life, then to leaue his brothers relikes. Thereuppon he presently hoysed sayle, and it is reported that he passed ouer in great daunger, where other shippes arriued very safely. When he was returned vnto ROME, he was alwayes either talking Philosophie with Athenodorus the Philosopher, or else in the market place to pleasure his frendes. When his turne came that he was to make sute to be Quæstor, he would neuer sue for it, before he had first diligently perused all the ordinaunces touching the office of Quæstor, and that he had particularly made enquierie of men of greatest experience to knowe what the authoritie of the office was. So, he no sooner came to his office, but he presently made great alteracion amongest the clearkes and officers of the treasurie: who hauing the lawes and recordes in their handes, and exercising the office commonly vnder young men which were chosen treasurers (who for their ignoraunce and lacke of experience, stoode rather in neede of maisters to teache them, then that they were able to correct others) they them selues were the officers, and controlled them. But Cato not contenting him selfe with the name and honor of the thing, did throughly vnderstande what the clearkes and registers shoulde be, and therefore would haue them to be as they ought to be, ministers vnder the Quæstors only, telling them of their briberie and corruption which they committed, and reformed them also, that fauted through ignoraunce. And when he sawe some insolent and impudent persons, that curried fauour with other treasurers to be against him: he caused the chiefest of them to be condemned for falsehoode, in making diuision betwext two coheires, and consequently turned him cleare out of his office, for euer doing any thing there any more. He accused an other also for forging of a will, whome Catulus Luctatius defending, being then Censor, and a man of great honor for the dignity of his office, but chiefly for his vertue, being counted the iustest man one of them in his time at ROME, and one of those also that highly commended Cato, & was conuersant with him for his honest life: when he perceiued that he could not defend his man by no reason, he prayed them at his request that they would pardon him. But Cato would in no wise graunt it. But Catulus earnestly intreating still for him: then Cato plainely sayd vnto him, It is a shame for thee (Catulus) thou that art Censor, and shouldest reforme all our liues, thus to forget the duetie of thine office, to please our ministers. Catulus looking at Cato when he had spoken, as though he would answere him: whether it were for shame, or anger, he went his way, & sayd neuer a word more. Yet was not the partie condemned, though there was one voyce more that did condemne then cleere him, bicause of the absence of one of the Iudges. For Marcus Lollius, one of Catoes colleagues in the Quæstorship, being sicke at that time, and absent, Catulus sent vnto him, to pray him to come and helpe the poore man. Thereupon Lollius being brought thither in a litter after iudgement geuen, gaue his last voyce, which absolutely cleared him. Cato, this notwithstanding, would neuer vse him as a clearke, nor pay him his wages, nor would count of Lollius voyce among others. Thus hauing pulled downe the pride and stomacke of these clearkes, and brought them vnto reason: in short time he had all the tables and records at his commaundement, and made the treasure chamber as honorable, as the Senate in selfe: so that euery man thought, and sayd, that Cato had added vnto the Quæstorshippe the dignity of the Consulship. For finding diuers men indetted before vnto the common wealth, and the common wealth also vnto diuers men: he sette downe such an order, that neither the common wealth should be deceiued by any man, nor that any man also should haue wrong of it. For being rough with thē that were indetted to the chamber, he compelled them to pay their det, and willingly & quickely also payed them to whom the chamber ought any thing: so that the people were ashamed to see some pay which neuer thought to haue payed any thing, and on the contrary side also others payed, which neuer looked to haue had any parte of their dettes payed them. Furthermore, diuers men did before make false billes of their dets, and brought them so to be put into the cofer of the Quæstors: and many times also his predecessors were wont of fauor and frendship to receiue false messages. For whilest he was Quæstor, he neuer did passe away matters so lightly. For one day, he being doubtfull of a message that was sent vnto him, to knowe whether it was true or no: albeit diuers men did witnesse it was true, yet would he not beleue it, vntill such time as the Consulls them selues came in their owne persons to iustifie it was true, and to sweare, that it was so ordained. Now there were many vnto whom Lucius Sylla being Dictator, had appointed in his second proscription twelue thowsand siluer Drachmas for euery citizen and outlaw which they had slaine with their owne handes. These men, though euery man did hate them, and knew them to be wicked people & cruell murtherers: yet no man durst offer to be reuenged of them. Cato called these men in sute, as those that did wrongfully detaine the money of the common treasure, and compelled them to repay it backe againe: sharpely reprouing (and iustly) the wicked deuelish fact they had committed. So when they had repayed the money, they were straight accused by others for murder: & as if they had bene wrongfully condemned by one iudgement, they were brought into an other, to the great ioy of all the Romanes, who then thought they saw all the tyranny of that time rooted out, and Sylla him selfe punished. Besides all this, Catoes continuall paines and care of the treasure, was so well thought of, and liked of the people, as could be. For he was alwayes the first that came to the coffer of the treasurers, and also the last that went from thence, and was neuer wearie of any paines. Furthermore, he neuer misled to be at any assembly of the people or Senate, fearing, and being alwayes carefull, least lightly by fauor, any money due to the common wealth should be forgiuen: or else that they should abate the rent of the farmers, or that they should geue no money but to thē that had iustly deserued it. Thus hauing ridde all accusers, and also filled the coffers with treasure: he made men see, that the common wealth might be riche, without oppressing of any man. In deede at his first comming in to the office, his colleagues and companions founde him maruelous troublesome and tedious, for that they thought him too rough and seuere: howbeit they all loued him in the end, bicause he only withstoode the complaints and cries of all men against them (which complained that they would not for any mans respect or fauor let go the money of the common treasure) & was contented his companions should excuse them selues vnto their frends that were importunate, and lay the fault apon him, saying, that it was vnpossible for them to bring Cato vnto it. The last day that he went out of his office, being very honorably brought home to his house by the people: it was told him that Marcellus, being in the treasure chamber, was attempted & enuironned with many of his frends, and men of great authoritie, that were earnestly in hande with him to record a certaine gift of money, as a thing that had bene due by the common wealth. This Marcellus had bene Catoes frend euen from their childhood, & whilest Cato was in office, he did orderly execute his office with him: but when he was left alone, he was of so gentle a nature, that he would easily be intreated, and was as much ashamed to deny any man, as he was also ouertreadie to graunt euerie man that he required. Cato straight straight returned backe vpon it, and finding that Marcellus had yeelded vnto their importunacye, and recorded the gift: he caused the bookes to be brought vnto him, and did rase it out before his face, Marcellus speaking neuer a word to the contrary. After that, Marcellus brought Cato home, and neuer once repyned against that he had done, neither then, nor at any time after, but continued still friendshippe with him, as he had done before. But now, though Cato was out of his office of Quæstor, he was not without spialls of his men in the treasure chamber: who marked alwayes, and wrote what was done and passed in the treasurie. And Cato himself hauing bought the bookes of accompt for the summe of fiue talents conteyning the reuenue of the whole state of the common wealth, from Sylles time vntill the very yeare of his Quæstorshippe: he euer had them about him, and was the first man that came to the Senate and the last that went out of it. There many times the Senators tarying long before they came, he went and sate downe in a corner by him selfe, and red closely the booke he had vnder his gowne, clapping his gowne before it, and would neuer bee out of the citie on that day when he knew the Senate should assemble. After that, Pompey and his consorts perceiuing that it was vnpossible to compell Cato, and much lesse to winne or corrupt him, to fauor their vniust doings: they sought what meanes they could to keepe him from comming to the Senate, and defending certeine of his friends causes, & to occupy him some other wayes about matters of arbitrement. But Cato finding their wiles and craft, to encounter them, he tolde his friendes once for all, whom he would pleasure: that when the Senate did sit, no mans cause could make him be absent from thence. For he came not to serue the common wealth to enrich him selfe as many did, neither for any glorye or reputacion, nor yet at all aduenture: but that he had aduisedly chosen to serue the common wealth, like a iust and honest man, & therefore thought him selfe bound to be as carefull of his dutie, as the bee working her waxe in the honny combe. For this respect therefore, to performe his dutie the better, by the meanes of his friendes which he had in euery prouince belonging to the Empire of Rome: he gotte into his handes the copies of all the chiefest actes, edicts, decrees, sentences, & the notablest iudgements of the gouernors that remayned in recorde. Once Cato perceiuing that Publius Clodius a seditious Orator amongest the people, did make great sturre, and accused diuers vnto the assembly, as the Priestes and Vestall Nunnes: (amonge the which Fabia Terentia, Ciceroes wiues sister was accused) he taking their cause in hand, did so disgrace Clodius their accuser, that he was driuen to flie the citie. Cicero therefore giuing Cato thankes, Cato tolde him, that he must thanke the common wealth, not him, for whose sake onely he both sayd and did that he had done. Hereby Cato wanne him great fame. For when a certein Orator or common counseller preferred one witnes vnto the Iudges, the counseller on thother side tolde them, that one witnes was not to be credited, though it were Cato him selfe. Insomuch as the people tooke it vp for a prouerbe among them, that when any man spake any straunge and vnlikely matter, they would say: Nay, though Cato him selfe said it, yet were it not to be beleued. When on a time a certaine prodigall man had made a long oration in the Senate, in praise and commendacion of sobrietie, temperãce, & thriftines: one Annæus a Senator rising vp, said vnto him, alas, frend, what thinkest thou? who can abide to heare thee any lenger with pacience: that farest at thy table like Crassus, buildest like Lucullus, & speakest to vs like Cato? So men commonly (in sport) called them Catoes, which were graue and seuere in their wordes, and dissolute in their deedes. When diuers of his friends were in hand with him to sue to be Tribune of the people, he told them he thought it not meete at that time: for such an office (quoth he) of great authoritie as that, is not to be imployed, but like a stronge medicine in time of neede. So, the tearme and matters of lawe ceassing for that tyme, Cato went into the contry of Lvca to take his pleasure there, where he had pleasant houses: and tooke with him both his bookes & Philosophers to keepe him company. Bicause, meeting as he went, with diuers sumpters and great cariage, and a great traine of men besides, he asked them whose cariage it was: they told him it was Metellus Nepos that returned to Rome, to make sute to be Tribune. Thereuppon Cato stayed sodainely, and bethinking him selfe, commaunded his men to returne backe againe. His friends maruailing at it, he aunswered them: Doe not you know that Metellus is to be feared of him selfe, for his rashnes and folly? & now that he commeth instructed by Pompey, like a lightning he would tooke them vp for this detestable marchādise, and after his oration ended, solemnly protested by othe, that he would accuse him, & bewray his name, which had giuen money to be chosen O Consul. Howbeit he spake nothing of Syllanus, whose sister, Seruilia, he had maried: but he flatly accused Lucius Murena, that had obtained to be Cōsul with Syllanus, by meanes of his money.

Now a law being prouided, that the party accused might haue a keeper or spiall to follow the accuser, to see what he would accuse the party with, that he might the better be able to defend him selfe, knowing what should be obiected against him: Murena hauing one for him to waite vpon Cato, to consider throughly what course he tooke, when he saw that he went not maliciously to worke, but tooke a plaine common way of a iust accuser: he had so great confidence in Catoes vpright mind and integritie, that not regarding the narrow sifting of him otherwise, he did one day aske him him selfe in the market place, (or at home in his owne house) if that day he were determined to prosecute any matter against him touching his accusation. If Cato D aunswered him that he did not: then he went his way and simply beleued him. When the day Cicero defen-ded Murena against his ac-cuser Cato. came in deed that his cause was to be heard, and pleaded vnto: Cicero being Consul that yere, defending Murena, played so pleasantly with the Stoicke Philosophers, and their straunge opinions, that he made all the Iudges laughe: insomuch as Cato him selfe smiling at him, tolde them that were by him: see, we haue a pleasant Consul that makes men laugh thus. So Murena beeing discharged by this iudgement, did neuer after malice Cato for that, but so long as he remained Consul, he was alwaies ruled by his counsel in all his affaires, and continued euer to honor him, following his counsell in all thinges touching his office. Hereof Cato him selfe was cause, who was neuer rough nor terrible, but in matters of counsell, and in his orations before the people, for the maintenance onely of equitie and iustice: for otherwise, he was very ciuil & E curteous to al men. But before he entred into his Tribuneship, Cicero being yet Consul, he did The conspira-cie of Catilin against Rome. helpe him in many things touching his office, but specially, in bringing Catilins conspiracie to good ende, which was a noble act done of him. For Catilin did practise a generall commotion and sturre in the common wealth, to ouerthrowe the whole state of Rome, by ciuill discorde within Rome, and open warres abroade: who beeing discouered and ouercome by Cicero, he was driuen in the ende to flie Rome. But Lentulus, Cethegus, and many other of the accomplices of this conspiracie, blamed Catiline for his faynt and cowardly proceeding in it.
For their partes, they had determined to burne the whole citie of Rome, and to put all the Empire thereof in vprore, by straunge warres, and rebellions of forreine nations and prouin-ces. Howbeit this treason being discouered, as appeareth more largely in the life of Cicero, the F matter was referred vnto the iudgement of the Senate, to determine what was to bee done therein. Syllanus beeing the first who was asked his opinion therein, sayde, that he thought it

This oration of Ceſar ſo altered all the reſt of the Senators minds, for that they were affraid of the people: that Syllanus ſelf mended his opinion againe, and ſaid, that he ment not they ſhould put them to death, but keepe the faſt in priſon, bicauſe that to be a priſoner, was the greateſt paine a ROMANE Citizen could abide. Thus, the Senators minds being ſo ſodainly chaunged, & bent to a more fauorable ſen-

Catoes oration againſt Ceſar, touching Catilins conſpiracie.

B tence: Cato riſing vp to ſay his opinion, beganne very angrily with maruelous eloquence, grieuouſly to reproue Syllanus for chaunging his mind, & ſharply to take vp Ceſar, that vnder a populer ſemblance, & maske of ſweete ſugred words, he ſought vnder hand to deſtroy the common wealth, and alſo to terrifie and make the Senate affraid: where he him ſelfe ſhould haue bene affraid, and thinke him ſelfe happy, if he could ſcape from beeing ſuſpected, giuing ſuch apparant cauſe of ſuſpicion as he did, going about ſo openly to take the enemies and traytors of the common wealth out of the hands of iuſtice, ſeming to haue no pitie nor compaſſion of his naturall citie, of ſuch nobilitie and fame, being euen brought in maner to vtter deſtruction, but rather to lament the fortune of theſe wicked men, that it was pity they were euer borne, & whoſe death preſerued ROME from a thowſand murthers & miſchiefs. Of all the orations that

C euer Cato made, that only was kept: for Cicero the Conſul, that day had diſperſed diuers penne men in ſundry places of the Senate houſe, which had maruelous ſwift hands, and had further taught them how to make brieſe notes and abridgements, which in fewe lines ſhewed many words. For vntill that time, writers were not knowen that could by figures & ciphers expreſſe a whole ſentence and word, as afterwards they could: being then the firſt time that euer they were found out. So Cato at that time preuailed againſt Ceſar, and made them all chaunge their mindes againe, that theſe men were put to death. But that we may not leaue out a iot of his maners, as the very pattern and impreſſion of his mind: It is reported, that when Cato that day was ſo whot, and vehement againſt Ceſar, that all the Senate could but looke at them, to heare them both: a letter was deliuered Ceſar, ſent him into the houſe. Cato began preſently to ſuſpect

D it, and ſo earneſtly miſliked of it, that many of the Senators being offended, commaunded his letter ſhould be ſeene & red openly. Ceſar thereupon reached his letter vnto Cato, that ſate not farre from him. When Cato had red it, and found that it was a loue letter which his ſiſter Seruilia had written vnto Ceſar, whom ſhe loued, and had knowen: he caſt it againe to Ceſar, & ſaid, there, dronkard. After that he went on againe with his matter, which he had begon before. In fine, it ſeemeth that Cato was very vnfortunate in his wiues: for this Seruilia, as we haue ſayd, had an ill name by Ceſar. And the other Seruilia alſo, which was his ſiſter, was worſe deſamed. For ſhe being maried vnto Lucullus, one of the greateſt men of ROME, by whō ſhe had a ſonne, was in the ende put away from him, for her naughty life. But worſt of all, his owne wife Attilia alſo was not altogether cleare without ſuſpicion: For though he had two ſonnes by her, yet

E he was driuen to be diuorced from her, ſhe was ſo naught and common. After that, he maried Martia, the Daughter of Philip, which by report ſeemed to be a very honeſt gentlewoman. It is ſhe that is ſo famous amonge the ROMANES. For in the life of Cato, this place (as a fable or comedy) is diſputable, and hard to be iudged. For thus it was, as Thraſeas writeth: who referreth all to the report and credit of one Munatius, Catoes very famillier friend. Amonge many that loued Catoes vertues, and had them in admiration, ſome of them did ſhew him more what he was, then other ſome did: amongeſt the which, was Q. Hortenſius, a man of great honeſtie and authoritie. He, deſiring not onely to be Catoes friend and famillier, but alſo to ioyne with him in alliance, and by affinitie to make both their houſes one: was not abaſhed to moue him, to let him haue his Daughter Porcia in mariage, (which was Bibulus wife, & had brought him

F two children) that he might alſo caſt abroade the ſeede of goodly children, in that pleaſant fertile ground. And though to men this might ſeeme a ſtraunge mind and deſire, yet that in reſpect of nature, it was both honeſt and profitable to the common wealth, not to ſuffer a young woman in the prime of her youth, to loſe the frute of her wombe, being apt to beare children: nor alſo that he ſhould impouerish his ſonne in lawe with moe children, then one houſe needed. And further, that communicating women in this ſort from one to another, ſpecially being beſtowed apon worthy and vertuous men: that vertue ſhould thereby bee increaſed the more, being ſo diſperſed in diuers families, & the citie likewiſe ſhould be the ſtronger, by making alliances in this ſort together. And if it be ſo, q he, that Bibulus doe loue his wife ſo dearly, that he wil not depart from her altogether, then that he would reſtore her to him again, when he had a child by her, that therby he might be the more bound in frendſhip to him, by meanes of this communication of children with Bibulus ſelfe, and with him. Cato aunſwered him, that he loued Hortenſius well, and liked of his alliance: howbeit that he maruelled he would ſpeake to him to let him haue his Daughter to get children of, ſith he knew that ſhe was maried to another. Then Hortenſius altering his tale, ſtucke not to tell him his mind plainly, and to deſire his wife of him, the which was yet a young woman, and Cato had children enough. But a man can not tell whether Hortenſius made this ſute, bicauſe he ſaw Cato make no reckoning of Martia, for that ſhe was then with child by him. In fine, Cato ſeeing the earneſt deſire of Hortenſius, he did not deny him her, but told him, that he muſt alſo get Philips good wil, the father of Martia. He knowing that Cato had graunted his good wil, would not therfore let him haue his daughter, before that Cato him ſelfe by his preſence did confirme the contract & mariage with him. Though theſe thinges were done longe after, yet hauing occaſion to talke of Catoes wiues, I thought it not amiſſe to anticipate the time. Now Lentulus, and his conſorts of Catilines conſpiracie being put to death: Cæſar, to cloke the accuſations wherewith Cato charged him in open Senate, did put him ſelf into the peoples hands, and gathering the rakehells and ſeditious perſons together, which ſought to ſet al at ſix and ſeuen, he did further encorage them in their miſchieuous intent & practiſes. Whereuppon, Cato fearing leaſt ſuch rabble of people ſhould put all the common wealth in vprore & daunger: he perſwaded the Senat to winne the poore needy people that had nothing, by diſtributing of corne amongeſt them, the which was done: For the charge thereof amownted yearely vnto twelue hundred and fifty talents. This liberalitie did manifeſtly drinke vp and quench all thoſe troubles which they ſtoode in feare of. But on thother ſide, Metellus entring into his Tribuneſhip, made certen ſeditious orations and aſſemblies, & preferred a law to the people, that Pompey the great ſhould preſently be called into ITALY with his armie, that he ſhould keepe the citie by his comming, from the preſent daunger of Catilins conſpiracie. Theſe were but words ſpoken for facions ſake, but in deede the law had a ſecret meaning, to put the whole common wealth and Empire of ROME into Pompeys hands. Hereuppon the Senate aſſembled, wherein Cato at his firſt comming, ſpake ſomewhat gently, and not to vehemently againſt Metellus, as his maner was to be ſharpe vnto them that were againſt him: but modeſtly perſwaded him, and fell to intreate him in the end, and highly to extoll his houſe, for that they had alwaies taken part with the Senate and nobilitie. But Metellus therewith tooke ſuch pride & conceit of him ſelfe, that he began to deſpiſe Cato, thinking he had vſed that mildnes, as though he had beene affraide of him: inſomuch as he gaue out prowd ſpeeches againſt him, and cruell threats, that in deſpite of the Senate he would do that which he had vndertaken. Then Cato chaunging his countenaunce, his voice and ſpeech, after he had ſpoken very ſharply againſt him: in the ende he roughly proteſted, that while he liued, he would neuer ſuffer Pompey to come into ROME with his armie. The Senate hearing them both, thought neither of both well in their witts, but that Metellus doings was a furie, which proceeding of a cancred ſtomake and extreame malice, would put all in hazard: & that which Cato did, was a rauiſhment and extacy of his vertue, that made him beſide him ſelfe, contending for iuſtice and equitie. When the day came that this law ſhould paſſe by voyces of the people, Metellus fayled not to be in the market place with a worlde of ſtraungers, ſlaues, and fenſers, armed, and ſet in battell raye, beſides a number of the common people that were deſirous to ſee Pompeys returne, hoping after chaunge. Beſides all thoſe, Cæſar then being Prætor, gaue ayde likewiſe with his men, in the behalf of Metellus. On the contrary part alſo, the noble men and Senators of the citie were as angry as Cato, and ſaid it was a horrible ſhame: howbeit they were his friendes, rather in miſliking the matter, then in defending the common wealth.

A Whereuppon, all his friendes at home, and his whole family, were maruailously perplexed & sorowfull, that they both refused their meate, and also could take no rest in the night for feare of Cato. But he, as one without feare, hauing a good hart with him, did comfort his people, and bad them not sorow for him: and after he had supped, as he commonly vsed to doe, he went to bed, and slept soundly all night, till the morning that Minutius Thermus, his colleague & fellow Tribune, came & called him. So they both went together into the market place, accompanied with a very few after them: Whereuppon diuers of their friends came and met them by the way, & bad them take heede vnto them selues. When they were come into the market place, and that Cato saw the temple of Castor and Pollux full of armed men, and the degrees or steppes kept by sword players and fensers, and Metellus on the top of them set by Caesar, turning B to his friends he sayd, see I pray you the coward there, what a number of armed men he hath gotten together, against one man naked, and vnarmed. Therewithall he straight went forward with his companion Thermus vnto that place, and they that kept the degrees, opened of them selues to let him passe, but they would let no other goe vp but him selfe: But Cato with much a doe, taking Minutius by the hand, got him vp with him, and when he was come vp, he sate him downe betwixt Metellus and Caesar, to keepe them a sonder, that they should not whisper one in anothers eare. Neither of them both could tell what to say to him. Whereuppon the noble men that considered Catoes countenaunce and boldnes, wondring to see it, drew neare, and by their cryes willed him not to be affrayd, but encoraged one another to sticke by him, that stoode for defence of their libertie. So, there was a seruaunt that tooke the written law in C his hand, and would haue red it to the people: but Cato woulde not let him. Then Metellus tooke it him selfe in his handes to reade it: but Cato also snatched it out of his handes. Metellus notwithstanding, hauing it perfect without booke, would needes declare the effect of it by harte. But Thermus clapped his hande before his mouthe to keepe him that he shoulde not speake. Metellus seeing these two men bent by all meanes to keepe this law from passing, and that the people did leane on their side: he beckned to his men to goe for the armed men which were at home in his house, that they should come with terror and cryes to make them affrayd, and so they did. The people thereuppon were dispersed here and there for feare, that Cato was left alone in the market place, and they threwe stones at him from beneath. But then Murena, who had before accused Cato for buying of the Consulshippe, forsooke him not in D that daunger, but holding his longe gowne before him, cryed out vnto them beneath, that threwe at Cato, to leaue. So shewing him the daunger he had brought him selfe vnto, holding him still by the armes, he brought him into the temple of Castor and Pollux. Then Metellus seing the pulpit for orations voyded, and his enemies flying out of the market place, he thought he had wonne the gole: Whereuppon commaunding his souldiers to depart, then proceeding gently, he attempted to passe his lawe. But his enemies that fled for feare, being gathered againe together in the market place, beganne a freshe to cry out against Metellus, with greater boldnes and corage then before. Then Metellus and his adherents being affrayd and amazed, doubting that their enemies had gotten weapons, and were prouided, and therefore were the bolder: they fled, and all of them left the pulpit for orations. So, when Metellus and his E company were gonne, Cato came agayne to the pulpit for orations, and greatly commended the people for the good will they had shewed, and perswaded them to continue in their well doing. Whereuppon the common people were then against Metellus, and the Senate also being assembled gaue order, that Cato should haue better ayde then he had before, and that by all meanes possible they should resist Metellus lawe, which onely tended to moue sedition & ciuill warre in Rome. For Metellus selfe, he was yet vehemently bent to followe his attempt and enterprise: but perceiuing that his friendes were maruelously affraide of Cato, as a man whom they thought inuincible, he sodainely came into the market place, and assembling the people, told them many reasons in his oration, supposing to bringe Cato in disgrace with the people, and amongest other thinges he sayd, that he would withdraw him selfe out of this ty-F rannicall power of Catoes, and his conspiracie against Pompey, the which peraduenture the citie before it were long, should repent, for that they had shamed and defaced so noble a man. After that, he presently departed Rome, and went into Asia to informe Pompey of all this matter. Cato on thother ſide was greatly eſtemed for his doings, for that he had freed the common wealth from the great trouble of ſuch a fooliſh Tribune, and by ouerthrowing Metellus, he had alſo ſuppreſſed the power of Pompey. But he was yet much more commended, when he was againſt the Senate, who would haue noted Metellus of infamie, and depriued him of his office, the which he would not ſuffer them to doe. The common people thought him of a curteous and gentle nature, bicauſe he would not treade his enemie vnder his foote, when he had the vpper hand of him, nor be reuenged of him when he had ouercome him: but wiſe men iudged it otherwiſe, that it was wiſely done of him not to prouoke Pompey. About this time returned Lucullus from the warre, of the which it ſemed that Pompey had taken the honor & glory from him for the ending of it, & was likely alſo to haue bene put from his honor of triumph, for that Caius Memmius was his aduerſary, who layed many accuſations againſt him before the people, rather to pleaſe Pompey, then for any malice els he had towards him. But Cato, both for that Lucullus was his brother in law, and had maried his owne ſiſter Seruilia, as alſo for that he ſaw they did him wrong: reſiſted this Memmius, & defended many accuſations againſt him. So that in the end, though Memmius had labored that Cato ſhould be depriued of his office, as from a tyrannicall power: yet Cato compelled Memmius at the laſt to leaue of his accuſations, and to proſecute law no more againſt him. Thus Lucullus hauing obteined honor of triumph, did embrace Catoes friendſhip more then before, taking him for a ſure bulwarcke & defenſe againſt the power of Pompey the great. But Pompey ſhortly after returning home againe, with great honor from his conqueſts, truſting that for reſpect of his welcome he ſhould be denyed nothing at the peoples hands when he came home: ſent before vnto the Senate, to pray them for his ſake to deferre the election of the Conſuls, vntill he came to Rome, that being preſent he might fauor Piſoes ſute, ſuing to be Conſul. Thereunto the moſt part of the Senate gaue their conſent, but Cato on thother ſide was againſt it, not that the deferring of the time was a matter of ſuch importance, but to cut all hope from Pompey to goe about to attempt any newe deuiſes, inſomuch that he made the Senate chaunge opinion againe, and Pompeys requeſt was denied. Pompey being marueloſly troubled withall, and perceiuing that Cato would be againſt him in all things if he found not ſome deuiſe to winne him: he ſent for his friend Munatius, by his meanes to demaund Catoes two Neces of him which were mariable: the eldeſt for him ſelf, & the youngeſt for his ſonne. Others ſay alſo, that they were not his Neces, but his own daughters. Munatius did Pompeys meſſage, & brake the matter vnto him, his wife, & to his ſiſters, who marueloſly deſired Pompeys alliance, for the greatnes and dignitie of his perſon. But Cato making no farther delay, without other deliberation, as not greatly pleaſed with the motion, aunſwered him preſently. Munatius, goe thy way vnto Pompey againe, and tell him that Cato is not to be wonne by women, though otherwiſe I miſlike not of his friendſhip: and withall, that ſo long as he ſhall deale vprightly in all cauſes, & none otherwiſe, that he ſhall find him more aſſuredly his friend, then by any alliance of mariage: & yet, that to ſatisfie Pompeys pleaſure and will againſt his contry, he wil neuer giue him ſuch pledges. The women and his friends at that time were angry with his aunſwer & refuſall, ſaying, it was too ſtately and vncurteous. But afterwardes it chaunced, that Pompey ſuing to haue one of his friendes made Conſul, he ſent a great ſumme of money to brybe the voyces of the people, which liberalitie was noted, & ſpoken of, bicauſe the money was told in Pompeys owne garden. Then did Cato tell the women of his houſe, that if he had now bene bound by allyance of mariage vnto Pompey, he ſhould then haue bene driuen to haue bene partaker of Pompeys ſhamefull acts. When they heard what he had told them, they all confeſſed then that he was wiſer to refuſe ſuch alliance, then they were that wiſhed and deſired it. And yet, if men ſhould iudge of wiſedom, by the ſucceſſe and euent of things: I muſt needes ſay, that Cato was in great fault for refuſing of this allyance. For thereby he was the cauſe of Pompeys matching with Ceſar, who ioyning both their powers together, was the whole deſtruction of the Empire of Rome: Whereas peraduenture it had not fallen out ſo, if Cato fearing Pompeys light faultes, had not cauſed him by increaſing his power with another, to commit farre greater faultes. Howbeit thoſe thinges were yet to come. Furthermore, Pompey being at ſtarre with Lucullus, touching certain ordinances which he had made in the Realme of Pontvs, bicauſe both the one and the other would haue their ordinances to take take place: Cato fauoured Lucullus, who had open wronge. Pompey therefore seeing that he was the weaker in the Senate, tooke parte with the people, and put forthe the lawe for diuiding of the landes amongest the souldiers. But Cato stowtly resisting that lawe agayne, he put it by, and made Pompey thereby in a rage to acquaynte him selfe with Publius Clodius, the moste seditious and boldest person of all the Tribunes, and besides that, made allyance euen at that tyme with Cæsar, whereof Cato him selfe was the onely Author. Cæsar returning out of SPAYNE from his Prætorshippe, requyred the honour of tryumphe, and withall made sute to bee Consull. But beeing a lawe to the contrary, that they that sued to bee Consulls shoulde bee present them selues in the citie, and suche also as desired honour of triumphe, shoulde bee without the citie: he earnestly required the Senate, that he myght sue for the Consulshippe by his friendes. The moste parte of the Senate were willing vnto it, but Cato was flatly agaynst it. He perceyuing that the other Senatours were willing to gratifie Cæsar, when it came to him to deliuer his opinion, he spent all the whole daye in his oration, and by this pollicie preuented the Senate, that they coulde not conclude any thinge. Then Cæsar letting fall his tryumphe, made sute to be Consull, and entring the citie, ioyned friendshippe with Pompey. Hereuppon he was chosen Consull, and immediatly after maryed his Daughter Iulia vnto Pompey: and so hauing made in manner a conspyracie agaynst the common wealth betweene them selues, Cæsar preferred the lawe Agraria, for distributing the landes vnto the Citizens, and Pompey was present to mainteyne the publicacion thereof. Lucullus and Cicero on thother side taking parte with Bibulus the other Consull, did what they coulde agaynst it, but specially Cato: who fearing muche this allyance of Cæsar and Pompey, that it was a pacte and conspiracie to ouerthrowe the common wealth, sayde, that he cared not so muche for this lawe Agraria, as he feared the rewarde they looked for, who by suche meanes dyd intise and please the common people. Therewithall, the Senate were wholly of his opinion, and so were many other honest men of the people besides, that were none of the Senate, and tooke his parte: maruailing muche, and also beeing offended with Cæsars greate vnreasonablenes and importunitie, who by the authoritie of his Consulshippe did preferre suche thinges, as the moste seditiousest Tribunes of the people were wont commonly to doe, to currye fauour with the people, and by suche vile meanes sought to make them at his commaundement. Wherefore, Cæsar and his friends fearing so greate enemies, fell to open force. For to beginne withall, as the Consul Bibulus was going to the market place, there was a basket of donge powred vppon his heade: and furthermore, the Officers roddes were broken in their handes, which they caryed before him. In fine, dartes were throwen at them out of euery corner, and many of them beeing hurt, they all at length were driuen to flye, and leaue the market place. But Cato, he came laste of all, keeping his wonted pace, and often cast backe his heade, and cursed such Citizens. So, they did not onely passe this lawe Agraria by voyces of the people, but furthermore they added to it: that all the Senate shoulde bee sworne to stablishe that lawe, and bee bounde to defende the same, (if any attempted the alteracion thereof) vppon greate penalties and fines to bee sette on his heade, that shoulde refuse the othe. All the other Senators sware agaynst their wills, remembring the example of the mischiefe that chaunced vnto the olde Metellus, who was banished out of ITALY, bicause he would not sweare to suche a like lawe. Whereuppon, the women that were in Catoes house, besought him with the teares in their eyes, that he woulde yeelde and take the othe: and so did also diuers of his friendes besides. Howebeit, he that moste inforced and brought Cato to sweare, was Cicero the Orator: who perswaded him, that peraduenture he woulde bee thought vnreasonable, that beeing but one man, he shoulde seeme to mislike that, which all other had thought meete and reasonable: and that it were a fonde parte of him wilfully to put him selfe in so greate daunger, thinking to hynder a matter already paste remedie. But yet that besides all this, a greater inconuenience woulde happen, if he forsooke his contrye (for whose sake he did all these thinges) and left it a praye vnto them, which sought the vtter subuersion of the same, as if he were glad to bee ridde from the trouble of defending the common wealth. For, sayde he, though Cato haue no neede of Rome, yet Rome hath neede of Cato, and ſo haue all his friendes: of the which, Cicero ſayde he was the chiefe, and was moſte maliced of P. Clodius the Tribune, who ſought to driue him out of the contrye. It is ſayde that Cato beeing wonne by theſe like wordes and perſwaſions at home, and openly in the market place, they ſo ſofetned him, that he came to take his othe laſte of all men, but one Phaonius, a very friende of his. Cæſars harte beeing then lift vppe, for that he had brought his firſt purpoſe to paſſe: beganne nowe to preferre an other lawe, to diuide all Campania, and the contrye called Terra di Lavoro, (the lande of labour) vnto the poore needy people of Rome, and no man ſtoode againſt him but Cato. Whereuppon Cæſar made his officers to take him from the pulpit for orations, to cary him to priſon. All this made not Cato ſtowpe, nor leaue his franke ſpeeche, but as he went he ſtill ſpake againſt this edicte, and perſwaded the people to beware of them that preferred ſuche lawes. All the Senate, and the beſte ſorte of Citizens followed Cato with heauy hartes, ſhewing by their ſilence, that they were offended and angrye for the iniurye they did vnto him, beeing ſo worthy a man. Inſomuch as Cæſars ſelfe perceiued that the people were offended with it, and yet of ambition & ſtomacke, he looked alwayes when Cato would haue appealed vnto the people. So when he ſaw that Cato ment no ſuch matter, at length ouercomen with ſhame and diſhonor, he him ſelfe procured one of the Tribunes to take Cato from the Sergeaunts. In fine, all Cæſars practiſe tended to this ende, that when he had wonne the peoples fauor by ſuch lawes: they ſhould then graunt him the gouernment of all the Gavles (aſwell on this ſide, as beyond the mountaines) and all Illyria, with an armie of foure legions, for the ſpace of fiue yeares, notwithſtanding that Cato told the people before, that they them ſelues with their own voyces did ſet vppe a tyrant, that one day would cut their throats. They did alſo chuſe Publius Clodius Tribune of the people, which was of a noble houſe: a thing directly contrary to the law. But this Clodius had promiſed them, ſo that they would helpe him to baniſh Cicero out of Rome, to do all that he could for them. Furthermore, they made Calphurnius Piſo (Cæſars wifes father) and Gabinius Paulus, (a man wholly at Pompeys commaundement, as they write which knew his life and manners) Conſuls the next yeare following. Now, notwithſtanding they had the rule of the common wealth in their owne handes, and that they had wonne parte of the citie with brybes, and the other parte alſo with feare: yet they were both affraid of Cato, when they conſidered what trouble they had to ouercome him, which they did very hardly notwithſtanding, and to their great ſhame, beeing driuen to vſe force, and yet thought they ſhould neuer haue done it. Furthermore, Clodius vtterly diſpaired that he could poſſibly baniſh Cicero, ſo longe as Cato was there. So deuiſing wayes howe to doe it, when he had taken poſſeſſion of his office, he ſent for Cato, and beganne to tell him, that he thought him the honeſteſt and iuſteſt man of Rome, and that he was ready to performe it to him by deede. For, where many made ſute vnto him to be ſent into Cyprvs, to make warre with king Ptolomy: he thought none ſo worthy as him ſelfe, and therefore for the goodwill he bare him, he was very willing to offer him that pleaſure. Cato ſtrayght cryed out with open mowth, that this was a deuiſe to intrappe him, not to pleaſure him. Then Clodius prowdly and fiercely aunſwered him, well, ſeeing thou wilt not goe with good will, thou ſhalt goe then againſt thy will: and ſo he did. For at the firſt aſſemblye of the citie, he cauſed the people to graunt his commiſſion for his iorney thither: but they neyther appoynted him ſhippes, nor ſouldiers, nor any other Miniſters to goe with him, ſauing two Secretaries onely, of the which, the one of them was a very villayne and arrant theefe, and the other, one of Clodius followers. Beſides all this, as if they had appoynted him but litle to doe in Cyprvs againſt Ptolomy, he made them commaunde him after that, to goe and reſtore the outlawes and baniſhed men of the citie of Byzantivm, vnto their contrye and goodes agayne, of purpoſe onely to keepe Cato farre enoughe from Rome, whyleſt he continued Tribune. Cato beeing driuen by neceſſitie to obeye, he counſelled Cicero (whome Clodius purſued) to beware that he made no ſturre agaynſt him, for feare of bringing Rome into ciuill warre and murther for his ſake: but rather, to abſent him ſelfe, that he might an other tyme preſerue his contrye. After that, he ſent his friende Canidius before into Cyprvs, vnto Ptolomye, to perſwade

Cato committed to priſon by Cæſar.

P. Clodius, Tribune of the people. The craſty iugling betwixt Cæſar and Pompey with P. Clodius.

Cato ſent Ambaſſador into Cyprus.

A perſwade him to bee quiet without warre: declaring vnto him, that he ſhoulde nether lacke honour nor riches, for the Romanes woulde graunt him the prieſthoode of Venus in the citie of Paphos. Cato in the meane tyme remayned in the Ile of Rhodes, preparing him ſelfe there, and abyding his aunſwer. In the tyme of theſe ſturres, Ptolomy king of Ægypt, for a certen offence and diſcorde with his ſubiectes, departing out of Alexandria, ſayled towardes Rome, hoping that Cæſar and Pompey with a greate armie woulde reſtore him to his crowne and kingdome agayne. He beeing deſirous to ſee Cato, ſent vnto him, ſuppoſing he woulde come at his ſending for. Cato by chaunce was occupyed at that tyme about ſome buſines, and badde the Meſſenger will Ptolomy to come to him, if he woulde ſee him. So when Ptolomy came, he nether went to meete him, nor roſe vppe vnto him, but onely wel-

B comed him, and badde him ſitte downe. It amazed the king at the firſt, to ſee vnder ſo ſimple and meane a trayne, ſuche a ſtatelines and maieſtie in Catoes behauior. But when he hearde him boldely talke with him of his affayres, and ſuche graue talke come from him, reprouing his follye he had committed, to forſake ſuche princely pleaſure and wealth, to goe and ſubiect him ſelfe vnto ſuche diſhonour, ſuche extreame paynes, and ſuche paſſing greate giftes and preſents, as he ſhoulde throwe awaye, to ſatisfie the couetouſnes of the rulers at Rome, the which was ſo vnſatiable, that if all the Realme of Ægypt were conuerted into ſiluer to giue amonge them, it woulde ſcarce ſuffice them: in reſpect whereof, he counſelled him to returne backe with his nauye, and to reconcile him ſelfe agayne with his ſubiectes, offering him ſelfe alſo to goe with him, to helpe to make his peace. Then Ptolo-

C my comming to him ſelfe, and repenting him of his follye, knowing that Cato tolde him truely, and wiſely: he determined to followe his counſell, had not his friendes turned his mynde to the contrarye. So when Ptolomy came to Rome, and was driuen to wayte at the gates of the Magiſtrates that were in authoritie: he ſighed then, and repented his follye, for that he had not onely deſpiſed the counſell of a wiſe man, but rather the Oracle of a god. Furthermore, the other Ptolomy that was in Cyprvs (a happye turne for Cato) poyſoned him ſelfe. Cato beeing alſo informed that he lefte a wonderfull ſumme of money behynde him, he determyned to goe him ſelfe vnto Byzantivm, and ſent his Nephewe Brutus into Cyprvs, bicauſe he durſt not truſte Canidius ſo farre. Then hauing reſtored the baniſhed men vnto the peoples ſauour agayne, ſettinge agreement

D betwixt them, he returned into Cyprvs. There he founde a maruailous greate treaſure, and plate bothe of golde and ſiluer, tables, precious ſtones, hanginges, and purple ſilkes, all the which he was to make readye money of. There he tooke greate care and paynes to rayſe all thinges to the vtmoſte and deareſt pryces that coulde bee, and he him ſelfe was preſent at all, to keepe reckoning of the laſte penney. Wherefore, to bringe this to paſſe, he woulde not ſtande to the common vſe of the ſale of the cryer, but ſuſpected them all, bothe cryers, prayſers, and his owne friendes, and therefore talked him ſelfe with the prayſers, and made them ſette highe pryſes vppon euery thinge that was to bee ſolde. And thus were the moſte parte of the goodes ſolde and caryed

E awaye, at the deareſt pryces. This did maruelouſly offende the moſte of his friendes, when they ſawe that he did miſtruſte them: but Munatius ſpecially, his deareſt friende, tooke it ſo inwardely, that he thought neuer to bee friendes with him agayne. Inſomuche as in the booke Cæſar wrote agaynſt Cato, in this place he forceth moſte the accuſation agaynſt him. Munatius notwithſtanding wryteth, that he was not angrye ſo muche with Cato for that he myſtruſted him, but for a certayne diſdayne he had him ſelfe of Cato, and for the emulacion betwixt him and Canidius. For Munatius wrote a booke of Catoes deedes and ſayinges, whome Thraſeas in his hiſtorye chiefly followed. In this booke he ſheweth that he came late into Cyprvs, and was very ill lodged. And furthermore alſo, that when he woulde haue comen into Catoes houſe, they kept him out of the gates, for that Cato was buſie, doing ſome thinge with Canidius. He modeſtly complay-

F ning of it vnto Cato, had this churliſh aunſwer: ouermuch loue, ſayth Theophraſtus, oftentimes cauſeth hate. So fareth it with thee, who ouerloning me, doeſt thinke that I eſteeme thee not as thou deſerueſt, and therefore art angry with me. And for Canidius, I muſt tell thee truely, Ptolomy king of AEgypt, goeth vnto Cato.

Catoes diligence about money in Cyprus.

The enmy betwixt Cato & Munatius.

To much loue oftentymes cauſeth hate.

I doe rather employe him for his skill and faithfulnes in thinges, then any man els: for that A he hath beene with me from the beginning, and as farre as I learne, was neuer brybed, but cleane handed ſtill. Theſe wordes Cato tolde Munatius ſecretly betweene them two: but afterwardes he knewe that he had alſo reported them vnto Canidius. When he ſawe that, he would no more go and ſuppe with Cato as he was wont, and when he was alſo called to counſell, he would not come there nether. Wherefore Cato threatned him, that he would ſeaſe vp-on all his goods and cariage, as they vſe to handle them that are diſobedient vnto iuſtice. This notwithſtanding, Munatius cared not for it, but tooke ſea, and returned againe to Rome, bearing Cato grudge a long time. Then Martia, being at that time Catoes wife, ſpake with him, and were both bidden to ſupper together, vnto a friend of theirs, called Barca. Thereuppon Cato alſo arriued, and came thither, when they were all ſette at ſupper, and asked where he ſhould ſit, B Barca tolde him agayne, where it pleaſed him. Then caſting his eyes about, he ſayd he would ſitte by Munatius: and ſo fetching a compaſſe about the borde, he went and ſate by him, but offered him no friendſhippe and familiaritie all ſupper tyme. Afterwardes notwithſtanding, at the requeſt of Martia, that was earneſtly in hande with Cato for him: he wrote vnto him, and willed him to come and ſpeake with him. Munatius went to Catoes houſe in the morning, where Martia ſtayed him, and kept him companie, vntill all the reſt that came to ſalute Cato, were departed. Then Cato comming to him, embraced him in his armes, and made very muche of him. We haue the willinglier dilated this matter at length, bicauſe mens natures and manners might be diſcerned euen in theſe ſmall matters of friendſhippe priuately, Money gotten togeither by Cato in Cyprus. as otherwiſe in the greateſt publicke cauſes. Now touching Catoes commiſſion, he gotte to- C gether litle leſſe then ſeuen thowſand ſiluer talents. Furthermore, fearing the farreneſſe of the iorney he had to goe by ſea, he made diuers litle cofers, and put into euery one of them two talents, and fiue hundred Drachmas, and tyed vnto eache of them a longe rope, and a greate peece of corcke: bicauſe that if the ſhippe ſhould fortune to miſcarye, thoſe corckes might ſhewe where the cheſtes with money laye in the bottome of the ſea. Thus was all the money ſaued, ſauing a litle, and brought ſafely to Rome. Cato hauing made two bookes wherin he had noted all thinges done in his iorney, he could neither ſaue thone nor thother of them.
For one of his bondmen made free, called Philargyrus, tooke the one away: who taking ſhippe at the hauen of Cenchrees, was him ſelfe drowned, and the booke he had alſo, loſt with him.
The other booke which he him ſelfe had kept, vntill he came vnto Corfov: he lying in the D market place of the citie in his tents, which he cauſed to be ſet vppe: the Mariners being very cold in the night, made ſo great a fire, that it burnt the tents, ſtuffe, booke and all. Notwithſtanding, he brought certaine of the late king Ptolomyes ſlaues with him, who while he liued, had the charge and cuſtodie of all his treaſure and riches, the which he brought as witneſſes, to ſtoppe the mouthes of his malicious enemies, that would haue accuſed him in any thinge.
But yet the loſſe of them did grieue him, not ſo much for the greate care and paynes he had taken in ſetting downe the accompt of his charge, for the iuſtification and prooſe of his fi-delitie and good ſeruice: but alſo, for that they might haue ſerued for a good memoriall and example vnto all others, to haue bene a like carefull in their charge, as him ſelf. But the goddes denyed him this good happe. Newes beeing brought that he was come to Rome by water, E when they vnderſtood that he was at hand, by and by all the Magiſtrats, the Prieſtes, the Senate, & the moſt part of the people alſo went out to meete him by the riuers ſide: ſo that both Cato receiued into Rome with great honor, of all the people. ſides of the riuer of Tyber were full of people, and the receiuing of him in, ſeemed not inferior to the entry of a triumphe. Notwithſtanding, ſome thought him very preſumptuous, that the Conſuls and Prætors comming out to meete him, he did not ſtay his gally, but rowed ſtill vp the ſtreame (beeing in a kinges galley of ſix owers to euery bancke) and neuer ſtayed, vntill all his fleete arryued in the hauen. This notwithſtanding, when the cofers with mony were caried thorough the market place into the treaſure chamber, the people wondred to ſee ſo great a quantitie of it. And thereuppon the Senate being aſſembled, with great and honorable words they gaue Cato an extraordinary Prætorſhip, and priuiledge alſo, at any common ſports F to weare a purple gowne. Cato refuſed all theſe honours, and onely beſought the Senate to make Nicias a free man, Steward of the late diſeaſed king Ptolomy, being a witnes of his faith

A and great paynes he had taken in this seruice. Philip the father of Martia, was that yeare Consul, so that after a sorte, the authoritie of the Consul was in Cato: bicause Lentulus, colleague and fellowe Consul with Philip, did no lesse reuerence Cato for his vertues, then Philip did for his allyance with him. Furthermore, when Cicero was restored agayne from his banishment, the which Publius Clodius (beeing then Tribune of the people) had put apon him, and beeing agayne growen to great credit: he went one day into the Capitoll, in the absence of Clodius, by force to take awaye the tables which Clodius had consecrated there, in the which were comprised all his doings during the tyme he was Tribune. Thereuppon the Senate beeing assembled, Clodius did accuse Cicero of this violent facte. Cicero aunswered him agayne: that bicause Clodius was chosen Tribune, directly against the lawe, therefore all his doings were B voyde, and of no validitie. Then stoode vppe Cato, and sayde: he knewe that all that which Clodius did when he was Tribune, was scantly good and allowable, but yet if generally any man shoulde vndoe all that he had passed by that authoritie: then all that he him selfe had done likewise in Cyprvs, must of necessitie bee reuoked. For the commission that was graunted vnto him (by vertue whereof he had done many thinges) shoulde be vnlawfull: bicause the Tribune also that did graunt it him, was not lawfully chosen. And therefore, that Publius Clodius was not made Tribune agaynst the lawe, who by consent of the lawe was taken out from a noble house, and made a populer person: howebeit, if he had behaued him selfe vnduetifully in his office, as other men that happely had offended: then he was to be accused to make him mend his faulte, and not to destroye the authoritie of the officer, which in C it selfe was lawfull. After that, there fell misliking betwixt Cicero and Cato, for this counter buffe he had giuen him: and Cicero continued a long tyme after, before he did shewe him any countenaunce of friendshippe as he had at other tymes done. But afterwardes they were reconciled together agayne, by this occasion. Pompey and Crassus hauing bene with Cæsar to talke with him (who for that purpose came out of Gavle beyond the Alpes) made an agreement there betwixt them, to demaund the second Consulship together, and when they had it, then to proroge Cæsars gouernment for fiue yeares more, and also they woulde haue the best prouinces and greatest, for them selues, with great armies, and money enough to paye them with. This was in deede a playne conspiracie to deuide the Empire of Rome betweene D them, and vtterly to ouerthrow the state of the common wealth. At that time there were many noble men, which came to make sute for the Consulship. But when they sawe Pompey and Crassus offer to make sute for it, all the reste gaue ouer, but Lucius Domitius that had maryed Porcia, Catoes sister: through whose perswasion he woulde not relinquishe his sute, considering that it was not the office onely of the Consulship that was the chiefest matter of importance, but the libertie of the Senate and people. Straight there ranne a rumor through the most parte of the people, that they were not to suffer Pompeys power to be ioyned with Crassus, by meanes of this office: for then his authoritie woulde bee too great and stronge, and therefore, that of necessitie one of these two were to bee denyed. For this cause therefore, the good men tooke Domitius parte, and did encourage him to goe on with his sute, assuring him of ayde vnder hande of diuers, which durst not bee seene openly for feare of those two E great men, who at the daye of the election would procure him voyces in his fauour. Pompey and Crassus mistrusting this, made Domitius bee sette vppon, going with torche light before daye into the fielde of Mars, where the election was alwayes made: and first striking the torche bearer that went before him, they hurt him so sore, that he fell downe deade at his feete. Then they layed at the rest in like case, who finding them selues cruelly hurt, ranne awaye euery man of them, and left Domitius and Cato post alone. But Cato, notwithstanding he was hurt in one of his armes, still helde Domitius fast, and prayed him to tary, and not to leaue to defende the libertie of their contrie, agaynst tyrants, which playnely shewed after what manner they woulde gouerne, sithe by suche wicked meanes they aspyred to tyrannicall gouernment. All this notwithstanding, Domitius woulde tarye no lenger, but betooke F him to his legges, and ranne home. Thus were Crassus and Pompey without denyall proclaymed Consuls. Cato neuer yeelded therefore, but came and sued to bee Prætor, bicause that thereby he might yet make it some strength and countenaunce to him against their Consul-

Why Cato sued to be Prætor.

ſhippe, that beeing no priuate perſon, he ſhoulde haue ſome better authoritie to reſiſt them A that were the chiefeſt perſons. But they fearing, that the Prætorſhippe by the eſtimation of Cato, woulde come to equall their authoritie of the Conſulſhippe: firſt aſſembled the Senate (the moſt parte of the Senators not hearing of it) and in that aſſemblye cauſed the Senate to decree: that all ſuche as were choſen Prætors, ſhoulde preſently goe to their charge, not attending the tyme and libertie appoynted by the lawe, during which tyme men might accuſe thoſe which had bought the voyces of the people with money. Then hauing by this culler and decree ſette yll doers at libertie, without feare of puniſhment, they pretending to vſe corruption, did preferre ſome of their owne Miniſters to make ſute for the Prætorſhippe, them ſelues giuing money to corrupt the people, and beeing preſent alſo at the election. But notwithſtanding all theſe practiſes, the vertue and reputacion of Cato ouercame them. For B the people had him in ſo great reuerence, that they thought it too ſhamefull a parte to ſell Cato by voyces, who deſerued rather to bee hyered to take the Prætorſhippe apon him. Then Cato put from the Prætorſhip by Pompey. the firſt Tribe beeing called to giue their voyces, declared him Prætor. Pompey ſeeing that, ſtraight brake of the aſſemblye, making a ſhamefull lye, telling that he heard it thunder: the which the Romanes doe maruelouſly deteſt, and will conclude nothing when it thundereth. Howebeit afterwardes they gaue more money, then they had done before, and thereby draue awaye the chiefeſt men out of the fielde of Mars, and by practiſe obtayned, that Vatinius was choſen Prætor for Cato. And the reporte went, that they that had ſo wickedly giuen their voyces, feeling them ſelues pricked in conſcience, fledde immediatly out of the fielde: and the honeſt men that remayned, were both very ſory and angrie, for the iniurie C they had offered Cato. At that tyme one of the Tribunes keeping an aſſemblye of the citie, Cato ſtoode vppe, and tolde (as if he had prophecied) before them all, what woulde happen to the common wealth by theſe practiſes, and ſtirred vppe the people agaynſt Pompey, and Cæſar, ſaying: that they were giltye of thoſe thinges, and therefore procured them to bee done, bicauſe they were affrayde that if Cato had beene Prætor, he would too narrowly haue ſifted out their deuiſes. In fine, Cato going home to his houſe, had more companye to wayte vppon him alone, then all the other Prætors that had beene choſen. When Caius Trebonius, Tribune of the people, had preferred a lawe for the deuiding of the prouinces vnto the newe Conſuls, Spayne and Africke vnto the one, and Ægypt and Syria vnto the other, with full power to make warre as they thought good bothe by ſea and lande: all other D men hauing no hope to keepe it backe, did let it alone, and ſpake nothing to contrarye it.
Cato was againſt the law for the prouinces of Pompey and Craſſus. Then Cato getting vppe into the pulpit for orations, before the people beganne to giue their voyces, coulde hardely haue two howers ſpace to ſpeake: but at length, they perceyuing that he delayed tyme by foretelling thinges to come, woulde ſuffer him to ſpeake no longer, but ſent a Sergeaunt to him, and plucked him by force out of the pulpit. But when he was beneath, and cryed out notwithſtanding, and diuers gaue good eare vnto him: the Serge-aunt went to him agayne, and tooke him, and caryed him out of the market place. Howebeit the Officer had no ſooner left him, but he went ſtrayght towardes the pulpit for orati-ons, and there cryed out more vehemently then before, and willed the people to haue an eye to ayde the libertie of their common wealth, which went to ruine. When he oftentymes toge- E ther did this, Trebonius the Tribune being madde withal, commaunded his Sergeaunt to cary him to priſon. The people followed him hard notwithſtanding, to heare what he ſayd vnto them. Whereuppon Trebonius fearing ſome ſturre, was forced to commaund his Sergeaunt to let Cato goe. So Cato draue of all that day without any matter concluded. The next morning notwithſtanding, the contrary faction hauing partly put the Romanes in feare, and wonne the other parte alſo by fayre wordes and money, and by force of armes likewiſe kept Aquilius, one of the Tribunes, from comming out of the Senate: and after they had alſo violently driuen Cato out of the market place, for ſaying that it thundred, and hauing hurt many men, and alſo ſlayne ſome out of hande in the market place: in the ende they forcibly paſſed the decree by voyces of the people. Many beeing offended therewith, went a company of them F together to plucke downe Pompeys images: but Cato would not ſuffer them. And afterwardes alſo, when they preferred an other law for the prorogacion of the prouinces & armies which

A Cæsar demaunded: Cato would speake no more to the people to hinder it, but protested vnto Pompey himselfe, that he saw not how he plucked Cæsar apon him, and that he should feele the weight of his force before he looked for it: and then when he could neither suffer nor remedy it, he would euen cast his burden and him selfe apon the common wealth, and too late would remember Catoes warnings, which were priuately as profitable for Pompey, as openly iust and reasonable for the cõmon wealth. Cato vsed many of these perswasions sundry times vnto him, but Pompey neuer made accompt of them: for he woulde not be perswaded that Cæsar would euer chaunge in that sorte, and besides he trusted too much to his owne power and prosperitie. Furthermore, Cato was chosen Prætor for the next yeare following, in the which it appeared (though he ministred iustice vprightly) that he rather defaced and impaired the maiestie B and dignitie of his office, then that he gaue it grace and countenaunce by his doings: for he would oftentimes go a foote barelegged, and without any coate, vnto his Prætors chaire, and there geue sentence of life and death, otherwhiles of men of great account. And some report, that he would geue audience when he had dyned, and dronke wine: but that is vntrue. Now Cato perceiuing that the citizens of Rome were marred by bribes and gifts of those, which aspired vnto offices, and that the people made it an arte and facultie to gaine by: to roote this vice altogether out of the common wealth, he perswaded the Senate to make a law, that such as hereafter should be chosen Consulls or Prætors, should (if there were no man to accuse them) come and offer them selues before the iudges, and taking their othe, should truely declare what meanes they had vsed to attaine to their office. This offended the suters for the C offices, but muche more the mercenarie multitude. Whereuppon, a great number of them went in a morning together where he kept his audience, and all cried out vpon him, reuiled him, and threw stones at him: insomuch as they that were there, were forced to flie thence, and him selfe also was driuen out of the place by the prease of people, and had much a doe to get to the pulpit for orations, where standing on his feete, he presently pacified the tumult of the people, by the boldnes and constancie of his countenaunce only. Then when all was pacified by the present perswasions he vsed, aptly spoken to purpose for the instant, they geuing attentiue eare, without sturre or vprore. The Senate geuing him great commendacion therefore, he told them roundly and plainly: but I haue no cause to praise you, to leaue a Prætor in such daunger of his life, offering no aide to helpe him. But the suters for the offices, they D were in a maruelous case: for one way, they were affrayed to geue money to buy the peoples voyces, and on thother side, they were affraied also if any other did it, that they should go without their sute. So they were all agreed together, euery man to put downe twelue Myriades & a halfe a peece, and then they should make their sute iustly & vprightly: and whosoeuer were taken fauty, and that had otherwise made his way by corruption, that he should lose the money he had layed downe. This agreement being concluded betwene them, they chose Cato (as it is reported) for their arbitrator, and keeper of all the same money. This match was made in Catoes house, where they all did put in caution or sureties to aunswere the money: the which he tooke, but would not meddle with the money. The day being come, Cato assisting the Tribune that gouerned the election, and carefully marking howe they did geue their voyces: he E spied one of the suters for the office breake the accord agreed vpon, and condemned him to pay the forfeiture vnto the rest. But they greatly commending his iustice and integritie, forgaue the forfeiture, thinking it punishment enough vnto him that had fofeited, to be condemned by Cato. But therby Cato procured him selfe the displeasure of the other Senators, for that he seemed therein to take apon him the power and authoritie ouer the whole court, and election. For there is no vertue, whereof the honor and credit doth procure more enuy, then iustice doth: bicause the people doe commonly respect and reuerence that, more then any other. For they doe not honor them as they doe valliant men, nor haue them in admiration, as they do wise men: but they loue and trust them better. As for the two first, the one they are affrayed of, and the other they distrust: beside, they suppose that valliancy and wisdom comF meth rather by the benefite of nature, then of our intent and choyce, esteeming wisedome, as a readines of conceit, and fortitude, a presence and courage of the minde. For euery man may be iust that will, and therefore iniustice is of all other vices most shamefull: for it is a wil-full and malicious defaut, and therefore can not be excuſed. Loe this was the cauſe why all the noble men in manner were againſt Cato, as though he only had ouercome them. Pompey, he thought that the eſtimacion of Cato was altogether the diſcountenaunce of his power and greatneſſe, and therefore did dayly raiſe vp many railers againſt him. Of them Publius Clodius that ſeditious Tribune, who was againe fallen in frendſhip with Pompey: he accuſed Cato, and cried out vpon him, how he had robbed the common wealth of a wonderfull treaſure, by his commiſſion in CYPRVS: and that he was enemy vnto Pompey, bicauſe he did refuſe to marry his daughter. Cato thereto made aunſwere, that he had brought more golde and ſiluer out of CYPRVS, into the treaſure of ROME, without the allowance of either horſe or ſouldier: then Pompey had done with all his triumphes and warres, with the which he had troubled all the world. And moreouer, that he did neuer ſeeke alliance with Pompey, not that he thought him vnworthie of it, but bicauſe he ſaw he delt not as vprightly in the common wealth as he him ſelfe did. I, ſayd he, haue refuſed a prouince offred me when I came out of my Prætorſhippe: but Pompey hath taken ſome by force, and geuen away vnto others. And to conclude, he lent Cæſar not long ſince, an armie of ſix thowſand men to ſerue him in the warres in GAVLE: the which he neuer required of vs, nor Pompey graunted them him by our conſent. But we ſee, that ſo many armies, armors and weapon, ſo many men and horſes, by common pleaſures of our priuate citizens, geuen and lent at our charge. And Pompey him ſelfe reſeruing onely the name of Emperour, and Lieutenaunt generall, aſſigneth ouer his armies and prouinces to the gouernment of others, whileſt he him ſelfe beſiegeth here the walls of the citie, with ſeditious & tumultuous election of officers, craftily vnderminding therby the ſtate of the common wealth, to bring all to confuſion, that he him ſelfe might be abſolute Prince, and rule alone. Thus was he reuenged of Pompey. Among Catoes frends, he had one called Marcus Faonius, ſuch a one as Apollodorus PHALERIAN was ſayd to be in old time, vnto Socrates, who did counterfeate to be an other him ſelfe, in doing all thinges as he did. This man would be farre out of reaſon, and paſſionate in his talke, ſtorming like a dronkard. He one yere made ſute to be Ædilis, but he was reiected. Howbeit Cato that furthered his ſute, marked, that the tables wherein the voyces were wrytten, were all one hande. So, he finding out the falſehoode, appealed thereuppon vnto the Tribunes, and made the election voyde for that time. After that Faonius was created Ædilis, Cato did helpe him forth in all the other charges of his office, and ſpecially in ſetting foorth playes in the Theater, which are cuſtomably done at the comming in of euery ſuch new officer, to geue the people paſtime: and gaue vnto the common players and dauncers in thoſe playes, no golden crownes, as other Ædiles did, but crownes of wilde oliue twigges, as they commonly vſe in GRÆCE at the Olympian games. And where others gaue vnto the poore rich gifts, he gaue the GRÆCIANS leekes, lettiſes, radiſhes, and peares: and vnto the ROMANES, they had earthen pottes full of wine, porke, figges, cowcombres, and fagots of wodde of ſmall value. Inſomuch as ſome thought ſcorne of thē they were ſo meane, others were verie glad of them, ſeeing that Cato which was ſeuere and hard of nature, had a doing in them, and by litle and litle they turned this auſteritie of his into pleaſure. In fine, Faonius him ſelfe ſitting downe amongeſt the people, which looked apon the players, clapped his hands for ioy at Cato: and cried out to him, that he ſhould geue them good rewardes that played well, alluring them alſo about him to doe the like, and told them that he had made Cato the whole ruler of thoſes ſportes. At the ſelfe ſame time, Curio, Faonius colleague and companion in the office of Ædilis, had likewiſe goodly playes in an other Theater: but all the people forſooke his, and went to ſee Faonius playes, who ſate among them like a priuate man, and Cato as the maiſter of the playes. Cato did this in ſcorne and mockerie, of vaine charge and expences, which men are wont to beſtow in ſuch trifles, ſhewing thereby, that whoſoeuer will make any playes, he ſhould make the charge but a ſport alſo, furniſhing it only with a conuenient grace, but with no vaine expence or charge about ſuch a trifle. Shortly after, when Scipio, Hypſeus and Milo, ſued all three together to be Conſuls, not only by briberie of money (a common fault then in ſuing for any of the offices in the common wealth) but by plaine force of armes, ſlaying and killing as in a ciuill warre, they were ſo deſperat and inſolent: ſome preferred a lawe, that they ſhould make Pompey Preſident in theſe elections, bicauſe men ſhould moue

A moue their ſute after a lawfull ſorte. But Cato ſtraight was againſt it, ſaying, that the law could haue no ſafety by Pompey, but Pompey might haue ſafety by the lawe. Notwithſtanding, when he ſawe this trouble continewe of a long time, without any Conſuls in Rome, and that dayly there were three campes in the market place, that it was almoſt impoſſible to preuent the miſchiefe at hand, and to ſtay that it ſhould goe no further: then he thought it better, that the Senate of their owne good willes, rather then by compulſion, ſhould put the gouernment of the ſtate into Pompeis hands alone, chooſing the leſſer euill, to withſtand the greater, and ſo to yeeld to the abſolute gouernment, without conſtraint, which the ſedition would bring it vnto. Therefore Bibulus Catoes frend & kinſeman, made a motion to the Senate, that they would chooſe Pompey ſole Conſul. For, ſayd he, either the common wealth ſhall be well gouerned by B him, or elſe Rome ſhall ſerue an ill Lord. Cato then riſing vp, beyonde all mens expectacion confirmed Bibulus opinion, and ſayd: that the citie were better to haue one ſoueraine Magiſtrate then none, and that he hoped Pompey could geue preſent order for the pacifying of this confuſion, and that he would be carefull to preſerue the citie, when he ſawe that they truſted him with the gouernment thereof. Thus was Pompey by Catoes meanes choſen ſole Conſull. Pompey was created ſole Conſull, by Catoes ſentenes. Then he ſent for Cato to come to his gardens to him, which were in the ſuburbes of the citie. Cato went thither, and was receiued with as great honor & curteſie of Pompey, as could be deuiſed: and in thend, after he had geuen him great thankes for the honors he had done him, he prayed him to afford him his aduiſe and counſell in his gouernment. Cato anſwered him thus, that he had not ſpoken any thing before that time in reſpect of any ill will he bare him; C nether that he deliuered this laſt opinion of his in reſpect of his frendſhippe, but wholly for the common wealthes ſake: howbeit otherwiſe, that for his owne priuate affaires, if he thought good to vſe his aduiſe, whenſoeuer it pleaſed him to aske his opinion, he would tell him the beſt he could. But for common cauſes, that he would alwayes tell what he thought, though he neuer asked him: and in fine, he performed all he ſayd. For firſt of all, when Pompey did let grieuous penalties & new fines apon their heades, which had bought the peoples voyces for money: Cato counſelled him to prouide for thinges to come, and to let that alone which was already paſt. For ſayd he, it is a hard thing to determine any certaine time, in the which a man ſhould ſeeke to reforme the faults that are paſt: and furthermore, if the puniſhments appointed were newer then the offences committed, then they ſhoulde doe wrong vnto them that D were already accuſed, to puniſh them by a new law which they had not offended. Afterwards alſo, certaine men of good calling (Pompeis frends) being accuſed, Cato perceiuing that Pompey grew remiſſe, and yeelded in many things: he ſharply reproued, and reformed him. Furthermore, where Pompey had by law taken away the praiſes which were wont to be ſpoken of the offenders that were accuſed: he him ſelfe notwithſtanding hauing wrytten an oration in the praiſe of Munatius Plancus, ſent it vnto the Iudges, whileſt his cauſe was a hearing. Cato being one of the Iudges at that time, ſtopped his eares with both his hands, and would not haue it red. Wherefore Plancus refuſed him for one of his Iudges, after his cauſe was pleaded vnto: howebeit he was condemned notwithſtanding. To conclude, Cato was ſuch a griefe and trouble vnto them that were accuſed, that they coulde not tell well howe to deale with him.
E For, once they durſt not lette him be any of their Iudges, neither could they well alſo refuſe him. For there were many that were condemned, which refuſing Cato, ſeemed vnto ſhers that they were giltie: & many alſo were ſhamefully reproued, bicauſe they would not accept Cato for their Iudge, when he was offered them. Thinges proceeding in this ſorte at Rome, Ceſar remained in Gavle with his armie, where he made warres: neuertheleſſe he wanne him frends ſtill in Rome, by gifts and money, and made him ſelfe very ſtrong. Now appeared Catoes predictions and forewarnings true vnto Pompey, and began to quicken his ſpirits which had ſlept ſo long, and made him then to conſider of the daunger, the which before he could not be perſwaded to beleue. But perceiuing his ſlackenes and feare withall, doubting how to proceede: to preuent Ceſars practiſes, Cato determined to ſue to be Conſull, with intent either Cato ſued to be Conſull, to reſiſt Ceſar.
F to make him leaue his army, or elſe to finde out the practiſe he entended. Catoes competitors, they were both of the very honeſt men alſo, of the which, Sulpitius had receiued great honor & preferrement by Catoes credit and authoritie in reſpect whereof, many thought that it was ſcant honeſtly done of Sulpitius, to ſhew himſelfe ſo vnthankfull, as to ſtand againſt Cato in this ſute. Howbeit Cato neuer complained of the matter, but ſayd, that it was no maruell he would geue place to no man in that, ſith it was the greateſt good happe that euer came vnto him. This notwithſtanding he perſwaded the Senate to make a law, that from thence forth, ſuch as ſued for any office, they ſhould them ſelues be ſuters to the people, and not preferre their ſute by others. This cauſed the people to be more offended with him, then before, bicauſe thereby he did not only take away their fingering of money, which they got by their voyces in elections: but tooke from them the meanes they had alſo to pleaſure many, bringing them now into pouertie and contempt. He therefore hauing no face to flatter the people and to currie fauor with them, but rather ſticking to his graue maner and modeſt life, then to ſeeke the dignitie of a Conſul by ſuche meanes: made ſute him ſelfe in perſon, and would not ſuffer his frends to take the ordinary courſe which might win the peoples harts, whereupon he was put from his Conſulſhippe. This denyall was wont not only to haue made the parties refuſed, very ſorowfull, but their frendes and kinſemen alſo greatly aſhamed a long time after. Howbeit Cato made no reckoning of that, but went the next morning, and played at tennis with his frends in the field of Mars, and after he had dyned, walked againe in the market place, as his maner was, without ſhooes on his feete, and coate. But Cicero blamed him much for that, bicauſe the common wealth requiring then ſuch a Conſul as he, he had not carefully endeuored him ſelfe by curteſie and gentle meanes to winne the fauor of the people, neither woulde euer after make ſute for it, although at an other time he ſued to be Prætor. Thereunto Cato aunſwered, that for the Prætorſhip, he was not denyed it by the good will of the people, but rather for that they were bribed with money. And for the election of the Conſuls, where there was no deceit vſed, he knew plainly he went without it, for his maners which the people miſliked: the which he thought were no wiſe mans parte to chaunge for any mans pleaſure, nor yet by making the like ſute again, to hazard the refuſall. Furthermore, Cæſar making warre with very ſtowt nations, & hauing with no ſmall daunger & trauell ſubdued them: and hauing alſo ſet vpon the Germaines, with whom the Romanes were at peace, and alſo ſlaine three hũdred thowſand perſons: his frends made ſute that the people ſhould do ſolemne ſacrifice to geue thankes vnto the gods. But Cato in open Senate was of opinion, that they ſhould deliuer Cæſar into their handes, whome he had iniured, to receiue ſuch puniſhment as they thought good: to thend the whole offence, for the breach of peace, might be caſt vpon him, that the citie might be no partaker of it, ſith they could not do withall. Neuertheleſſe, ſayd he, we are to doe ſacrifices vnto the goddes, to geue them thankes, for that they turned not the reuenge of the fury and raſhnes of the Captaine, apon our poore ſouldiers which were in no fault, but haue pardoned the common wealth. Cæſar being aduertiſed thereof, wrote a letter vnto the Senate, contayning many accuſations againſt Cato. The letter being red, Cato roſe, not as a man put in a chafe with choller, nor pricked with enuie, but coldly and quietly (as if he had long before premeditated what he would ſay) declared that the accuſations which Cæſar heaped againſt him in his letters, were but pretie mockes and fleytes which he had gathered together to make the people mery withall. But on thother ſide, when he beganne to vnrippe his whole intents and practiſes from the beginning, not as if he had bene his enemie, but rather a confederate with him in his conſpiracie, declaring that they were not the Germaines, nor the Gaules, which they were to be affrayed of, but of him ſelfe, if they were wiſe: he thereupon ſo offended the Senate, and made ſuch ſturre among them, that Cæſars frends repented them they had cauſed his letters to be red in the Senate, giuing Cato thereby occaſion iuſtly to complaine of Cæſar, & to alleage much good matter againſt him. At that time therefore there was nothing decreed in the Senate againſt Cæſar, but this was ſayed onely, that it were good reaſon to let him haue a ſucceſſor. Then Cæſars frendes made ſute that Pompey ſhoulde put away his army, and reſigne vp the prouinces he kept, or elſe that they ſhould compell Cæſar no more then him to doe it. Then Cato opened his mouth, and ſayd, the thing was now come to paſſe, which he had euer told them of, and that Cæſar came to oppreſſe the common wealth, openly turning the armie againſt it, which deceitfully he had obtained of the ſame. All this preuailed not, neither could he thereby winne any thing of the Senate, bicauſe the people fauored Catoes opinion againſt Cæſar.

Cato inueyeth againſt Cæſar.

A nored Cæsar, and would alwayes haue him great: for the Senate did beleue all that he fayed, but for all that they feared the people. When newes was brought that Cæsar had wonne the citie of ARIMINVM, and was comming on with his armie towardes ROME: then euery man looked apon Cato, and the people and Pompey confeſſed, that he only from the beginning had found out the marke Cæsar ſhot at, and had hit the white of his ſlie deuiſe. Then ſayd Cato vnto them, if you would haue beleued me, my Lordes, and followed my counſell: you ſhould not now haue bene affrayd of one man alone, neither ſhould you alſo haue put your only hope in one man. Pompey aunſwered thereunto, that Cato in deede had geſſed more truely, howbeit that he alſo had delt more frendly. Thereupon Cato gaue counſell, that the Senate ſhould referre all vnto Pompeys order: for, ſayd he, they that can doe great miſchiefe, knowe alſo howe B to helpe it. Pompey perceiuing that he had no army conuenient about him to tary Cæsars comming, and that the men alſo which he had, were but faint harted: he forſooke the citie. Cato being determined to goe with him, ſent his younger ſonne before vnto Munatius, which laye in the contrie of the BRVTIANS, and tooke his eldeſt ſonne with him. Now, bicauſe he was to prouide a ſtay and gouernor of his houſe and daughters, he tooke Martia againe, which was left a widowe and verie riche, for that Hortenſius dying, made her his heire of all that he had. Therein Cæsar vpbraydeth Cato much, reprouing his couetouſnes to marry for goodes. For, ſayd he, if he had neede of a wife, why then did he before graunt her vnto an other? If he had no neede of a woman, why then did he take her afterwards againe? Vnleſſe ſhe were before a bayte vnto Hortenſius, to keepe her whileſt ſhe was young, that he might haue her againe C when ſhe was riche. But againſt that, me thinkes it is ſufficient to recite theſe verſes of Euripides:

Vnlikelyhoodes firſt I vvill diſproue. For vvhy? vvhat man can ſay, That euer feare made Hercules to turne his face avvay?

For I take it to be all one, to reproue Hercules cowardlines, and Catoes couetouſnes. But if his mariage be to be reproued, peraduenture it is in an other ſorte. For ſo ſoone as he had maried Martia againe, he left his houſe and his daughters to her gouernment, and followed Pompey. But after that time, men reporte that he neuer polled his head, clipped his beard, nor ware any garland, but to his dying day, lamented, and bewailed in his hart, the miſerie and calamitie of his contrie, whether they had victorie, or were ouercome. So hauing the prouince of D SICILE allotted to him, he went vnto SYRACVSA. There vnderſtanding that Aſinius Pollio was arriued at MESSINA, with men of warre from his enemies: Cato ſent vnto him, to knowe wherefore he came thither. Pollio againe asked of him, who was the cauſer of all this warre. Againe, when Cato was aduertiſed that Pompey had forſaken ITALIE, & that he lay in campe beyond the ſea, by the citie of DYRRACHIVM, then he ſayd, he ſaw a maruelous great chaunge and inconſtancie in the prouidence of the goddes: that when Pompey did all things beyond reaſon, and out of courſe, he was inuincible: and now that he ſought to preſerue his contrie, he ſaw he lacked his former good happe. Nowe he knewe he was ſtrong enough at that time, to driue Aſinius Pollio out of SICILE if he would: but bicauſe there came a greater aide vnto him, he would not plague that Iland, with the miſerie of warre. Then after he had aduiſed the SY- E RACVSANS to take the ſtronger part, and to looke to their ſafety: he tooke the ſea and went towards Pompey. When he was come vnto him, he did alwaies coũſel him to prolong the warre, hoping ſtill of ſome treaty of peace: & would in no caſe they ſhould come to fight any battell, where the weaker parte ſhould of neceſſity be put to the ſword, by the ſtronger. Therefore he perſwaded Pompey and the counſellers about him, to eſtabliſhe certaine lawes to this effect. That they ſhould ſacke no citie in this warre, the which belonged vnto the Empire of ROME: and alſo, that they ſhould kill no citizen of ROME, but in furie of battell, when their ſwordes were in their hands. Therby he wanne him ſelfe great honor, and brought many men to take Pompeys parte, by the lenity and clemency he vſed vnto them that were taken. Thereupon Cato being ſent into ASIA, to aide them that had commiſſion to preſſe ſhippes & men of warre, F he tooke his ſiſter Seruilia with him, and the boy which Lucullus had by her: for all the time of her widowhoode, ſhe had followed Cato, and thereby had worne out her ill name ſhe had before, ſith they ſaw ſhe had ſo willingly geuen her ſelfe to follow him in his flying, and contented her ſelfe with his ſtraight maner of life. This notwithſtãding Ceſar did not let to ſhame her to Cato. Pompeys Captaines had no neede of Cato any where, but at the RHODES. For he wanne the people there with his curteous vſage & perſwaſion, leauing with them Seruilia and her litle ſonne, and went from thence to Pompeys campe, who had leauied a great armie both by ſea and land. There did Pompey moſt of all diſcouer his minde and intent. For firſt he ment to haue geuen Cato the charge of the armie by ſea, which were aboue fiue hundred ſhippes of warre, beſides an infinite number of foyſtes & pinaſes, & ſuch ſmall bottomes vncouered: but ſodainly cõſidering better of it (or poſſibly being informed by ſome of his frends, that al Catoes regard & counſell in matters of gouernment was, to deliuer ROME from tyranny, & that if he had ſo great a charge vnder him, Ceſar being once ouercome, he would alſo force Pompey to leaue his army, & ſo make him ſubiect to the law) he chaunged his minde, notwithſtanding he had already moued it to Cato, & leauing him, gaue Bibulus the charge of all his army by ſea. But Cato therefore ſhewed no leſſe good will vnto Pompey, then before. For it is reported, that in a certaine skirmiſh & cõflict before the city of DYRRACHIVM, Pompey encoraging his ſouldiers, & commaunding euery Captaine alſo to do the like in his quarter: the ſouldiers gaue but faint eare vnto them, & made no manner of ſhow of men whoſe harts had bene any whit the more encoraged thereby. But when Cato after them all came and told them (as the time ſerued) the reaſon of Philoſophie, and the effect of libertie, manhoode, death, and honor, and that with a great vehement affection: and laſt of all ending his oration, calling apon the gods, turning his ſpeache vnto them, as if they had bene preſent to haue ſeene how valliantly the ſouldiers fought for the libertie of their contry: they gaue ſuch a luſtie crye, and had ſuch a braue conceite & vehement deſire to fight like men, that all the Captaines were filled with good hope, and ſo led them to battell, where they gaue ſuch a cruell charge and fierce onſet apon their enemies, that they ouerthrewe them, and put them that day to flight. Howebeit Ceſars good fortune tooke the finall ende of this victorie from Pompey, by his ouergreat feare and miſtruſt: who could not tell how to take the benefit of his victorie, as we haue wrytten more amply in his life. But when all the reſt reioyced that they had done ſo noble an exployte, & made their vawnts of the great aduantage they had of their enemies: Cato to the contrarie bewailed the calamitie of his contrie, and lamented that curſed ambicion which cauſed ſo many good and valliant citizens of one ſelfe citie, ſo to kill and murther one an other. After this ouerthrowe, Ceſar taking his way into THESSALIE, Pompey raiſed his campe to followe him, and leauing a great power at DYRRACHIVM, of men, armor, munition and frends: he gaue Cato the charge of them all, and fifteene enſignes of footemen beſides. The which he did for the feare and miſtruſt he had of him, being aſſured, that if by ill fortune he ſhould loſe the battell, he knew well enough that he could not commit them to a truſtier man then he: but on thother ſide if he wanne the victory, he douted ſore that he could not commaund as he would, where Cato was. There were alſo many other noble men, as a man would ſay, caſt away, and left at DYRRACHIVM, with Cato. In fine, the ouerthrow of the battell at Pharſalia being blowen abroad, Cato reſolued with himſelfe if Pompey were dead, that he would paſſe ouer all his men into ITALIE, and then like a baniſhed man would him ſelfe alone wander as farre as he coulde from the tyrannie: and contrarily, if he were aliue, that then he would keepe his army together for him, as long as he could. With this determination, he paſſed ouer the ſea into the Ile of CORFV, where Pompeys armie by ſea lay. There Cato finding Cicero, he would haue ſurrendered vp his charge vnto him, as to a man of greater dignitie, for that he had bene Conſul, and Cato only but Prætor. Howbeit Cicero would in no wiſe receiue it, but returned immediatly into ITALY. Cato then perceiuing that Pompey the younger (ſonne vnto Pompey the great) of a raſh & hawty minde, would haue puniſhed all them that went into ITALIE, and left the armie by ſea, and that ſpecially he was bent firſt of all to begin with Cicero: Cato reproued him priuately for it, ſo that he certainly ſaued Ciceroes life, and many other moe beſides. Now Cato ſuppoſing that Pompey the great had ſaued him ſelfe in ÆGYPT, or in AFRICKE, he determined to take the ſeas, to meete him with all his men: but before he tooke ſhippe, he gaue all men leaue to depart that were not willing to follow him. Cato being arriued in AFRICKE, ſayling vp & downe the coaſt there, he met with Sextus, the youngeſt ſonne of Pompey, who firſt told him, that his father

Cato went into Africke.

A father was slaine in Ægypt: when the souldiers heard it, they tooke it very heauely, and not one of them after the death of Pompey the great, would serue vnder any other Captaine then Cato. He therupon being ashamed, & thinking it pity also to leaue so many noble & good men that had serued so faithfully vnder him, without a Captaine, not knowing what way to take, nor whether to goe: at their request he was contented to take charge of them, and went first vnto the citie of Cyrenes, where not many dayes before, the citizens had shut the gates against Labienus. Being there, it was told him that Scipio, Pompeys father in law, was gotten vnto king Iuba, who had receiued him: and that Actius Varus, vnto whome Pompey had geuen the charge of the prouince of Africke, was in their company with an army, and determined to goe ioyne with them. So he went by lande in the winter time, and had gotten a maruelous
B number of asses together, to cary water and vittels, which followed him with a great number of carts besides, and of those men, which the Africanes call Psilles, to wit, they that doe heale the stinging of serpents, and doe sucke out the poyson with their mouthes, and doe furthermore charme and enchaunt the snakes, that they haue no power to doe any hurt. He was seuen dayes together marching continually, and went a foote as a guide vnto his men, without helpe of horse or beast. From that day foorth, on the which he vnderstoode of the battell lost at Pharsalia, he neuer supped, but sitting,* and added that vnto the rest of his sorrow, that he neuer layed him downe, but when he went to bedde for all night. Cato hauing passed the winter in Lybia, he brought his souldiers into the fielde, which were about tenne thowsand
C persons. The affaires on their side had but hard successe, for the contencion and variance betwext Scipio, and Varus, for the which, they both flattered king Iuba to winne his fauor: being a maruelous prowde man for his greatnes and riches: as he shewed the first time he spake with Cato. For when Cato came, he caused his owne chayre to be set betwext Scipio and Cato, to haue the honor to be in the middest. But Cato perceiuing it, tooke vp his owne chaire, and set it on thother side by Scipio to put him in the middest, notwithstanding that he was his enemie, and had wrytten a shamefull booke against him. Many make no accompt of this facte of Cato, but reproue him, bicause that walking one day with Philostratus in Sicille, he gaue him the vpper hande, honoring him for his Philosophie. Thus Cato did pull downe the pride of the king at that time, who before had vsed Scipio, and Varus, as his noble men and subiects: howebeit Cato did reconcile them together againe. Furthermore, when all the companie D prayed him to take charge of the whole armie, and that Scipio himselfe, and Varus both, did first geue him place, and willingly resigned vnto him the honor to commaunde the whole campe: he aunswered them, he woulde not offende the lawe, sith he made warre onely to preserue the authoritie and priuiledge thereof, neither would take vpon him to commaunde all, him selfe being but Vicepretor, where there was a Viceconsull present. For Scipio was created Proconsull, and furthermore, the people had a certayne confidence that their affaires woulde prosper the better, if they had but the name of a Scipio to leade them in Africke. Nowe when Scipio was Generall ouer them, he woulde straight, for Iubaes sake, haue put all the inhabitantes of the citie of Vtica (without respect of age) vnto the sworde, and haue rased the houses to the grounde as those that had taken Cæsars parte. Howebeit Cato woulde E not suffer him, but protesting vnto them that were present, and calling the gods to witnesse in open counsell, with great difficulty he saued the poore people of Vtica from that cruell tragedy and slaughter. Afterwards, partly at the request of the people, and partly also at Scipioes instance, Cato tooke apon him to keepe the city, fearing least by treason, or against their wills, it should come into Cæsars hands: bicause it was a strong place of scituacion, and well replenished with all things necessary for him that should kepe it. Cato did both furnish it, & also fortifie it. For he brought in great store of corne, he repaired the rampers of the walls, made great high towers, & cast depe trenches round about the city, paling thē in: & betwext the trenches and the towne, he lodged all the young men of Vtica, & compelled them to deliuer vp their armor & weapon and kept all the rest within the city it selfe, carefully prouiding, that neuer a F man of thē should be hurt by the Romanes, & besides, did also send corne, armor, munition & money vnto the campe: so that the city of Vtica was the staple & storehouse of the warres. Moreouer, as he had before counselled Pompey not to come to battell, the like counsell he now gaue alſo vnto Scipio not to hazard battel againſt a man of great skill & experience in warres, but to take time, whereby, by litle and litle, he ſhould conſume the power & ſtrength of Cæſars tyranny. But Scipio was ſo ſtowt, that he regarded not Catoes coũſell, but wrote otherwhile vnto him, twitting him with his cowardlines in this maner: that it was enough for him to be ſafe in a good city compaſſed about with walls, though otherwiſe he ſought not to hinder men to be valliant, to execute any enterpriſe as occaſion was offred. Cato wrote againe vnto him, that he was ready to goe into ITALIE with his footemen and horſemen which he had brought into AFRICKE to draw Cæſar from them, and to turne him againſt him. Scipio made but a ſport at it. Then Cato ſhewed plainly, that he did repent him he had geuen him the preferrement to be generall of the army, becauſe he ſaw he would but fondly proſecute this warre: & alſo, that if he chaunced to ouercome, he could not moderately vſe the victory againſt his contry men. Then he beganne to miſtruſt the good ſucceſſe of this warre (and ſo he told his frendes) for the Generalls haſtines and vnskilfulneſſe: and yet if beyonde expectacion it fell out well, and that Cæſar were ouerthrowen, he would neuer dwell at ROME any more, but would flye the crueltie and bitternes of Scipio, who euen at that preſent time did prowdly threaten many. But in the ende, that fell out ſooner then looked for. For a poſte came to him late that night, who but three dayes before departed from the campe, and brought newes that all was loſt, in a great battell, by the citie of THAPSES, which Cæſar had wonne: that he had taken both campes, that Scipio and king Iuba were fled with a fewe men, and that all the reſt of their armie was ſlaine. Theſe newes did put the citizens in ſuch a feare and maze, (and ſpecially being in the warre, and in the night time) that for very feare they could ſcant keepe them ſelues within the walles of their citie. But Cato meeting with them, ſtayed them that ranne vp and downe crying in the ſtreetes, and did comfort them the beſt he could. Yet he tooke not all their feare from them, though he brought them againe vnto them ſelues from the extaſie they were in, declaring vnto them, that the loſſe was nothing ſo great as it was made, and that it was a common matter to enlarge ſuche newes with wordes enowe. By theſe perſwaſions, he ſomwhat pacified the tumult and vprore, and the next morning by breake of day, he made proclamacion, that the three hundred men which he had choſen for his counſellers, ſhould come and aſſemble in the temple of Iupiter, they all being citizens of ROME, which for trafficke of marchaundiſe lay in AFRICKE, and all the ROMANE Senators and their children alſo. Nowe whileſt they gathered them ſelues together, Cato him ſelfe went verie grauely with a ſet modeſt countenaunce, as if no ſuche matter had happened, hauing a litle booke in his hande, which he read as he went. This booke conteyned the ſtore and preparacion of municion he had made for this warre, as corne, armor, weapons, bowes, ſlings and footemen. When they were all aſſembled, he began greatly to commend the good loue and faithfulnes of theſe three hundred ROMANES, which had profitably ſerued their contry with their perſons, money, and counſell, and did counſell them not to depart one from an other, as men hauing no hope, or otherwiſe ſeeking to ſaue them ſelues ſcatteringly. For remeining together, Cæſar would leſſe deſpiſe them, if they would make warre againſt him: and would alſo ſooner pardon them, if they craued mercie of him. Therefore he counſelled them to determine what they would do, and for his owne parte, he ſayed he would not miſlike whatſoeuer they determined of: for if their mindes followed their fortune, he would thinke this chaunge to proceede of the neceſſitie of time. But if they were reſolued to withſtande their misfortune, and to hazard them ſelues to defend their libertie: he then would not only commend them, but hauing their noble corage in admiration, would him ſelfe be their chieftaine and companion, euen to proue the fortune of their contrie to the vttermoſt. The which was not VTICA, nor ADRVMETVM, but the citie ſelfe of ROME: the which oftentimes through her greatnes, had raiſed her ſelfe from greater daungers and calamities. Furthermore, that they had many waies to ſaue them ſelues, & the greateſt meane of all was this: that they ſhould make warre with a man, who by reaſon of his warres was compelled to be in many places. For SPAYNE of the one ſide was vp againſt him, and tooke parte with the younger Pompey: and the citie of ROME alſo not being vſed to be brideled with the ſnaffle of ſuch inſolencie, could not abide it, but would rather riſe with any other chaunge. Furthermore, that they were not to refuſe any daunger, but to take exãple

A of their enemy: who, to worke his mischieuous intent, spareth not his person in any daunger. And contrarily also, that vnto them, the incertaintie of the warre, if victorie followed, would make them happy: as also in being ouerthrowen, their death would turne to immortall glory. Notwithstanding, they were to thinke of the matter among thē selues, & to make their praiers to the gods, that in recōpence of their vertue & good seruice which they had shewed thitherunto, they would graūt thē grace to determine for the best. After Cato had ended his oration, there were diuers of thē that were stirred vp by his liuely persuasions, but the most part of thē were incoraged by his constancy & noble minde, & also by his kindnes: so that they presently forgate the daunger they were in, & prayd him to cōmaund their persons, goods, & weapons, as he thought good, taking him for their only inuincible Captaine, of whom fortune had no
B power, thinking it better to dye obeying his counsell, then to saue them selues, forsaking so valliant and worthy a man. Then, when one of the assembly made a motion that they shoulde make their bondmen free, & that diuers also did confirme it, Cato sayd he would by no meanes suffer it, because it was neither meete nor lawfull: howbeit if their maisters would manumise them, that he was cōtented to receiue thē for souldiers, that could weare any weapon. Diuers promised him to do it: & Cato commaunded their names should be enrolled that would, & so went his way. Immediatly after, letters were brought him frō king Iuba, & Scipio: of the which, king Iuba was hidden in a moūtaine with few men with him, who sent vnto him to know what he would determine to do. For if he ment to forsake VTICA, he would tary him there: & if otherwise he determined to kepe VTICA, then that he would come & helpe him with an army.
C Scipio on thother side riding at ancker, at a point of the land not farre from VTICA, staid for the like aunswere. Then Cato thought it best to stay the messengers which had brought him their letters, till he saw what was the determination of the three hundred. For all they that were Senators of ROME, were verie glad men, & did presently make their bondmen free, & gaue them weapons. But the other three hundred which were marchant venterers, & that liued by vsury & exchaunge, who had the most parte of their goods in slaues & bondmen, did not long follow Catoes counsell: but like men, whose bodies soone receiue heate, & are soone cold againe, when they are once gone from the fire: euen so those marchāts, while Cato was present among them, had some good prety will & desire: but when by them selues they had cast their accōpt, the feare they had of Cæsar, made them forget the reuerence they bare vnto Cato, & vnto their D duety. For, sayd they, what are we, & what is he whom we disdaine to obey? Is it not Cæsar him selfe, who at this day is Lord & Emperor of ROME? Neuer a one of vs is Scipio, Pompey, nor Cato: & yet now, when all men for feare (& in maner compelled) do yeld & submit thē selues, we will nedes take vpon vs within the wals of VTICA to fight for the liberty of ROME against him, for whom, Cato flying with Pompey, forsooke ITALIE: and we now make our bondmen free to fight with Cæsar, hauing no better liberty our selues, then it pleaseth him to geue vs. Let vs therefore now know our selues whilest we haue time, & craue mercie at his handes that is the stronger, & send vnto him, to pray him to pardon vs. The greatest & wisest men of those three hundred marchants, had this speache. But the most parte of them sought meanes how to entrappe the Senators, hoping the better of mercy at Cæsars hand, if they did deliuer them vnto E him. Cato did looke for this chaunge in them, but yet vttered not that he thought, & returned the messengers backe againe vnto king Iuba, and Scipio, and wrote vnto them: that they should beware they came not neere VTICA, bicause he did mistrust these three hundred marchants. Now there were a great number of horsemen which had escaped from the battell, who comming towards VTICA, sent three of their company vnto Cato, the which brought him not one selfe determination from all the company. For some of them went to go vnto king Iuba, others also to ioyne with Cato, & parte of them were affraid to come into VTICA. These things being thus reported vnto Cato, he commaunded Marcius Rubrius to take care of these three hundred men, & to receiue the names of the bondmen which they willingly manumised, without compelling of any man. In the meane time, Cato with all the Senators went out of VTICA to meete F with these horsemen, & there he spake to the Captaines, & praid them that they would not forsake so many noblemen & Senators of ROME as were there: & that they would not haue king Iuba for their Captaine before Cato, but to come into VTICA: where they might saue thē selues Cato forsaken of three hundred Romane marchans at Vtica.

Cato perswadeth and regardeth vnto the Senators.

the citie was of ſuche ſtrength, and beſides, ſo well armed and vitteled for many yeres. The like requeſt did the Senators alſo make vnto them, with the teares running downe their cheekes. Thereupon the Captaines went & ſpake with their ſouldiers. Cato in the meane time ſate him downe on a litle hill, with the Senators, tarying for aunſwere. But then on the ſodaine came Rubrius vnto him in great haſt, complaining of the tumult of theſe three hundred marchants, which went about to make the city to rebell: whereupon, the reſt their harts failing them, fell to bewaile their miſerable fortune. But Cato ſought to comfort them, and then ſent vnto the three hundred marchantes, to pray them to haue a litle pacience. So the Captaines returned againe with vnreaſonable demaundes of the horſemen. For they ſayd, that they cared not for king Iubaes pay, neither were they affrayed of Cæſars malice, ſo that they had Cato for their generall: yet to be pende vp within the walls of a citie with AFRICANES, that were PHOENICIANS, and a traiterous nation as could be: that grieued them moſt of all. For, ſayd they, though now they ſturre not, and be quiet: yet when Cæſar comes, they will be the firſt that will betray vs, and cut our throates. And therefore, if Cato woulde haue them to ioyne with him in this warre: that he ſhould either kill or driue away all the VTICANS out of the citie, and then that they would come into it, when it was cleere of all thoſe barbarous people their enemies. Cato thought this a cruell and barbarous condicion, neuertheles he told them that he would talke with the three hundred: and ſo returning againe into VTICA, he ſpake vnto them. But they then not regarding the reuerēce vnto Cato, diſſembling no lenger, ſaid openly, that they would not like of him whatſoeuer he were, that ſhould compel them to make warre with Cæſar, both bicauſe they would not, nor could not doe it. Further, there were ſome of them that mumbled to themſelues, that the Senators ſhould be kept there, till Cæſar came. Cato ouerheard them, for in deede his hearing was not very quicke. At that very inſtant one came to him, and tolde him, that the horſemen were going their way. Cato therefore fearing leaſt theſe three hundred marchants would lay hands apon the Senators: he went vnto them him ſelfe with his frends, and perceiuing they were gone a great way of, he tooke his horſe and rode after them. They reioycing to ſee him come, receiued him among them, and prayed him to ſaue him ſelfe with them. But Cato prayed them againe to ſaue the Senators, & that with ſuch affection, as it forced teares in him, beſides, he held vp his hands vnto them, tooke their horſes by the bridles, & them ſelues by their weapons, that at length he obtained of them, that they woulde remaine there one daye at the leaſt, to helpe the Senators to ſaue them ſelues. So Cato returning with them into the city, he appointed ſome of them to ward at the gates, & put others alſo in garriſon into the caſtell: ſo that the three hūdred marchants quaked for feare, leaſt he would haue bene reuenged of them, bicauſe of their returne with him. Thereuppon they ſent vnto Cato, humbly to praye him to come vnto them in any caſe. But the Senators flocking about him, would not ſuffer him to go, & ſaid, that they would not caſt away their ſauior and protector, to put him into traitors hands. Then doutles, all that were within VTICA, plainly ſaw the vertue & ſimplicity of Cato, and found that there was no frawde nor deceite in him: who hauing long time reſolued to kill him ſelfe, he only tooke that extreame paines & care for others that their liues being ſaued, he might then rid him ſelfe of his owne. For men might eaſely ſee, though he diſſembled it, that he was reſolued to dye. Whereupon, hauing comforted the Senators, he yeelded vnto the requeſts of the three hundred marchants, & went him ſelfe alone vnto them. Then they thanked him much for his cōming, and prayed him to commaund them, & boldly to truſt them: ſo that he would pardon them if they could not be all Catoes, and would take pity of their faint harts, though they were not ſo conſtant & noble minded as he. For they were determined to ſend vnto Cæſar, ſpecially to intreate him for him: and if that they could not obteine pardon for him, then they were aſſured they could haue none for them ſelues, and therfore would fight for the ſafety of him, while they had any breath in their bodies. Cato thanking them for their good wills, anſwered: that they ſhould ſend quickely to craue pardon for them ſelues, bnt to aske none for him. For ſayd he, men that be ouercome, & haue offended, it ſtandeth them vpon to make humble ſute, and to craue pardon: but for him ſelfe, he was neuer ouercome in his life, and yet had ouercome as much as he deſired, and had alwayes bene better then Cæſar in iuſtice, who only (not him ſelfe) was now taken and ouercome: the thing being apparantly

The ſinceritie of Cato.

Catoes minde vnconquerable.

A apparantly proued in ſight againſt him, which he had alwaies denied to haue practiſed againſt his contry. When he had made this anſwere vnto the three hundred marchants, he departed from them. Newes being brought that Cæſar was in his way with all his armie, comming towards VTICA: O goddes, ſayd he, then he commeth againſt vs, as againſt men. Then turning vnto the Senators, he gaue them counſell quickely to ſaue them ſelues, whileſt the horſemen were yet in the city. So ſhutting all the gates of the city, ſauing that towards the hauen: he appointed ſhippes for them all, and ſet euery thing at a ſtay, without tumult or diſorder, no man hauing iniurie offered him, and gaue euerie one money to make way for their ſafetie. When Marcus Octauius (who came with two legions, and camped hard by VTICA) ſent vnto Cato, to determine which of them two ſhould be Generall: he made no aunſwere, but turning to his

B friends ſaid: How can we wonder any more that all goeth to wracke with vs, ſith there is ſuche ambition amongſt vs for the gouernmēt, euen now, when we are at the laſt caſt? In the meane time word was brought him, how the horſemen going their way were ſpoyling of the citizens goods, as a lawfull pray in warre. He ſtraight ran thither him ſelfe, and the firſt he met withall, he tooke from them that they had gotten. The reſt, before he came vnto them, threw downe that they were carying away, & hanging downe their heades for ſhame, they went their way, and ſaid nothing. Then Cato calling all the citizens of VTICA together, prayed them not to incenſe nor moue Cæſar againſt the three hundred, but rather to craue of him pardon for thē all. Then he went againe to the peere, and there imbracing his frends, & taking his leaue of them all, he brought them to their ſhippes. Now for his ſonne, he did not coūſell him to go, neither

C did he thinke it mete to vrge him to forſake his father. Furthermore, there was one Statilius a young man in his companie, of a noble corage, that was determined to follow the inuincible conſtancy of Cato: who counſelled him to take the ſea, and to ſaile away with the reſt, bicauſe he knew he was Cæſars mortall enemy. Statilius ſaid he would not go. Then Cato turning him vnto Apollonides a Stoick Philoſopher, & vnto Demetrius a Peripatetick Philoſopher, ſaid: you muſt take this ſtowt young man, to perſwade him to obey vnto neceſſity. Cato him ſelfe in the meane time ſent away the reſt, & did miniſter iuſtice vnto them that required it: ſpending all that night, & the next day, about thoſe matters. Then Lucius Cæſar, the kinſeman of Iulius Cæſar the conqueror, being choſen by the three hundred, to goe & make ſute vnto him for them all, came and prayed Cato to help him to make his oration, which he ſhould ſay vnto Cæſar for

D them all: and as for thee, Cato, ſaid he, I will kiſſe his hands, and fall downe on my knees before him to intreate him for thee. Nay ſaid Cato, thou ſhalt not do ſo. For if I would ſaue my life by Cæſars grace, I could do it, if I would but go vnto him: howbeit I will not be bound to a tyran for iniuſtice. For it is an iniuſtice in him to take vpō him, as a Lord & ſoueraine to ſaue a mans life, when him ſelfe hath no authority to commaund. But yet let vs conſider if thou wilt, what thou ſhalt ſay, to craue pardon for the three hundred. So they were a while together conſideting the matter, and in fine, Lucius Cæſar being ready to departe, Cato recommended his ſonne and frendes vnto him, and imbracing him, tooke his leaue of him. Then he returned vnto his lodging, and calling his ſonne and frends before him, and talking of many matters: among o-

E thers he charged his ſonne in no caſe to meddle in thaffaires of the common wealth. For ſaid he, to deale vprightly like Catōs ſonne, the corruption of the time and ſtate will not abide it: and contrarily, obſeruing the time, thou canſt not do like an honeſt man. Towards euening he went into his bath to waſhe him ſelfe, and as he was a bathing, thinking apon Statilius, he cried out alowde: well Apollonides, thou haſt at length yet perſwaded Statilius, to goe his way and pulled downe his ſtowt courage he had: and is he gone without bidding vs farewell? Howe, gone ſayd Apollonides? Nay, his hart is now more ſtowt and couragious then euer it was, notwithſtanding all the perſwaſions we could vſe vnto him: for he is determined to tary, & to take ſuch part as thou doeſt. After he had bathed him ſelfe, he went to ſupper, & ſate at his meate, as he had alwaies vſed after the battell at Pharſalia, and neuer lay, but when he went to bed. So he had all his frends, & the chiefe Magiſtrats of VTICA to ſupper with him. After ſupper, they

F fell into graue talke and matters of Philoſophie: till at length they came vnto the ſtraunge opinion of the Stoick Philoſophers, which was this: that only the good man is free, and all the euill be ſlaues. The Peripatetick Philoſopher that was preſent there, was ſtraight againſt it.

The Paradoxes of the Stoicks.

But Cato was very earneſt againſt the Peripateticke, and argued the matter a long time, with a vehement ſpeach and contencion: inſomuch as they that heard him, found then that he was determined to ende his life, & to rid him ~~him~~ ſelfe out of all thoſe troubles. But then when he had ended his argument, and ſawe that euery man helde his peace, and looked ſadly of it: to comfort them againe, and to put the ſuſpicion of his death out of their heades: he beganne againe to fall in talke of their affaires, and ſeemed to be carefull of them, as though he had bene affrayed leaſt ſome misfortune were come vnto them apon the ſea, or vnto them that were gone by land, becauſe they paſſed through deſertes, where there was no water to be had. Now when ſupper was done, and the ſtraungers gone, he walked as his manner was with his frends, and hauing taken order with the Captaines of the watch for matters of ſeruice, as the time required: going into his chamber he embraced his ſonne and his frendes more louingly then he was wont to doe, whereby he made them againe ſuſpect the execution of his determination. When he was come into his chamber and layed in his bedde, he tooke Platoes dialogues in his hand, treating of the ſoule, and red the moſt parte of it. Then looking by his beds ſide, and miſſing his ſword (which his ſonne had taken from him when he was at ſupper) he called one of the groomes of his chamber to him, and asked him who had taken his ſword away: his man made him no aunſwere, & he fell againe to read his booke. Then a prety while after, not ſeeming to be importunate, or ouerhaſtie of the matter, but as though he woulde only know what became of it: he willed thē to bring him his ſword againe. They taried long, and he had red ouer all the booke, but yet his ſword was not brought him againe. Wherupon he called for all his men one after an other, & very angrily asked them his ſword, & gaue one of them ſuch a blow in the face, that his noſe fell a bleeding, & his hand was all bloody withal, and cried out that his ſonne and his ſeruaunts would deliuer him naked into the hands of his enemie: vntill his ſonne and frends at length ranne vnto him, & falling downe on their knees, lamented, and beſought him to be contented. Cato then riſing out of his bedde, looked grimly vpon them, and ſayd vnto them: O goddes, who euer ſaw me in this taking? Why doth no man by reaſon perſwade me, if they ſee me out of the way: & not to kepe me from my determination by plucking my weapons from me? why doeſt thou not bind thy father (my ſonne) his hands behinde him, that when Cæſar commeth, he may finde me in caſe not to defend my ſelfe? I doe not deſire my ſworde to hurte my ſelfe, for if I had any ſuche minde, I neede but hold my breath a litle, or geue but a knocke of my head againſt the wall onely, and diſpatche my ſelfe quickely. When he had ſayd thus, his ſonne went out of his chamber weeping, and all his frends alſo, no man remayning with Cato, but Demetrius and Apollonides, vnto whom he ſpake more gently, and reaſoned in this ſorte. What, doe you thinke to keepe an old man as I am, aliue by force? And haue you taried behinde but to ſit ſtaring apon me, and ſay nothing vnto me? If otherwiſe elſe, by reaſon you come to perſwade me, that it ſhall be no ſhame for Cato, diſpairing of the ſafetie of his life, to ſeeke it by the grace and mercy of his enemy: why then doe you not now tell me your reaſons to perſwade me, that forſaking all other fancies & determinatiōs which hetherunto we haue holden for good, being on a ſodaine become wiſer by Cæſars meanes, we ſhould be bound the more therefore to geue him thankes? I do not tell you this that I haue determined any thing of my life, but that it is in my power (if I liſt) to put the thing in execution I haue determined: but yet I will conſult with you, when I am ſo determined, to heare the reaſons and opinion of your bookes, which your ſelues doe vſe in diſcourſe and argument together. Goe your way therefore hardily vnto my ſonne, and tell him, that he muſt not thinke to compell his father vnto that, which he can not proue good vnto him by reaſon. After this talke, Demetrius and Apollonides being nothing comforted, weeping, departed out of his chamber. Then his ſword was brought him by a litle boy. When he had it, he drew it out, and looked whether the point and edge of his ſword was ſharpe and would cut: when he ſaw it was well, O, ſayd he, now I am where I would be, and ſo laying downe the ſword naked by him, he tooke his booke againe in his hand, and red it ouer (as they ſay) twiſe together. Then he ſlept ſo ſoundly after it, that his men which were without his chamber heard him ſnort againe. About midnight, he called for two of his freemen, Cleanthes his Phiſitian, and Butas, whom he chiefly employed in his weightieſt affaires of the common wealth.

Cato conſidered his ſworde wherewith he killed him ſelfe.

So

A So he ſent him vnto the hauen to ſee, if all his men that were imbarked were vnder ſaile: and gaue his hand vnto the Phiſitian to be bound vp, becauſe it was ſwollen with the blow he gaue one of his ſlaues when he hit him on the face. All his ſeruaunts were glad to heare of that, hoping then that he deſired to liue. Soone after came Butas backe againe from the hauen, and brought him word that all were gone but Craſſus, who ſtayed about ſome buſines he had, and yet that he was going to take ſhippe: howbeit that the ſea was very roughe and winde exceeding great. Cato hearing this, ſighed, being ſory for them that were vpon the ſea, and ſent Butas backe againe to the hauen, to ſee if any man came backe for any matter they had to ſay vnto him. The litle birdes began to chirpe, and Cato fel againe in a litle ſlumber. But thereuppon Butas returned, & brought him word that all was quiet in the hauen, & there was no ſturre. Then

B Cato bad him goe his way, and ſhut to the dore after him, and layed him downe in his bed, as though he had ment to haue ſlept out all the reſt of the night. Butas backe was no ſooner turned, but Cato taking his naked ſword in his hand, thruſt it into his breaſt: howbeit the ſwelling of his hand made the blowe ſo weake, that it killed him not preſently, but drawing on to his latter ende, he fell downe vpon his bedde, and made ſuch a noyſe with his fall (ouerthrowing a litle table of geometry hard by his bedde, that his ſeruaunts hearing the noyſe, gaue a great ſhreeke for feare. Thereuppon his ſonne and his friendes ranne into the chamber, and found him all of a gore bloud, and the moſt part of his bowells comming out of his bodye, him ſelfe being yet aliue, and ſeeing them. They were all ſtriken with ſuch ſorow to behold it, that at the firſt they were ſo amaſed, as they could not tel what to ſay to it. His Phiſitiã comming to him,

C he went about to put in his bowels againe which were not periſhed, and to ſow vp his wound. But Cato comming to him ſelfe, thruſt backe the Phiſitian, and tare his bowells with his owne handes, and made his wound very great, and immediatly gaue vp the ghoſt. Whereuppon the three hundred ROMANES (in leſſe time then a man would haue thought Catoes owne houſhold ſeruaunts could haue knowen of his death) were at his dores, and immediatly after, all the people of VTICA alſo came thither, and with one voyce called Cato their benefactor and ſauior, and ſayd he onely was a free man, and had an inuincible minde. And this was done, when they heard ſay that Ceſar was not farre from VTICA. Furthermore, nether feare of the preſent daunger, nor the deſire to flatter the Conqueror, nether any priuate quarrell amongeſt them ſelues, could keepe them from honoring Catoes funeralls. For, ſumptuouſly ſetting out his bo-

D dy, and honorably accompanying his funeralls as might be, they buryed him by the ſea ſide, where at this preſent time is to be ſeene his image, holding a ſworde in his hande. After that, they made their beſt way to ſaue them ſelues and their citie. Nowe Ceſar hearing aduertiſed by them that came vnto him, howe Cato ſturred not from VTICA, nor fled not, but ſent all others away, ſauing him ſelfe, and his ſonne, and a few of his friends that remained there, being afraid of nothing: he could not deuiſe what he ment by it. Therefore eſteeming Cato much, he made haſte with all the ſpeede he could with his armie, to come thether. But when he vnderſtoode that Cato had ſlaine him ſelfe, writers doe reporte he ſayd thus: O Cato, I enuy thy death, ſithe thou haſt enuied mine honor, to ſaue thy life. For in deede, had Cato beene contented Ceſar ſhould haue ſaued his life, he had not ſo much impaired his owne honor, as he had augmen-

E ted Ceſars glory. And yet what Ceſar would haue done, men make it doubtful, ſaying that they coniecture well of Ceſars clemencie. Cato dyed when he was but eight and forty yeare old. For his ſonne, Ceſar neuer did him hurt: howbeit it is reported of him, that he was very vilely gi-uen, and laſciuious beſides. For when he lay in CAPPADOCIA, in a noble mans houſe of the kings blood, called Maphradates, who had a fayre woman to his wife: he taried longer there then he might well with honeſtie, whereuppon he fell to be a laughing ſtock to the people, and in mockery they ſayd, Cato will goe too morrow, a thirty dayes hence. And further, that Maphradates and Porcius are two good friendes, but they haue but one minde. And the reaſon was, becauſe Maphradates wife was called Pſyche, which in the Greeke ſignifieth a minde: and

F Cato is a noble fellow, and hath a princely mind, howbeit his famous death did ſtoppe this infamous ſpeech. For he valiantly fighting againſt Auguſtus, and Antonius, at the battell of Philippes, for the liberty of his coũtry: their armie being ouerthrowen and fled, he would neither flie nor hide him ſelfe, but running in amongeſt his enemies, he made them know what he was, by incoraging those of his side, which yet did defend them selues, till he was slayne in the field, to the great admiration of his valiantnes. Furthermore, Porcia, the Daughter of Cato, gaue no place vnto her father, nether for chastitie, nor greatnes of mind. For she being maried vnto Brutus, who slue Cæsar, was of the conspiracie, and slue her selfe as corageously as became the vertue and nobilitie of her bloud from whence she came, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Brutus. Statilius also, who had sayd he would ronne Catoes fortune (as we haue tolde you before) was kept from killing of him selfe by the Philosophers, Demetrius, and Apollonides. But after that tyme hauing shewed him selfe very faithfull and seruiceable vnto Brutus in all his affayres, he was slayne in the field also at the battell of Philippes.

AGIS AND CLEOMENES.

The fable of Ixion against ambitious persons.

TRuely the fable of Ixion was not ill deuised against ambicious persons: who imbracing a clowde for the goddesse Iuno, begot (as it is sayd) the CENTAVRI. For euen so ambicious men, imbracing glory for the true image of vertue, doe neuer any acte that is good nor perfect: but beeing caried away with diuers fancies, and following others humors with desire to please the people, they may, as the herdmen in the tragedy of Sophocles (speaking of their cattell) say:

VVe vvayt vppon their beasts, though vve their Maisters bee, And vvhereseoeuer they become, there also follovve vvee.

Such in deede are they compared to, that gouerne common weales, after peoples lust and fancy: who doubtles, are as their seruaunts obedient at call, bicause they onely may enioy the glorious title and name of an Officer. For like as in a shippe the Mariners that stande in the prowe, doe better see before them, then the Pilots that steere the helme in the poope, and yet lookes alwayes backe vnto them to see what they commaunde: euen so, they that gouerne in the common wealth for honors sake, are no better the honorable slaues of the people, hauing no more but the bare name of a gouernor. But in deede, the perfect good and honest man should neuer couet outward glory, but as a meane to bringe him to noble attempts, whereby he

A he might procure the better credit of his doings. And for a younge man that coueteth honor by vertue, giue him leaue a litle to glory in his well doing: for, as Theophraſtus ſayth, vertue buddeth and floriſheth in youth, and taketh faſt roote by prayſes giuen, as wit & corage groweth in them. But ouermuch praiſe is daungerous in euery perſon, but chiefly in ambicious gouernors. For if they be men of great power, it makes them commit many deſperat partes: for they wil not allow that honor proceedes of vertue, but that honor is vertue it ſelfe. But in deed they ſhould ſay as Phocion did vnto Antipater, that requeſted an vnlawfull matter of him: Thou canſt not, ſaid he, haue Phocion a friend and flatterer both. This, or the very like, may be ſayd vnto the people: you can not both haue one, a Maiſter and a ſeruaunt, that can commaunde and obey together. Or els the miſchiefe ſpoken of in the tale of the Dragon muſt needes hap-

B pen, which was: the taile on a time fell out with the head, and complained, ſaying, it would an other while go before, & would not alwaies come behind. The head graunted the taile, which fell out very ill for it, not knowing howe to guide the heade, and beſides that the head thereby was tormented euery way, beeing compelled againſt nature to follow that part and member, which could nether heare, nor ſee how to guide it. The like matter haue we ſeene happen vnto many, which in the adminiſtracion of the common wealth, did ſeeke to pleaſe the humors of the multitude. For when they haue once put their heads vnder their girdles to pleaſe the common people, which without cauſe & reaſon doe ſoone rebell: they can by no poſſible meanes afterwards bridle their furie & inſolencie. Now the reaſon that made vs to enter into diſcourſe againſt the ambition and vaine glorye amongeſt the people: was the conſideracion I had of

C their greate power, remembring the misfortunes of Tiberius and Caius Gracchi: bothe the which comming of a noble houſe, and hauing bene maruelous well brought vp, & maneging alſo the affayres of the common wealth with a good deſire, were notwithſtanding in the ende caſt away: not ſo much through couetouſnes of glorye, as for feare of diſhonor, which came alſo of no baſe mind. For they hauing receiued great pleaſures and friendſhips of the people, were aſhamed to be indetted to them, and therefore earneſtly ſought to exceede the people in good will, by new decrees and deuiſes, which they preferred for common benefit: and the people alſo for their partes contended to honor them the more, by how much they ſtriued to ſhewe them ſelues thankefull. So with like ſtrife on either ſide, they to gratifie the common people, and the people alſo to honor them, were vnwares ſo entangled with publike cauſes,

D that they could no more follow the common prouerbe, which ſayth:

Although our deedes diſcent from equitie, Yet can vve not deſiſt vvith honeſtie.

This thou ſhalt eaſily finde by the declaracion of the hiſtorie. With theſe we doe compare two other popular men, both kinges of Lacedæmon, Agis and Cleomenes. For they, as the Gracchi, ſeeking to increaſe the power of the common people, and to reſtore the iuſt and honeſt gouernment againe of the common wealth of Lacedæmon, which of long time had bene out of vſe: did in like manner purchaſe the hate of the nobilitie, which were loth to loſe any part of their wonted couetouſnes. In deed theſe two Laconians were no brethrē borne, but yet did both follow one ſelfe courſe & forme of gouernment, which had beginning in this

E ſort. After that couetouſnes of gold and ſiluer crept againe into the citie of Sparta, and with riches, couetouſnes alſo and miſerie, and by vſe, voluptuouſnes and licentious life: Sparta then was void of all honor and goodnes, and was long time drowned in ſhame and diſhonor, vntill king Agis and Leonidas came to raigne there. Agis was of the houſe of the Eurytiontides, the ſonne of Eudamidas, the ſixt of lineall deſcent after Ageſilaus, who had beene the greateſt Prince of all Græce in his time. This Ageſilaus had a ſonne ſlaine in Italy by the Meſſapians, called Archidamus, before the citie of Mandonivm. Archidamus had iſſue two ſonnes, Agis, and Eudamidas that was king, who ſucceeded his brother Agis, whom Antipater ſlue before the citie of Megalipolis, and left no children behind him. Eudamidas begat Archidamus, which Archidamus begat another Eudamidas: which Eudamidas alſo begat Agis, whoſe life we nax,and Plistonax also an other, called Pausanias: who flying from SPARTA vnto the citie of TEGEA,his eldest sonne Agesipolis was made king in his fathers roome,who dying without issue,his yonger brother Cleombrotus succeeded him in the kingdō.Cleombrotus had two sonnes, Agesipolis and Cleomenes: of the which,Agesipolis raigned not long king,and dyed without issue. Then Cleomenes his brother,who was king after him,had two sonnes, Acrotatus the elder, that dyed in his fathers life time: and Cleonymus the yonger which suruiued him,and was not king, but one Areus his Nephewe,the sonne of Acrotatus. This Areus dyed before the citie of CORINTHE: who hauing an other Acrotatus to his sonne,he succeeded him in the kingdome. He also dyed at a battell before the citie of MEGALIPOLIS,and was slayne there by the tyrant Aristodemus,leauing his wife great with childe.She beeing brought to bedde after his death of a sonne,whome Leonidas the sonne of Cleonymus taught and brought vp: the childe dying very young,the crowne by his death was cast apon Leonidas him selfe.Howbeit his maners & conditions neuer liked the people.For though all men generally were corrupted through the cō mon wealth,and cleane out of order: yer Leonidas of all other exceeded, deforming most the auncient LACONIAN life,bicause he had bene long time brought vp in Princes houses,& followed also Seleucus Court, from whence he had brought all the pride and pompe of those Courts into GRÆCE,where law & reason ruleth. Agis on the contrary part did not onely farre excel Leonidas,in honor and magnanimitie of mind: but all other almost also which had raigned in SPARTA,from the time of Agesilaus the great.So that when Agis was not yet twenty yeare old,and being daintily brought vp with the finenes of two women,his mother Agesistrata,and Archidamia his grandmother,which had more gold and siluer, then all the LACEDÆMONIANS els: he began to spurne against these womanish delights & pleasures,in making him selfe fayer to be the better beliked,and to be fine and trimme in his apparell, and to cast vpon him a plaine spanish cape,taking pleasure in the dyet,bathes,and manner of the auncient LACONIAN life: and openly boasted besides,that he would not desire to be king,but onely for the hope he had to restore the auncient LACONIAN life by his authority. Then began the state of LACEDÆMON first to be corrupted, and to leaue her auncient discipline,when the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing subdued the Empire of the ATHENIANS,stored them selues & contry both, with plenty of gold & siluer.But yet reseruing still the lands left vnto them by succession from their fathers,according vnto Lycurgus first ordinaunce & institucion,for diuision of the landes amongest them: which ordinaunce, and equalitie being inuiolably kept amongest them,did yet preserue the common wealth from defamation of diuers other notorious crimes.Vntil the time of the authoritie of Epitadeus,one of the Ephores,a seditious man, and of prowde conditions: who bitterly falling out with his own sonne,preferred a law,that euery man might lawfully giue his landes and goods whilest he liued,or after his death by testament, vnto any man whom he liked or thought well of.Thus this man made this law to satisfie his anger, & others also did confirme it for couetousnes sake,and so ouerthrew a noble ordinaunce. For the riche men then began to buy lands of numbers,and so transferred it from the right & lawful heires: whereby a few men in short time being made very riche, immediatly after there fell out great pouertie in the citie of SPARTA,which made all honest sciences to cease,& brought in thereuppon vnlawfull occupacions,who enuyed them that were wealthy.Therefore,there remayned not aboue seuen hundred naturall Citizens of SPARTA in all,& of them,not aboue a hundred that had lands and inheritance: for all the rest were poore people in the citie,and were of no countenaunce nor calling,& besides that,went vnwillingly to the warres against their enemies,looking euery day for sturre and chaunge in the citie.Agis therefore thinking it a notable good acte (as in deede it was) to repleniſh the citie of SPARTA againe,and to bringe in the old equalitie, he moued the matter vnto the Citizens. He found the youth (against all hope) to giue good eare vnto him,and very well giuen vnto vertue, easily chaunging their garments & life,to recouer their libertie againe.But the oldest men,which were now euen rotten with couetousnes and corruption, they were affraid to returne againe to the straight ordinaunces of Lycurgus,as a slaue and ronneagate from his Maister,that trembleth when he is brought back againe vnto him.Therefore they reproued Agis,when he did lament before them their present miserable estate, and wish he also for the former auncient honor and true dignitie of SPARTA:

Howbeit

A Howbeit Lyſander the ſonne of Lybis, and Mandroclidas the ſonne of Eſphanes, and Ageſilaus alſo, greatly commended his noble deſire, and perſwaded him to goe forward withall. This Lyſander was of great authoritie and eſtimation amongeſt them in the citie: Mandroclidas was alſo very wiſe, and carefull, about any matter of counſell, and with his wiſedom and policy, very valiant: Ageſilaus in like manner, the kings Vncle, and an eloquent man, was very effeminate and couetous, and yet prickt forward to giue his furtherance to this attempt as it appeared, by his ſonne Hippomedon, who was a notable good ſouldier, and could doe very much, by meanes of the loue and good will the younge men did beare him. But in deede, the ſecret cauſe that brought Ageſilaus to conſent vnto this practiſe, was the greatnes of his dette which he ought, of the which he hoped to be diſcharged by chaunging of the ſtate and common B wealth. Now when Agis had wonne him, he fought by his meanes to drawe his mother alſo vnto the matter, which was Ageſilaus ſiſter. She could doe very much by the number of her friendes, followers, and detters in the citie, by whoſe meanes ſhe ruled the moſt part of the affayres of the citie after her owne pleaſure. But the young man Hippomedon making her priuie vnto it, at the firſt ſhe was amaſed withall, and bad him hold his peace if he were wiſe, and not medle in matters vnpoſſible and vnprofitable. But when Ageſilaus had told her what a notable acte it would be, and how eaſily it might be brought to paſſe, with maruelous great profit: and that king Agis beganne alſo to ſtrayne her with great intreatie, that ſhe would willingly depart with her goods to winne her ſonne honor and glory: who, though he could not in money and riches come to be like vnto other kinges (bicauſe the ſlaues and factors onely of the kinges C Seleucus and Ptolomy, had more money then all the kings of SPARTA had together that euer raigned) yet if in temperance, thriftines, & noble mind (exceeding all their vanities) he could come to reſtore the LACEDÆMONIANS againe vnto equalitie: that then in deede he ſhould be counted a noble king. Theſe women being ſtirred vp with ambition by theſe perſwaſions of the younge man, ſeeing him ſo nobly bent, as if by the goddes their mindes had ſecretly bene inflamed with the loue of vertue: did preſently alter their mindes in ſuch ſort, that they themſelues did pricke forward Agis, and ſent for their friends to pray and intreate them to fauor his enterpriſe: and furthermore, they brought on other women alſo, knowing that the LACEDÆMONIANS did euer heare and beleue their wiues, ſuffering them to vnderſtand more of the affayres of the ſtate, then they themſelues did of their priuate eſtate at home. Herein is to be D conſidered, that the moſt part of the riches of LACEDÆMON was in the handes of the women, and therefore they were againſt it, not onely bicauſe thereby they were cut of from their finenes and exceſſe, in the which being ignorant of the true good in deede, they put all their felicitie: but alſo, bicauſe they ſawe their honor and authoritie which they had by their riches, cleane troden vnder foote. Therefore they comming to Leonidas, they did perſwade him to reproue Agis, bicauſe he was elder man then he, and to let that this enterpriſe went not forward. Leonidas did what he could in fauour of the riche, but fearing the common people, who deſired nothing but alteracion, he durſt not openly ſpeake againſt him, but ſecretly he did the beſt he could to hinder Agis practiſe, talking with the Magiſtrates of the citie, and accuſing Agis vnto them, he told them how he did offer the riche mens goods vnto the poore, the diui-E ſion of their landes, and the aboliſhing of all detts, for rewarde to put the tyrannie into his handes, and that thereby he got him a ſtronge gard vnto himſelfe, but not many Citizens vnto SPARTA. This notwithſtanding, king Agis hauing procured Lyſander to be choſen one of the Ephores, he preſently preferred his lawe vnto the counſell. The articles whereof were Agis law.
theſe: That ſuch as were in debt, ſhould be cleered of all their debes, and that the landes alſo ſhould be diuided into equall partes: ſo that from the valley of Pallena vnto mount Taugetus, and vnto the citie of MALEA, and SELASIA, there ſhould be foure thouſand fiue hundred partes, and without theſe boundes, there ſhould be in all the reſt, fifteene thouſand partes, the which ſhould be diſtributed vnto their neighbours meete to cary weapon: and the reſt vnto the natural SPARTANS. The number of them ſhould be repleniſhed with their neighbours and F ſtraungers in like manner, which ſhould be very well brought vp, and be able men beſides to ſerue the common wealth: all the which afterwards ſhould be diuided into fifteene companies, of the which, ſome ſhould receiue two hundred, & others foure hundred men, & ſhould liue according to the olde auncient inſtitucion obſerued by their aunceſtors. This lawe being preferred vnto the Senate, the Senators grewe to diuers opinions apon it. Whereuppon Lyſander him ſelfe aſſembled the great counſell of all the people, and there ſpake vnto them him ſelfe, and Mandroclidas, and Ageſilaus alſo, praying them not to ſuffer the honor of SPARTA to be troden vnder foote, for the vanitie of a fewe: but that they would remember the auncient oracles of the goddes, warning them to beware of auarice, as of the plague and deſtruction of the common wealth: and of the late oracle alſo brought vnto them, from the temple of Paſiphaé. The temple and oracle of Paſiphaé, was famous at the citie of THALAMES: and ſome ſay, that Paſiphaé was one of the Daughters of Atlas, which was gotten with child by Iupiter, & was deliuered of a ſonne called Hammon. Other thinke that it was Caſſandra, one of king Priamus Daughters that died there, which was ſurnamed Paſiphaé, bicauſe ſhe gaue all the aunſwers & oracles of things to come. But Phylarchus writeth, that Daphné the Daughter of Amycla, flying from Apollo that would haue rauiſhed her, was turned into a lawrell tree, and honored by Apollo with the gift of prophecie. So, they ſaid that this oracle of the god commaunded them, that the SPARTANS ſhould againe returne vnto their former auncient equalitie, ſtabliſhed firſt by Lycurgus lawe. When euery man els had ſpoken, king Agis riſing vp, briefly ſpeaking vnto the people, ſayd: that he would beſtowe great contributions for the reformation of this common wealth, which he was deſirous to reſtore againe. For firſt of all, he would make common all his errable and paſture he had, and beſides that, he would adde to ſix hundred talents in redy money, and ſo much ſhould his mother, grandmother, kinſemen and friendes, all the which were the richeſt and wealthieſt in SPARTA. When the people heard what he ſayd, they maruelled much at the noble minde of this younge king, and were very glad of it, ſaying: that for three hundred yeares ſpace together, the citie of SPARTA had not ſo worthy a king as he. But Leonidas contrarily aſſayed with all his power he could to reſiſt him, thinking with him ſelfe, that if king Agis purpoſe tooke place, he ſhould alſo be compelled to doe as he did, and yet he ſhould haue no thankes, but king Agis: bicauſe that all the SPARTANS indifferently ſhould be compelled to make their goods in common, but the honor ſhould be his onely that firſt beganne it. So he asked Agis, whether he thought Lycurgus had bene a good and iuſt man or not. Agis aunſwered, that he had bene. Then replyed Leonidas, did you euer ſee that he had taken away and aboliſhed any dets, or had receyued ſtraungers into the number of the Citizens of SPARTA? Who contrarily thought his common wealth vnperfect, if all ſtraungers were not baniſhed the citie. Agis agayne aunſwered him: that he maruelled not that Leonidas beeing brought vp in a ſtraung contry, and alſo maryed there in a noble mans houſe, he ſhould be ignorant of Lycurgus lawes, who baniſhing gold and ſiluer out of his citie, did therewithall exile dette and lending. And for ſtraungers, he hated them that woulde not conforme them ſelues vnto the manners and facions of life which he inſtituted, and thoſe they were which he baniſhed: not for any ill will he bare vnto their perſons, but bicauſe he feared their manners of life, leaſt that mingling them with the Citizens, they ſhould make them runne after vanitie and couetouſnes to be riche. For otherwiſe, Terpander, Thales, and Pherecydes, which were all ſtraungers, were maruelouſly reuerenced and honored in SPARTA in olde tyme, bicauſe they did ſinge in their writings, the ſelfe ſame thinges which Lycurgus had eſtabliſhed in his lawes. And thou thy ſelfe alſo doeſt commend Ecprepes, being one of the Ephores, bicauſe he did cut with a hatchet the two ſtringes which Phrynis the Muſitian had added vnto the Citherne, more then the ſeuen common ſtringes, and thoſe alſo which did the like vnto Timotheus: and yet thou reproueſt me, bicauſe I goe about to roote out all exceſſe and pride out of SPARTA, as though thoſe men did not farre of preuent that theſe ſuperfluous ſtringes of the muſicke, delighting the Citizens mindes too much with their ſonges, ſhould not cauſe them fall vnto ſuch trade and manner of life, as ſhould make the citie at diſcord with it ſelfe. After this contencion, the common people did ſticke vnto king Agis, and the riche men followed Leonidas, praying and perſwading him not to forſake them: and further, they did ſo intreate the Senators, in whom conſiſteth the chiefe authority, to determine and diſgeſt all matters before they be propownded vnto the people, that they ouerthrew the law, by the onely voice of one man more. Wherefore Lyſander who was yet in office, attempted to accuſe Leonidas by an auncient

A ent lawe, forbidding that none of the race of Hercules should mary with any straung woman, nor beget children of her: and sayde further, that no man vpon payne of death should dwell any where, but in SPARTA. When he had instructed others to obiect these thinges agaynst Leonidas, he with other of his colleagues obserued a signe in the element, the ceremony wherof was in this sorte: Euery nyneth yeare, the Ephori chusing a bright night without moonelight, did sit downe in some open place, and beheld the starres in the element, to see if they saw any starre shoote from one place to another: if they did, then they accused their kinges that they had offended the goddes, and did depriue them of their kingdom, vntill some oracle came from DELPHES or Olympus, to restore them againe. Lysander then declaring that he had King Leonidas accused by Lysander.

B seene a starre flie in the element, did therefore accuse king Leonidas, and brought forth witnesses against him: how he had maried a woman of ASIA, the which one of king Seleucus Lieuetenants had giuen him in mariage, & that he had two children by her: & afterwards being forsaken of his wife that refused him, he returned againe into his contry against his will, & so had possessed the kingdom for lacke of lawful heire. So following his accusation in this manner against him, he allured Cleombrotus his sonne in law, being also of the kings blood, to make title to the crowne. Leonidas being affraid of the successe hereof, tooke sanctuary in the temple of Iuno, surnamed Chalcioecos, & his Daughter with him, who forsooke her husband Cleombrotus. Leonidas then being cited to appeare in person, & making default, they deposed him, & made Leonidas deprived of his kingdom.

C Cleombrotus king. In the meane time Lysanders office expired, & the new Ephori which succeded him, did deliuer Leonidas againe, and accused Lysander & Mandroclidas, bicause against the law, they had abolished all debts, & had againe made newe diuision of lands. When they sawe they were openly accused, they incensed both the kinges, that ioyning together, they shoulde make the Ephores ordinaunces of no effect: declaring, that their authority was onely erected for the discord of the two kings, bicause they should giue their voices vnto that king that had the best iudgemēt & reason, whē the other would wilfully withstand both right & reason. And therfore, that they two agreing together, might lawfully do what they would, without cōtrolment of any person: & that to resist the kings was a breaking of the lawe, sith that by right the Ephori had no other priuileage & authority, but to be iudges & arbitrators betwene thē, when there was any cause of iarre or controuersie. Both the kings being caried away by this perswasion, went into the market place accōpanied with their frends, pluckt the Ephores from their thither other frends of his in whom he put great confidence, & they did accōpany Leonidas, & brought him safely vnto the city of TEGEA. Thus their purpose taking effect, & no man cōtrarying thē one man only Agesilaus ouerthrew all, & dashed a noble LACONIAN law by a shamful vice, which was couetousnes. any man in the contry, & owing a great summe of money besides: would neither pay his debts, E nor let go his land. Wherfore he perswaded king Agis, that if he wes about to stablish both together, he should raise a great vproare in the city, & withall, if he did first winne them that were landed men, preferring at the beginning the cutting of of debts only: then that they would easily & willingly also accept the law for partition of lands. Lysander was also of his opinion when by king Agis & he both were deceiued by Agesilaus subtlety. So they cō maunded al the creditors to bring their bonds, obligations, & bils of det (which the LACEDAEMONIANS do cal Clatia) into the market place, and there laying them on a heape together, they did set fire of them. When the vsurers & creditors saw their writings obligatory afire, they departed thence with heauy harts: but Agesilaus mocking thē said, he neuer saw a brighter fire in his life. F ding it, Agesilaus stil interposing some cause of let, delaied time, vntill opportunitye serued, that king Agis should go to the warres, for that the ACHAIANS their confederats had praied aide of LACEDAEMON, being bound thereunto by the league confirmed betwene them, bicause they looked daily that the Ætolians cõming through the contry of Megara, would inuade Peloponnesvs. Aratus generall of the Achaians had leauied a great army to withstãd their inuasion, & had also written vnto the Ephores, that they should send thẽ aide. Wheruppon, they presently sent king Agis, perceiuing also the readines and good wil of the souldiers which were appointed to go with him. For the most of thẽ were young men & needy, who seing thẽ selues discharged of the feare of their dets, & hoping also at their return, that the lãds likewise should be deuided among thẽ: they went with glad harts, & were obedient vnto king Agis. So that the cities where through they passed, wondred how they came through all Peloponnesvs, from the one side to the other, very quietly, without noyse or offence to any man. Likewise many Græcians calling to mind the aũcient times, told one another, that it was a noble sight then to see the army of Lacedæmon, whẽ they were led by Agesilaus, Lysander, & Leonidas, famous captaines: sith now they saw so great obedience vnto Agis by his souldiers, who was in maner the yõgest mã of all his campe. Who also glorying to be cõtẽt with litle, to away with paines, & not to be more costly apparelled & armed thẽ any priuat souldier he had: he wanne him self therby a maruelous loue of the people. Howbeit the rich mẽ liked not this chaung, & were afraid lest Agis should giue other people example to rise also, & to do the like with theirs, as he had done. Agis meting with Aratus by the city of Corinthe, euen as he was consulting whether he should fight with his enemy or not: shewed him self in his coũsel, then no rash, but a resolute & valiant man. For he told him, that for his opinion he thought it better to fight, & not to suffer the warre to come any further, leauing the entry into Peloponnesvs free to their enemy: neuertheles, that he would do what Aratus thought good, bicause he was the elder, and generall also of the Achaians, whom he came not to cõmaund, but to aide thẽ. But Baton Sinopian writeth, that king Agis would not fight, though Aratus was willing: howbeit he had not red that which Aratus had writtẽ for his excuse & iustificatiõ, alleaging there, that the farmers & husbãdmẽ hauing brought all the corne into their barnes, he thought it better to suffer the enemies to come further into the contry, rather then to hazard battel, to the losse of the whole cõtry of Peloponnesvs, & that therfore he licenced al the confederats to depart, & brake vp his army. So king Agis returned home again, greatly honored of al thẽ that serued with him in this iorney, finding the city of Sparta thẽ in great broile & trouble. For Agesilaus at that time being one of the Ephores, finding him self rid of the feare which before kept him vnder: cared not what iniury or mischief he did to any citizen, so he might get money. For amongest other things, that very yere he made thẽ pay beyond al reason the tallages & taxes due vnto the cõmõ wealth for thirtene moneths, adding to the thirtenth moneth, aboue the ordinary time of the yere. Wherfore perceiuing euery mã hated him, & being affraid of thẽ he had offended: he kept souldiers about him, armed with their swords, & so came downe into the market place among thẽ. And for the two kings, he made no accõpt of the one: but of the other that was Agis, he semed outwardly to make good accõpt, rather for kinreds sake, thẽ for his dignity of a king, & furthermore gaue it out abroad, that he would also be one of the Ephores the next yere following. Wheruppõ, his enemies spedely to preuent the daũger, gathered force together, & opẽly brought king Leonidas from Tegea, to restore him again to his kingdõ. The people were glad to see that, bicause they were angry they had bene mocked in that sort, for that the landes were not deuided according vnto promise. Furthermore, Hippomedon was so welbeloued for his valiantnes of euery mã, that intreating the people for his father Agesilaus, he saued his life, & got him out of the city. But for the two kings, Agis tooke sanctuary in the tẽple of Iuno Chalceæos. And Cleõbrotus the other king fled into the tẽple of Neptune: for it semed that Leonidas being much more offẽded with him, did let king Agis alone, & wẽt against him with certẽ souldiers armed. Thẽ he sharply taunted him, that being his sonne in law, he had conspired against him to depriue him of his kingdõ, & had driuẽ him out of his contry. But then Cleombrotus not hauing a word to say, sate stil, & made him no answer. Wheruppõ his wife Chelonis, the daughter of Leonidas, who before was offended for the iniury they did her father, & had left her husband Cleõbrotus, that had vsurped the kingdõ from him, to serue her father in his aduersity, and while he was in sanctuary tooke part with him also of his misery, & afterwards whẽ he wẽt vnto the city of Tegea, ware blacks for sorow, being offẽded with her husbãd: she contrarily thẽ chaunging

D seates, & put others in their roomes, of the which Agesilaus was one. Furthermore, they armed a great number of yong men, & opening the prisons, did set the prisoners at liberty: the which made their aduersaries affraid of thē, doubting some great murther would haue followed vpon it, howbeit no man had any hurt. For Agesilaus being bent to kill Leonidas, who fled vnto the city of TEGEA, & hauing also laid men in waite for him by the way: king Agis hearing of it, sent Leonidas flyeth vnto Tegea.

King Leonidas returneth from exile into Sparta.

The naturall loue of Chelonis Leonidas daughter, vnto her father and husband.

A chaũging her anger with her husbãds fortune & miſery, became alſo an hũble ſuter with him ſitting down by him, & imbracing him, hauing her two litle ſonnes on either ſide of them. All mẽ wõdering, & weping for pity, to ſee the goodnes & natural loue of this Lady, who ſhewing her mourning apparell, & heare of her head ſtaring about her eyes, bare headed: ſhe ſpake in this ſort vnto her father. O father mine, this ſorowfull garmẽt & countenance is not for pity of Cleombrotus, but hath long remained with me, lamenting ſore your former miſery & exile: but now, which of the two ſhould I rather chooſe, either to cõtinue a mourner in this pitiful ſtate, ſeing you again reſtored to your kingdom, hauing ouercome your enemies: or els putting on my princely apparel, to ſee my husband ſlain, vnto whom you maried me a maid? who, if he can not moue you to take cõpaſſion of him, and to obtein mercy, by the teares of his wife and B childrẽ: he ſhal then abide more bitter paine of his euil counſel, then that which you intend to make him ſuffer. For he ſhal ſee his wife die before him, whom he loueth more derely then any thing in the world. Alſo, with what face can I loke apon other ladies, whẽ I could neuer bring my father to pity, by any interceſſiõ I could make for my husband, neither my husband, intreating him for my father: & that my hap is to be borne, a daughter & wife, alwaies moſt vnfortunat, & deſpiſed of mine owne? And for my husbãd, if he had any reaſon to do that he did, I thẽ tooke it from him, by taking your parte, and proteſting againſt him: and contrarily, your ſelfe doth giue him honeſt culler to excuſe his faulte, when he ſeeth in you the deſire of the kingdom ſo great, that for the loue thereof, you thinke it lawfull to kill your ſonnes in law, and alſo not to regard the children he hath gotten, for her ſake. Chelonis pitifully complayning in this C ſorte, putting her face vpon Cleombrotus head, caſt her ſwollen and blubbering eyes apon the ſtanders by. Wherefore Leonidas after he had talked a litle with his friendes, he commaunded Cleombrotus to get him thence, and to leaue the citie as an exile: and prayed his Daughter for his ſake to remayne with him, and not to forſake her father, that did ſo dearely loue her, as for her ſake he had ſaued her husbands life. This notwithſtanding, ſhe would not yeelde to his requeſt, but riſing vp with her husband, gaue him one of his ſonnes, and her ſelf tooke the other in her armes: and then making her prayer before the altar of the goddeſſe, ſhe went as a baniſhed woman away with her husband. And truely the example of her vertue was ſo famous, that if Cleombrotus mind had not beene too much blinded with vain glory, he had cauſe to thinke his exile farre more happy, to enioye the loue of ſo noble a wife as he had, then for the kingdom D which he poſſeſſed without her. Then Leonidas hauing baniſhed king Cleombrotus out of the city, & remouing the firſt Ephores, had ſubſtituted other in their place: he preſẽtly bethought him howe he might craftily come by king Agis. Firſt, he perſwaded him to come out of the ſanctuary, & to gouerne the kingdom ſafely with him, declaring vnto him that his citizens had forgiuen him all that was paſt, becauſe they knew he was deceiued, & ſubtely circumuented by Ageſilaus craft, being a young man, ambitious of honor. Agis would not leaue the ſanctuary for Leonidas cunning perſwaſion, but miſtruſted all that he ſaid vnto him: Wherefore, Leonidas would no more beguile him with faire words. But Amphares, Demochares, & Arceſilaus, did oftẽtimes go to viſit king Agis, & otherwhile alſo they got him out of the ſanctuary with them vnto the bath, & brought him backe againe into the temple, when he had bathed. But Amphares E hauing borowed not long before, certein rich apparel & plate of Ageſiſtrata, bicauſe he would not redeliuer thẽ againe, he determined to betray king Agis, his mother, & grandmother. And it is reported that he chiefly did ſerue Leonidas turne, & prouoked the Ephores (of which number he was one) againſt Agis. Now therefore, Agis keping all the reſt of his time within the tẽple, ſauing when he went apon occaſion to the bath: they determined to intercept him by the way, & to take him when he was out of the ſanctuary. So they watched him one day when he bathed, & came & ſaluted him as their maner was, & ſeemed to accompany him, ſporting, & being merry with him, as with a young man their familiẽ. But when they came to the turning of a ſtreete that went towardes the priſon, Amphares laying hold on him, beeing one of the Ephores, ſaid vnto him: I arreſt thee Agis, & wil bring thee before the Ephores, to giue accompt F of thy doings in the common wealth. Then Demochares, which was a great mighty man caſt his gowne ouer his eares, & pulled him forward: others alſo thruſt him forward behind him, as they had agreed together. So no man being neare them to help Agis, they got him into pri& beſet the priſon round about. The Ephores wēt into the priſon, & ſent vnto ſome of the Senate to come vnto them, whom they knew to be of their mind: then they cōmaunded Agis as if it had bene iudicially, to giue accompt of the alteracion he had made in the cōmon wealth.

The younge man laughed at their hypocriſie. But Amphares told him that it was no laughing ſport, & that he ſhould pay for his folly. Then another of the Ephores ſeeming to deale more fauorably with him, & to ſhew him a way how he might eſcape the condēnation for his fault, asked him, if he had not bene intiſed vnto it by Ageſilaus, and Lyſander. Agis aunſwered, that no man compelled him, but that he onely did it to follow the ſteppes of the auncient Lycurgus, to bring the common wealth vnto the former eſtate of his graue ordinaunce & inſtitution. Then the ſame Senator asked him againe, if he did not repent him of that he had done. The younge B man boldly aunſwered him, that he would neuer repent him of ſo wiſe and vertuous an enter-priſe, though he ventred his life for it. Then they condemned him to death, and commaunded the Sergeants to cary him into the Decade, which was a place in the priſon where they were ſtrangled, that were condemned to dye. Demochares perceiuing the Sergeaunts durſt not lay hold of him, & likewiſe that the ſouldiers which were ſtraungers, did abhorre to commit ſuch a fact, contrary to the law of God and man, to lay violent hands vpon the perſon of a king: he threatned & reuiled them, and dragged Agis perforce into that place called the Decade. Now the rumor ranne ſtraight through the citie, that king Agis was taken, & a multitude of people were at the priſon dores with lights & torches. Thither came alſo king Agis mother & grandmother, ſhreeking out, & praying that the king of SPARTA might yet be heard and iudged by C the people. For this cauſe, they haſtned his death the ſooner, and were afraid beſides, leaſt the people in the night would take him out of their hands by force, if there came any more people thither. Thus king Agis being led to his death, ſpied a Sergeaūt lamenting & weeping for him, vnto whom he ſaid: good fellowe, I pray thee weepe not for me, for I am honeſter man then they that ſo ſhamefully put me to death, & with thoſe words he willingly put his head into the halter. Amphares then going out of the priſon into the ſtreet, found Ageſiſtrata there, king Agis mother, who ſtraight fel downe at his feete: but he taking her vp againe, in old famillier manner, as being her very friend, told her that they ſhould doe king Agis no hurt, & that ſhe might if ſhe would, goe & ſee him. Then ſhe prayed, that they would alſo let her mother in with her.

aunts to be put to death, who was a maruelous olde woman, and had liued more honorably vnto that age, then any Lady or Matrone beſide her in the citie. She being executed, he commaunded Ageſiſtrata alſo to come in. Who when ſhe ſawe the bodye of her dead ſonne layed on the ground, & her mother alſo hanging on the gallowes: ſhe did her ſelfe helpe the hangman to plucke her downe, and layed her body by her ſonnes. Then hauing couered her in decent manner, ſhe layed her downe on the ground by the corps of her ſonne Agis, and kiſſing his cheeke ſayd: out, alas my ſonne, thy great modeſtie, goodnes and clemencie, brought thee and vs vnto this deathe. Then Amphares peeping in at the dore to ſee what was done, hearing what ſhe ſayde, came in withall in a greate rage, and ſayde: I perceyue thou haſt alſo E beene of counſell with thy ſonne, and ſithe it is ſo, thou ſhalt alſo followe him. Then ſhe riſing likewiſe to be ſtrangled, ſayd: the goddes graunt yet that this may profit SPARTA. This came to dwell in PELOPONNESVS. For the very enemies them ſelues in battell, would not willingly lay hands vpon the kings of LACEDÆMON, but did forbeare as much as they could poſſible, both for feare & reuerence they bare vnto their maieſtie. For in many great battels & cō-

A slue king Theopompus: howbeit the LACEDÆMONIANS sayde, that he was but hurt, not slayne. But hereof there are diuers opinions: but it is certain that Agis was the first king whom the Ephores euer put to death: for that he had layd a plat of a noble deuise, and worthy of SPARTA, being of that age when men doe easily pardon them that offend: and was rather to be accused of his friendes and enemies, bicause he had saued Leonidas life, & had trusted other men, as the best natured younge man that could be.

Now Agis hauing suffered in this sort, Leonidas was not quicke enough to take Archidamus his brother also, for he fled presently. Yet he brought Agis wife out of her house by force, with a litle boy she had by him, and maried her vnto his sonne Cleomenes, who was yet vnder age to marye: fearing least this younge Ladye should be bestowed els where, beeing in deede a great B heire, and of a riche house, and the Daughter of Gylippus, called by her name Agiatis, besides that she was the fayrest woman at that tyme in all GRÆCE, and the vertuousest and best condicioned. Wherefore, for diuers respects she praied she might not be forced to it. But now being at length maried vnto Cleomenes, she euer hated Leonidas to the death, and yet was a good and louing wife vnto her young husband: Who immediatly after he was maried vnto her, fell greatly in fancy with her, and for compassions sake (as it seemed) he thanked her for the loue she bare vnto her first husband, and for the louing remembraunce she had of him: insomuch as he him selfe many times would fall in talke of it, and would be inquisitiue how thinges had passed, taking great pleasure to heare of Agis wise counsell and purpose. For Cleomenes was as desirous of honor, and had as noble a minde as Agis, and was borne also to temperancie and C moderation of life, as Agis in like manner was: howbeit, he had not that shamefast modestie and lenitie which the other had, but was somewhat more sturring of nature, and readier to put any good matter in execution. So he thought it greate honestie to bringe the Citizens if he could, to be contented to liue after an honest sorte: but contrarily, he thought it no dishonestie to bringe them vnto good life, by compulsion also. Furthermore, the manners of the Citizens of SPARTA, giuing them selues ouer to idlenes and pleasure, did nothing like him at all: neither that the king did suffer the common wealth to be ruled as they listed, so no man impeached his pleasure, and that they did let him alone: insomuch no man regarding the profit of the common wealth, euery man was for him self, and his familie. And contrarily, it was not lawfull for any man to speake for the exercises of the youth, for their education in temperanD cie, and for the restoring againe of equality of life, the preferment whereof was the only cause of the late death of Agis. They say also, that Cleomenes being a young stripling, had heard some disputacion of Philosophie, when the Philosopher Sphærus, of the contry of BORYSTHENES came to LACEDÆMON, and louingly stayed there to teache younge men and children. He was one of the chiefest schollers of Zenon CITTIAN, and delighted (as it seemed) in Cleomenes noble minde, and had a great desire to pricke him forward vnto honor. For, as it is reported, that the auncient Leonidas beeing demaunded what Poet he thought Tyrtæus to be, aunswered he was good to flatter younge mens myndes: for he sette their hartes a fire by his verses, when they beganne to fight any battell, fearing no daunger, they were so incoraged by them. So the Stoicke discipline is somewhat daungerous, for the stowte and valiant myndes, which E otherwise doth make them desperate: but when they are ioyned vnto a graue and gentle nature, first it lysteth vp his hart, and then maketh him taste the profit thereof. Nowe Leonidas (the father of Cleomenes) beeing deceased, and he him selfe comen vnto the crowne, finding that the Citizens of SPARTA at that tyme were very dissolute, that the riche men followed their pleasure and profit taking no care of the common weale, that the poore men also for very want and neede went with no good life and courage to the warres, nether cared for the bringing vp of their children, and that he him selfe had but the name of a king, and the Ephori the absolute authoritie to doe what they listed: at his first comming to his kingdome, he determined to alter the whole state and gouernment of the common wealth. Who hauing a friend called Xenares, that had beene his louer in his youth (which the LACEDÆMONIF ANS called Empnistæ, as much as inspired) he beganne to sownd his opinion, asking what maner of man king Agis had bene, and by what reason, and whose aduise he had followed in his attempt for the reformation of the common wealth. Xenares at the first did not willingly rehearse these things vnto him, declaring euery thing what had passed. But when he found that Cleomenes was affected vnto king Agis intent, & still desired to heare of it: then Xenares sharply and angrily reproued him, and tolde him he was not wise, nor well aduised, and at length would no more come and talke with him as he was wont, yet making no man priuye why he absteyned from comming to him, but told them that asked him, he knewe a cause well enough why. Xenares nowe hauing thus refused him, and thinking all the rest woulde doe the like: to bringe this matter to passe, he tooke this resolution with him selfe. Bicause he thought he might the rather doe it in warre, then in peace, he set the citie of SPARTA and the ACHAIANS at variance together: who did them selues giue the first occasion to be complayned vpon. For Aratus beeing President and chiefe of all the ACHAIANS, had practised a longe tyme to bringe all PELOPONNESVS into one bodye: and had therefore onely susteyned great troubles in warres, and at home in peace: thinking that there was no other waye to deliuer them from forreyne warres. Nowe when he had wonne all the other people to be of his opinion: there remained no more but the ELIANS, the LACEDÆMONIANS, and a few of the ARCHADIANS, which were subiect vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. When king Leonidas was deade, Aratus beganne to inuade the ARCHADIANS, those specially that bordered apon the ARGIVES: to proue how the LACEDÆMONIANS would take it, making no accompt of Cleomenes, being but a young king, & had no experience of warres. Thereuppon the Ephori sent Cleomenes vnto ATHÆNIVM (a temple of Minerua hard by the citie of BELBINA) with an armie to take it: bicause it was a passage & entry into the contry of LACONIA, howbeit the place at that time was in question betwixt the MEGALOPOLITANES, and the LACEDÆMONIANS. Cleomenes got it, and fortefied it. Aratus making no complaint otherwise of the matter, stale out one night with his army to set apon the TEGEANS, and ORCHOMENIANS, hoping to haue taken those cities by treason. But the traitors that were of his confederacy, their harts failed them when they should haue gonne about it: so that Aratus returned, hauing lost his iorney, thinking that this secret attempt of his was not discouered. But Cleomenes finely wrote vnto him as his friend, and asked him, whether he had led his armie by night: Aratus returned aunswer againe, that vnderstanding Cleomenes ment to fortifie BELBINA, he went forth with his armye, thinking to haue let him. Cleomenes wrote againe vnto him, and said he did beleeue that which he spake was true: howbeit he earnestly requested him, (if it were no trouble to him) to aduertise him why he brought schaling ladders and lightes after him. Aratus smiling at this mocke, asked what this young man was. Democritus LACEDÆMONIAN being a banished man out of his cõtry, aunswered: if thou hast any thing to doe against the LACEDÆMONIANS, thou hadst neede make haste, before this young Cockerel haue on his spurres. Then Cleomenes being in the field in the contry of ARCHADIA, with a few horsemen and three hundred footemen onely: the Ephori being affraid of warres, sent for him to returne againe. His backe was no sooner turned, obeying their commaundement: but Aratus sodainly tooke the citie of CAPHYES. Thereuppon, the Ephori incontinently sent Cleomenes backe again with his armie: who tooke the fort of Methydrium, and burnt the borders of the ARGIVES. The ACHAIANS came against him with an army of twenty thowsand footemen, and a thowsand horsemen, led by Aristomachus: Cleomenes met with them by the city of PALANTIVM, and offred battell. But Aratus quaking at the hardines of this young man, would not suffer Aristomachus to hazard battell, but went his way, derided by the ACHAIANS, and despised by the LACEDÆMONIANS: who in all were not aboue fiue thowsand fighting men. Cleomenes corage beeing now lift vp, and brauely speaking to his citizens: he remembred them of a saying of one of their auncient kings, that the LACEDÆMONIANS neuer inquired what number their enemies were, but where they were. Shortly after, the ACHAIANS making warre with the ELIANS, Cleomenes was sent to ayde them, & met with the armie of the ACHAIANS by the mountaine Lyceum, as they were in their returne: he setting apon them, gaue them the ouerthrowe, slue a great number of them, and tooke many also prisoners, that the rumor ranne through GRÆCE, how Aratus selfe was slaine. Cleomenes wisely taking the occasion which this victory gaue him: he went straight to the citie of MANTINEA, and taking it vpon a sodaine, when no man knew of his comming, he put a strong garrison into it. ses,

A ſes, ouerwearying them with warres: he went about to ſende for Archidamus, king Agis brother, being then at MESSENA, vnto whom the kingdom of right belonged by the other houſe, ſuppoſing that he ſhoulde eaſely weaken the power of the Ephores, by the authoritie of the two kinges, if both of them ioyned together. Which when the murtherers of king Agis vnderſtoode, being affraid that Archidamus returning from exile, he would be reuenged of them: they ſecretly receiued him into the citie, and founde the meanes to bring him into SPARTA. But when they had him, they put him ſtraight to death, whether it was vnwitting to Cleomenes (as Phylarchus plainly teſtifieth) or elſe with his priuitie, ſuffring them to make him away, by perſwaſion of his frends. But it is a cleere caſe, the citie was burdened withall, bicauſe probable matter fell out that they had compelled Cleomenes to doe it. Neuertheleſſe, he holding

B ſtill his firſt determination, to alter the ſtate of the common wealth of SPARTA, as ſoone as he could poſſible: he ſo fed the Ephores with money, that he brought them to be contented he ſhould make warre. He had alſo won many other citizens by the meanes of his mother Cratesiclea, who furniſht him with money, that he lacked not to honor him withall: and further, maried as it is reported, (being otherwiſe not ment to mary) for her ſonnes ſake, vnto one of the wealthieſt men of all the citie. So Cleomenes leading his army into the field, wanne a place within the territorie of MEGALOPOLIS, called LEVCTRA. The ACHAIANS alſo being quickly come to their aide, led by Aratus: they ſtraight fought a battell by the citie ſelfe, where Cleomenes had the worſt on the one ſide of his armie. Howbeit Aratus woulde not ſuffer the ACHAIANS to follow them, bicauſe of bogges and quauemyres, but ſounded the retreate. But

C Lyſiadas a MEGALOPOLITAN being angrie withall, cauſed the horſemen he had about him to follow the chaſe, who purſued ſo fiercely, that they came amongeſt vines, walls, and ditches, where he was driuen to diſperſe his men, and yet coulde not get out. Cleomenes perceiuing it, ſent the light horſemen of the TARENTINS & CRETANS againſt him: of whom Lyſiadas valliantly fighting was ſlaine. Then the LACEDÆMONIANS being couragious for this victorie, came with great cries, & geuing a fierce charge apon the ACHAIANS, ouerthrew their whole armie, and ſlue a maruelous number of them: but yet Cleomenes at their requeſt ſuffered them to take vp the dead bodies of their men to burie them. For Lyſiadas corps, he cauſed it to be brought vnto him, and putting a purple robe apon it, and a crowne on his head, ſent it in this aray vnto the very gates of the citie of MEGALOPOLIS. It was that ſelfe Lyſiadas, who geuing

D ouer the tyranny and gouernment of MEGALOPOLIS, made it a popular ſtate, and free city, and ioyned it to the ACHAIANS. After this victorie, Cleomenes that determined greater matters and attempts, perſwaded him ſelfe that if he might once come to ſtabliſhe the affaires of the common wealth at SPARTA to his mind, he might then eaſely ouercome the ACHAIANS: brake with his father in law Megiſtonus, and told him that it was neceſſary to take away the authoritie of the Ephores, and to make diuiſion of the landes among the SPARTANS, and then being brought to equalitie, to encorage them to recouer the Empire of GRÆCE againe vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, which their predeceſſors before them, held and enioyed. Megiſtonus graunting his good will and furtherance, ioyned two or three of his frendes more vnto him.

It chaunced at that time that one of the Ephores lying in the temple of Paſiphaé, had a marue-

For he thought he ſawe but one chaire ſtanding where the Ephori did vſe to ſit to geue audience, and that the other foure which were wont to be there, were taken away: and that maruelling at it, he heard a voyce out of the temple that ſaid, that was the beſt for SPARTA. He declaring this dreame the next morning vnto Cleomenes, it ſomewhat troubled him at the firſt, thinking that he came to feele him, for that he had heard ſome inckling of his intent. But when he perſwaded him ſelfe that the other ment good faith, and lyed not vnto him, being bolder then before, he went forward with his purpoſe, and taking with him vnto the campe all thoſe SPARTANS which he ſuſpected to be againſt his enterpriſe, he went and tooke the cities of HERÆA and ALSEA, confederats of the ACHAIANS, and vitteled ORCHOMENA, and went and camped before the citie of MANTINEA. In fine, he ſo wearied

F & ouerharried the LACEDÆMONIANS by long iorneys, that at length they beſought him he would let them remaine in ARCADIA, to repoſe them ſelues there. In the meane time, Cleomenes with his ſtraungers which he had hyred, returned againe vnto SPARTA, and imparted his intent by the way vnto them he truſted beſt, and marched at his owne eaſe, that he might take the Ephores at ſupper. When he came neere vnto the city, he ſent Euryclidas before, into the halle of the Ephores, as though he brought them newes out of the campe from him. After him, he ſent alſo Thericion & Phœbis, and two other that had bene brought vp with him, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS called the SAMOTHRACIANS, taking with them a fewe ſouldiers. Nowe whileſt Euryclidas was talking with the Ephores, they alſo came in apon them with their ſwordes drawen, and did ſet apon the Ephores. Ageſilaus was hurt firſt of all, and falling downe, made as though he had bene ſlaine, but by litle & litle he crept out of the halle, and got ſecretly into a chappell conſecrated vnto Feare, the which was wont euer to be kept ſhut, but then by chaunce was left open, when he was come in, he ſhut the dore faſt to him. The other foure of the Ephores were ſlaine preſently, and aboue tenne moe beſides, which came to defende them. Furthermore, for them that ſate ſtill and ſturred not, they killed not a man of them, neither did keepe any man that was deſirous to goe out of the citie: but moreouer, they pardoned Ageſilaus, who came the next morning out of the chappell of Feare. Amongeſt the LACEDÆMONIANS in the citie of SPARTA, there are not onely temples of feare and death, but alſo of laughter, and of many other ſuch paſſions of the minde. They do worſhippe Feare, not as other ſpirites and deuills that are hurtfull: but bicauſe they are perſwaded, that nothing preſerueth a common wealth better then feare. Wherefore the Ephori (as Ariſtotle witneſſeth) when they are created, doe by publicke proclamacion commaunde all the SPARTANS to ſhaue their chinnes, and to obey the law, leaſt they ſhould make them feele the rigour of the law. They brought in the ſhauing of their chinnes, in my opinion, to inure yoūg men to obey the Magiſtrates euen in trifles. Moreouer it ſeemes that men in olde time did eſteeme fortitude to be no taking away of feare, but rather a feare & lothnes to incurre ſhame. For commonly thoſe that are moſt affrayed to offend the law, are in the field moſt valliant againſt their enemie: and ſhunne no perill to winne fame and honeſt reputacion. And therefore it was wiſely ſayd of one,

That feare can not be vvithout shamefastnes.

And ſo Homer in a certaine place made Hellen ſay vnto king Priamus:

Of trueth I doe confeſſe deere father in lavv,
You are the man of vvhom I ſtand in avv,
And reuerence moſt of all that ere I ſavv.

And in an other place, ſpeaking of the GRÆCIAN ſouldiers, he ſayth thus:

For feare of their Captaines they ſpake not a vvord.

For men do vſe to reuerence them whom they feare. And this was the cauſe why the chappell of Feare was by the halle of the Ephores, hauing in maner a princely and abſolute authoritie. The next morning Cleomenes baniſhed by trompet, foure ſcore citizens of SPARTA, and ouerthrew all the chaires of the Ephores but one only, the which he reſerued for him ſelfe to ſit in to geue audience. Then calling the people to counſell, he gaue them an account of his doings, and told them that Lycurgus had ioyned the Senators with the kings, & how the citie had bene gouerned a long time by them, without helpe of any other officers. Notwithſtanding, afterwards the city hauing great warres with the MESSENIANS, the kings being alwaies employed in that warre, whereby they could not attend the affaires of the common wealth at home, did chooſe certaine of their frendes to ſitte in iudgement in their ſteades, to determine controuerſies of lawe: which were called Ephores, and did gouerne long time as the kinges miniſters, howbeit that afterwards, by litle and litle, they tooke apon them abſolute gouernment by thē ſelues. And for manifeſt proofe hereof, you ſee that at this preſent time when the Ephori do ſend for the king, the firſt and ſecond time, they refuſe to come, but the third time he riſeth and goeth vnto them. The firſt man that gaue the Ephores this authoritie, was Aſteropus, one of the Ephores many yeares after the firſt inſtitucion of the kinges: and yet if they had gouerned diſcreetely, peraduenture they might haue continued lenger. But they licentiouſly abuſing their authoritie, by ſuppreſſing the lawfull Gouernors inſtituted of old time, taking apon them to baniſh ſome of their kings, and putting other of them alſo to death, without law and iuſtice, and threatning others that deſire to reſtore that noble and former bleſſed gouern-

The oration of king Cleomenes, touching the firſt originall of the Ephores.

Aſteropus, the firſt man that gaue authority to the Ephores.

A gouernment vnto SPARTA againe: all these things I say, are in no wise to be suffered any lenger. And therefore, if it had bene possible to haue banished all these plagues of the common wealth out of SPARTA, brought from forreine nations: (I meane, pleasures, pastimes, money, dets, and vsuries, and others yet more auncient, pouerty and riches) he might then haue esteemed him selfe the happiest king that euer was, if like a good Phisitian he had cured his contrie of that infection, without griefe or sorrow. But in that he was constrained to beginne with blood, he followed Lycurgus example: who being neither king nor other Magistrate, but a priuate citizen only, taking apon him the authoritie of the king, boldly came into the market place with force and armed men, and made king Charilaus that then raigned, so affrayed, that he was driuen to take sanctuarie in one of the temples. But the king being a Prince of a B noble nature, and louing the honor of his contrie: tooke parte with Lycurgus, adding to his aduise and counsell, for the alteracion of the state of the gouernment of the common wealth, which he did confirme. Hereby then it appeareth, that Lycurgus saw it was a hard thing to alter the common wealth without force and feare: the which he notwithstanding had vsed with as great modestie and discretion, as might be possible, banishing them that were against the profit and wealth of LACEDÆMON, geuing all the lands of the contrie also to be equally deuided amongest them, and setting all men cleere that were in dette. And furthermore, that he would make a choyse and proofe of the straungers, to make them free citizens of SPARTA, whom he knew to be honest men, thereby to defende their citie the better by force of armes: to thend that from henceforth we may no more see our contrie of LACONIA spoyled by the C ÆTOLIANS and ILLYRIANS, for lacke of men to defende them selues against them. Then he beganne first him selfe to make all his goods common, and after him Megistonus his father in law, and consequently all his other frendes. Then he caused the lands also to be deuided, and ordeined euery banished man a part, whom he him selfe had exiled, promising that he would receiue them againe into the city, when he had established all things. So when he had replenished the number of the citizens of SPARTA, with the choycest honest men their neighbours: he made foure thowsand footemen well armed, and taught them to vse their pykes with both handes, in steade of their dartes with one hande, and to carie their targets with a good strong handle, and not buckled with a leather thong. Afterwardes he tooke order for the education of children, and to restore the auncient LACONIAN discipline againe: and did all these things D in maner by the helpe of Sphærus the Philosopher. Insomuch as he had quickely set vp againe schoole houses for children, and also brought them to the old order of dyet: and all, but a very fewe, without compulsion were willing to fall to their old institucion of life. Then bicause the name of one king should not offend any man, he made his brother Eucleidas king with him. But this was the first time that euer the two kings were of one house but then. Furthermore, vnderstanding that the ACHAIANS and Aratus were of opinion, that he durst not come out of LACEDÆMON, for feare to leaue it in perill of reuolting, bicause of the late chaunge and alteracion in the common wealth: he thought it an honorable attempt of him, to make his enemies see the readines and good will of his armie. Thereupon he inuaded the territories of the MEGALOPOLITANS, and brought away a great praye and booty, after he had done great hurt E vnto his enemies. Then hauing taken certaine players and minstrells that came from MESSINA, he sette vp a stage within the enemies contrie, made a game of 40. Minas for the victor, and sate a whole day to looke apon them, for no pleasure he tooke in the sight of it, but more to despite the enemies withall, in making them see how muche he was stronger then they, to make such a Mayegame in their owne contrie, in despite of them. For of all the armies otherwise of the GRÆCIANS, or kinges in all GRÆCE, there was no armie onely but his, that was without players, minstrells, fooles and iugglers: for his campe only was cleane of such rabble and foolerie, and all the young men fell to some exercise of their bodies, and the old men also to teache them. And if they chaunced to haue any vacant time, then they would pleasauntly be one merie with an other, in geuing some pretie fine mocke after the LACONIAN manner. F And what profit they got by that kinde of exercise, we haue written it at large in Lycurgus life. But of all these things, the king him selfe was their schoolemaister and example, shewing him selfe very temperate of life, and plaine without curiositie, no more then any priuate souldier of all his campe: the which were great helpes vnto him in his enterprises he made in Græcia. A

For the Græcians hauing cause of sute and negociacion with other kings and Princes, did not wonder so much at their pompe and riches, as they did abhorre and detest their pride and insolencie: so disdainfully they would aunswere them that had to doe with them. But contrarily when they went vnto Cleomenes, who was a king in name and deede as they were, finding no purple robes nor stately mantells, nor rich imbrodered beddes, nor a Prince to be spoken to but by messengers, gentlemen vshers, and supplications, and yet with great a doe: and seeing him also come plainly apparelled vnto them, with a good countenaunce, and curteously aunswering the matters they came for: he thereby did maruelously win their harts and good wills, that when they returned home, they said he only was the worthy king, that came of the race of Hercules. Now for his dyet at his bord, that was very straight and Laconian like, keeping only three bords: and if he chaunced to feast any Ambassadors or other his frendes that came to see him, he then added to two other bords, and besides, made his men to see that his fare should be amended, not with pastrie and conserues, but with more store of meate, and some better wyne then ordinarie. For he one day reproued one of his frendes, that bidding straungers to supper, he gaue them nothing but blacke broth, & browne bread only, according to their Laconian maner. Nay, said he, we may not vse straungers so hardly after our maner. The bord being taken vp, an other litle table was brought with three feete, whereupon they set a bolle of copper full of wyne, and two siluer cuppes of a pottell a peece, and certaine other fewe siluer pottes besides: so euery man dranke what they listed, and no man was forced to drinke more then he woulde. Furthermore, there was no sporte, nor any pleasaunt song, C soung, to make the companie merie, for it needed not. For Cleomenes selfe would entertaine them with some pretie questions, or pleasaunt tale: whereby, as his talke was not seuere and without pleasure, so was it also pleasaunt without insolencie. For he was of opinion, that to winne men by gifts or money, as other kings and Princes did, was but base and cloynelike: but to seeke their good wills by curteous meanes, and pleasauntnes, and therewith to meane good faith, that he thought most fit and honorable for a Prince. For this was his minde, that there was no other difference betwext a frend and hyerling: but that the one is wonne with money, and the other with ciuility & good entertainment. The first therefore that receiued king Cleomenes into their citie, were the Mantinians, who opened him the gates in the night, and helping him to driue out the garrison of the Achaians, they yeelded them selues vnto him. D
But he referring them to the vse and gouernment of their owne lawes and libertie, departed from thence the same day, and went vnto the citie of Tegea. Shortly after, he compassed about Arcadia, and came vnto Pheres in Arcadia determining one of the two, either to geue the Achaians battell, or to bring Aratus out of fauor with the people, for that he had suffred him to spoyle and destroy their contry. Hyperbatas was at that time Generall of the Achaians, but Aratus did beare all the sway and authoritie. Then the Achaians comming into the field with all their people armed, and encamping by the citie of Dymes, neere vnto the temple of Hecatombæum: Cleomenes going thither, laye betwext the citie of Dymes that was against him, and the campe of his enemies, which men thought a verie vnwise parte of him. Howebeit valliantly prouoking the Achaians, he procured them to the battell, ouer- E threw them, made them flie, and slue a great number in the field, and tooke many of them also prisoners. Departing from thence, he went and set apon the citie of Langon, and draue the garrison of the Achaians out of it, and restored the citie againe vnto the Elians. The Achaians being then in verie hard state, Aratus that of custome was wont to be their Generall, (or at the least once in two yeares) refused now to take the charge, notwithstanding the Achaians did specially pray and intreate him: the which was an ill act of him, to let an other steere the rudder, in so daungerous a storme and tempest. Therefore the Achaians sent Ambassadors vnto Cleomenes to treate peace, vnto whome it seemed he gaue a verie sharpe aunswere. After that, he sent vnto them, and willed them only to resigne the signiorie of Græce vnto him: and that for all other matters he would deale reasonably with them, and presently F deliuer them vp their townes & prisoners againe, which he had taken of theirs. The Achaians being glad of peace with these condicions, wrote vnto Cleomenes that he shoulde come

The victory of Cleomenes against the Achaians.

A vnto the citie of LERNA, where the dyet and generall assemblie shoulde be kept to consult thereupon. It chaunced then that Cleomenes marching thither, being very hotte, dranke cold water, and fell of suche a bleeding withall, that his voyce was taken from him, and he almost stifled. Wherefore he sent the ACHAIANS their chiefest prisoners home againe, proroging the parlament till an other time, and returned backe to LACEDÆMON. It is supposed certainly, that this let of his comming to the dyet, was the onely cause of the vtter destruction of GRÆCE: the which otherwise was in good way to haue risen againe, and to haue bene deliuered from the present miseries, and extreame pride and couetousnes of the MACEDONIANS. For Aratus, either for that he trusted not Cleomenes, or for that he was affrayed of his power, or that he otherwise enuied his honor & prosperitie, to see him risen to such incredible great-
B nes in so short a time, and thinking it also too great shame and dishonor to him, to suffer this young man in a moment to depriue him of his great honor & power which he had possessed so long time, by the space of thirtie yeares together, ruling all GRÆCE: first, he sought by force to terrifie the ACHAIANS, and to make them breake of from this peate. But in fine, finding that they litle regarded his threats, & that he could not preuaile with them, for that they were affrayed of Cleomenes valliantnesse and corage, whose request they thought reasonable, for that he sought but to restore PELOPONNESVS into her former auncient estate againe: he fell then into a practise farre vnhoneste for a GRÆCIAN, verie infamous for him selfe, but most dishonorable for the former noble acts he had done. For he brought Antigonus into GRÆCE, Aratus treason to his contrie.
and in his age filled the contrie of PELOPONNESVS with MACEDONIANS, whom he himselfe C in his youth had driuen thence, had taken from them the castell of CORINTHE, and had alwayes bene an enemie of the kinges (but specially of Antigonus, of whom before he had spoken all the ill he coulde, as appeareth in his wrytings, saying that he tooke maruelous paines, and did put him selfe into many daungers, to deliuer the city of ATHENS from the garrison of the MACEDONIANS) and yet notwithstanding he brought them armed with his owne hands, not into his contrie only, but into his owne house, yea euen into the Ladies chambers & closets: disdaining that the king of LACEDÆMON, discending of the blood royall of Hercules (who setting vp againe the auncient maner of life of his contrie, did temper it as an instrument of musicke out of tune, and brought it to the good, auncient and sober discipline and DORICAN life instituted by Lycurgus) should be called and wrytten, king of the SICYONIANS, and of the D TRICCÆIANS. And furthermore, flying them that were contented with browne bread, and with the plaine course capes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and that went about to take awaye riches (which was the chiefest matter they did accuse Cleomenes for) and to prouide for the poore: he went and put him selfe and all ACHAIA vnto the crowne and diadeame, the purple robe, and prowde imperious commaundementes of the MACEDONIANS, fearing least men should thinke that Cleomenes coulde commaunde him. Furthermore his follie was such, that hauing garlands of flowers on his head, he did sacrifice vnto Antigonus, & sing songs in praise of his honor, as if he had bene a god, where he was but a rotten man, consumed away. This that we haue written of Aratus (who was indued with many noble vertues, & a worthy GRÆCIAN) is not so much to accuse him, as to make vs see the frayelty and weakenes of mans na-E ture: the which, though it haue neuer so excellent vertues, can not yet bring forth such perfit frute, but that it hath euer some mayme and bleamishe. Now, when the ACHAIANS were met againe in the citie of ARGOS, to hold the session of their parlament before proroged, and Cleomenes also being come from TEGEA, to be at that parlament: euerie man was in hope of good peace. But Aratus then, who was agreed before of the chiefest articles of the capitulacions with Antigonus, fearing that Cleomenes by fayre words or force would bring the people to graunt that he desired: sent to let him vnderstand, that he should but come him selfe alone into the citie, and for safetie of his person, they would geue him three hundred ostages: or otherwise, if he would not leaue his armie, that then they would geue him audience without the citie, in the place of exercises, called Cyllarabium. When Cleomenes had heard their an-F swere, he told them that they had done him wrong: for they should haue aduertised him of it before he had taken his iorney, and not now when he was almost hard at their gates, to sende him backe againe, with a flea in his eare. Thereuppon he wrote a letter vnto the counsell of the Achaians, altogether full of complaintes againſt Aratus. On thother ſide alſo, Aratus in his oration to the counſell, inueyed with bitter wordes againſt Cleomenes. Thereuppon Cleomenes departing with ſpeede, ſent a Herauld to proclaime warres againſt the Achaians, not in the city of Argos, but in the city of Ægion, as Aratus wryteth, meaning to ſet apon them being vnprouided. Hereuppon all Achaia was in an vprore: for diuers cities did preſently reuolt againſt the Achaians, bicauſe the common people hoped after the diuiſion of lands, and the diſcharging of their dettes. The noble men alſo in many places were offended with Aratus, bicauſe he practiſed to bring the Macedonians into the contrie of Peloponnesvs. Cleomenes therefore hoping well for all theſe reſpectes, brought his armie into Achaia, and at his firſt comming tooke the citie of Pallena, and draue out the garriſon of the Achaians: and after that, wanne alſo the cities of Phenevm, and Pentelivm. Now the Achaians fearing ſome treaſon in Corinthe and Sycione, ſent certaine horſemen out of the citie of Argos, to keepe thoſe cities. The Argives in the meane time, attending the celebracion of the feaſt at the games Nemeea, Cleomenes thinking (which fell out true) that if he went to Argos, he ſhould finde the citie full of people that were come to ſee the feaſtes and games, and that aſſailing them vppon the ſodaine, he ſhoulde put them in a maruelous feare: brought his armie in the night hard to the walls of the citie of Argos, and at his firſt comming wanne a place they call Aſpis, a verie ſtrong place aboue the Theater, and ill to come vnto. The Argives were ſo amazed at it, that no man would take apon him to defende the citie, but receiued Cleomenes garriſon, and gaue him twentie oſtages, promiſing thenceforth to be true confederates vnto the Lacedæmonians, vnder his charge and conduct. The which doubtles wanne him great fame, and increaſed his power: for that the auncient kings of Lacedæmon, could neuer before with any policie or deuiſe, winne the citie of Argos. For king Pyrrhus one of the moſt vallianteſt and warlikeſt Prince that euer was, entring the citie of Argos by force, could not keepe it, but was ſlaine there, and the moſt parte of his armie: wherby, euery man wondred greatly at the diligence & counſell of Cleomenes. And where euery man did mocke him before, when Cleomenes ſayd that he would follow Solon, and Lycurgus, in making the citizens goods common, and diſcharging all dets: they were then clerely perſwaded that he onely was the cauſe and meane of that great chaunge, which they ſawe in the corage of the Spartans: who were before ſo weake and out of hart, that they hauing no corage to defend them ſelues, the Ætolians entring Laconia, with an armie, tooke away at one time, fiftie thowſand ſlaues. Whereuppon an old man of Sparta pleaſauntly ſayd at that time, that their enemies had done them a great pleaſure, to ridde their contrie of Laconia of ſuche a rabble of raſcalls. Shortly after, they being entred againe into the former auncient diſcipline of Lycurgus, as if Lycurgus ſelfe had bene aliue to haue trained them vnto it: they ſhewed them ſelues verie valliant, and obedient alſo vnto their Magiſtrates, whereby they recouered againe the commaundement of all Græce, and the contrie alſo of Peloponnesvs. After Cleomenes had taken the citie of Argos, the cities alſo of Cleones, and Phlivnta, did yeelde them ſelues vnto him. Aratus in the meane time remayned at Corinthe, & there did buſily accuſe them which were ſuſpected to fauor the Lacedæmonians. But when newes was brought him that Argos was taken, & that he perceiued alſo the citie of Corinthe did leane vnto Cleomenes parte, and draue away the Achaians: he then calling the people to counſell in Corinthe, ſecretly ſtale to one of the gates of the citie, and cauſing his horſe to be brought vnto him, tooke his backe, and gallopped for life vnto the citie of Sicyone. When the Corinthians heard of it, they tooke their horſebackes alſo, ſtriuing who ſhoulde be there ſooneſt, and poſted in ſuche haſt vnto Cleomenes at the citie of Argos, that many of them (as Aratus wryteth) killed their horſes by the waye: howbeit Cleomenes was verie muche offended with them, for that they had let him ſcape their handes. But Aratus ſayth further, that Megiſtonus came vnto him from Cleomenes, and offered him a great ſumme of money to deliuer him the caſtell of Corinthe, wherein there was a great garriſon of the Achaians. But he aunſwered againe, that thinges were not in his powers, but rather that he was ſubiect to their power. Now Cleomenes departing from the city of Argos, ouercame the Troezenians, the Epidavrians, & the Hermionians. After that, he came vnto

A vnto CORINTHE, and presentlie entrenched the castell there rounde about, and sendinge for Aratus frendes and factors, commaunded them to keepe his house and goodes carefullie for him, and sent Tritymallus MESSENIAN againe vnto him, to praye him to be contented that the castell might be kept indifferentlie betwext the ACHAIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, promisinge him priuately to double the pencion that kinge Ptolomy gaue him. But Aratus refusinge it, sent his sonne vnto Antigonus with other ostages, and perswaded the ACHAIANS to deliuer vppe the castell of CORINTHE, vnto Antigonus handes. Cleomenes vnderstandinge it, entred with his armie into the contrie of the SICYONIANS, and destroyed it as he went, and tooke Aratus goodes and money, of the gift of the CORINTHIANS by decree. Nowe Antigonus in the meane tyme, beinge passed the mount-B tayne of Gerania with a greate power: Cleomenes determined not to fortifie the Isthmus or straight of PELOPONNESVS, but the wayes of the mountaynes Onienes, determininge to keepe euerie one of them against the MACEDONIANS, with intent to consume them rather by tyme, then to fight a battell with an armie, so good souldiers and well trayned as they were. Cleomenes followinge this determination, did putte Antigonus to greate trouble, bicause he had not in time prouided for corne: and coulde not winne the passage also by force, for that Cleomenes kept it with suche garde and souldiers. Then Antigonus stealinge secretely into the hauen of Lechæum, he was stowtly repulsed, and lost a number of his men: whereuppon Cleomenes and his men beinge couragious for this vi-C ctorie, went quietly to supper. Antigonus on thother side fell into dispaire, to see him selfe brought by necessitie into suche harde termes. Wherefore he determined to goe to the temple of Iuno, and from thence to passe his armie by sea into the citie of SICYONE, the which required a longe tyme, and greate preparacion. But the same night there came some of Aratus frendes of the ARGIVES, who comminge from ARGOS by sea, brought newes that the ARGIVES were rebelled against Cleomenes. The practiser of this rebellion, was one Aristoteles, who easelie brought the people vnto it, that were alreadie offended with Cleomenes, that had promised to passe a lawe for the clearinge of dettes, but performed it not accordinge to their expectacion. Wherefore, Aratus with a thowsande fiue hundred men which Antigonus gaue him, went by sea vnto EPIDAVRVM. Howebeit Aristoteles taried not his comminge, but takinge them of the citie with him, went and D besieged the garrison of the LACEDÆMONIANS within the castell, beinge ayded by Timoxenus, with the ACHAIANS that came from SICYONE. Cleomenes receiuinge aduertisement hereof, about the seconde watche of the night, sent for Megistonus in haste, and commaunded him in anger speedilie to goe and ayde their men that were in the citie of ARGOS. For it was Megistonus him selfe that promised Cleomenes the fidelitie of the ARGIVES, and that kept him from driuinge them out of the citie, which he suspected. So sendinge him awaye foorthwith with two thowsande men, he attended Antigonus; and comforted the CORINTHIANS the best he coulde: aduertisinge them that it was but a litle mutinie of a fewe, that chaunced in the citie of ARGOS. Megistonus beinge come to ARGOS, and slayne in battell, fightinge for the LACEDÆMONIANS in garrison there (who be-E inge in greate distresse, scant able to keepe the castell against the enemies) sent sundrie messengers vnto Cleomenes, to praye him to sende them immediate ayde. Cleomenes then beinge affrayed that the enemies hauinge taken ARGOS, woulde stoppe his way to returne backe into his contrie, who hauinge oportunitie safelie to spoyle LACONIA, and also to besiege the citie selfe of SPARTA, that had but a fewe men to defende it: he departed with his armie from CORINTHE. Immediatly after came Antigonus, and tooke it from him; and put a stronge garrison into it. When Cleomenes came before the citie of ARGOS, he scaled the walles, and breakinge the vawtes and arches of the place called Aspis, entred into the citie, and ioyned with his garrison there, which yet resisted the ACHAIANS: and takinge other partes of the same also, assaulted the walles, and cleared the streetes in suche F sorte, that not an enemie durst be seene, for feare of the archers of the CRETIANS. In the meane time, when he sawe Antigonus a farre of, comminge downe the hilles into the valley with his footemen, and that his horsemen also came apon the spurre into the citie:

disspayringe then that he coulde any lenger keepe it, he gathered all his men together, and A safelie goinge downe by the walles retyred without losse of any man. So, when in shorte tyme he had conquered muche, and had almost wonne all within PELOPONNESVS: in shorter space also, he lost all againe. For, of the confederates that were in his came, some did presentlie forsake him: others also immediatly after surrendered vp the townes vnto Antigonus. Cleomenes beinge thus oppressed with the fortune of warre, when he came backe to TEGEA with the rest of his armie, newes came to him in the night from LACEDÆMON, The death of Agiatis, king Cleomenes wife. which grieued him as muche as the losse of all his conquestes: for he was aduertised of the death of his wife Agiatis, whome he loued so dearelie, that in the middest of his chiefest prosperitie and victories, he made often iorneys to SPARTA to see her. It coulde not but be a maruelous griefe vnto Cleomenes, who beinge a younge man, had loste so vertuous and B fayer a younge Ladie, so dearelie beloued of him: and yet he gaue not place vnto his so-rowe, neither did griefe ouercome his noble courage, but he vsed the selfe same voyce, ap-parell, and countenaunce, that he did before. Then taking order with his priuate Captaines, about his affayres, and hauinge prouided also for the safetie of the TEGEANS: he went the next morninge by breake of daye vnto SPARTA. After he had priuately lamented the so-rowe of his wiues death, with his mother and children: he presentlie bent his minde againe to publike causes. Nowe Cleomenes had sent vnto Ptolomy kinge of ÆGYPT, who had promised him ayde, but apon demaunde, to haue his mother and children in pledge. So he was a longe tyme before he woulde for shame make his mother priuie vnto it, and went oftentymes of purpose to lette her vnderstande it: but when he came, he had not the harte C to breake it to her. She first suspectinge a thinge, asked Cleomenes frendes, if her sonne had not somewhat to saye vnto her, that he durst not vtter. Whereuppon, in fine he gaue the venter, and brake the matter to her. When she heardeit, she fell a laughinge, and they went by lande, accompanied with the armie, vnto the heade of Tænarus. Where Cra- she sayed vnto him: O kinge of LACEDÆMON, lette no man see for shame when we come power, and for the rest, as it pleaseth the goddes, so lette it be. When she had spoken these litle sonne of Cleomenes, and commaunded the maister of the shippe to hoyse sayle. Nowe when she was arriued in ÆGYPT, and vnderstoode that kinge Ptolomy receiued Ambassa-dours from Antigonus, and were in talke to make peace with him: and hearinge also that Cleomenes beinge requested by the ACHAIANS to make peace with them, durst not hearken to it, and ende that warre, without king Ptolomyes consent, and bicause of his mother: she wrote vnto him, that he shoulde not spare to doe any thinge that shoulde be expedient for E the honour of SPARTA, without feare of displeasing Ptolomy, or for regarde of an olde woman, and a younge boye. Suche was the noble minde of this worthie Ladie in her sonne Cleomenes aduersitie. Furthermore, Antigonus hauing taken the citie of TEGEA, and sacked the other cities of ORCHOMENVM, and MANTINEA: Cleomenes seeinge him selfe brought to defende the borders onely of LACONIA, he did manumise all the ILOTES, (which were the slaues of LACEDÆMON) payinge fiue Attica Minas a man. With that money he made the summe of fiue hundred talentes, and armed two thowsande of these freed slaues after the MACEDONIAN facion to fight against the LEVCASPIDES: (to witte, the white shieldes of Antigonus) and then there fell into his minde a maruelous greate enterprise, vn-looked for of euery man. The citie of MEGALIPOLIS at that time being as great as SPARTA, & F hauing the aide of the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus at hand, (whom the ACHAIANS as it seemed had brought in, chiefly at the request of the MEGALOPOLITANS) Cleomenes determininge

A to ſacke this citie, and knowing that to bring it to paſſe, nothing was more requiſite then celeritie: he commaunded his ſouldiers to vittell them ſelues for fiue dayes, and marching with the choyce of all his armie towardes SELASIA, as though he had ment to haue ſpoyled the ARGIVES, ſodainly turning from thence, he inuaded the contrie of the MEGALOPOLITANS, and ſupping by ROBIVM, went ſtraight by ELICVNTA vnto the citie. When he was come neere vnto it, he ſent Panteas before with ſpeede, with two bandes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commaunded him to take a certeine pece of the wall betwene two towers, which he knewe was not kept nor garded: and he followed him alſo with the reſt of his armie comming on fayer and ſoftly. When Panteas came thither, finding not onely that place of the wall without gard or watche which Cleomenes had told him of, but alſo the moſt parte of that B ſide without defence: he tooke ſome parte of the wall at his firſt comming, and manned it, and ouerthrew an other peece of it alſo, putting them all to the ſword that did defend it, and then came Cleomenes, and was within the citie with his armie, before the MEGALOPOLITANS knewe of his comming. At length, the citizens vnderſtanding that the citie was taken, ſome fled in haſt, conueying ſuche light things as came to hande, in ſo great a feare: and the others alſo arming them ſelues, ranne together to reſiſt the enemies. But though they valliantly fought to repulſe them out of the citie, and yet preuayled not: they gaue the reſt leiſure thereby to flye and ſaue them ſelues, ſo that there remayned not behinde, aboue a thowſande men. For all the reſt were fled with their wiues and children, into the citie of MESSENA. The moſt parte of them alſo that fought with the enemies, ſaued them ſelues, and verie C fewe were taken, the chiefeſt whereof, were Lyſandridas, and Thearidas, the nobleſt perſons that were amongeſt the MEGALOPOLITANS: wherefore when the ſouldiers had taken them, they brought them vnto Cleomenes. Lyſandridas, when he ſaw Cleomenes a good way of, cried out alowde vnto him: O king of LACEDÆMON, this day thou haſt an occaſion offered thee to doe a more famous princely acte, then that which thou haſt alreadie done, and that will make thy name alſo more glorious. Cleomenes muſing what he woulde requeſt: well (q he) what is that thou requireſt? One thing I will tell thee before hande, thou ſhalt not make me reſtore your citie to you againe. Yet, q Lyſandridas, lette me requeſt thus muche then, that ye doe not deſtroy it, but rather repleniſhe it with frendes and confederates, which hereafter will be true and faithfull to you: and that ſhall you doe, geuing the MEGALOPOLITANS D their citie againe, and preſeruing ſuche a number of people as haue forſaken it. Cleomenes pawſing a while, aunſwered, it was a hard thing to beleue that: but yet q he, let honor take place with vs, before profit. After that he ſent a Heraulde ſtraight vnto MESSENA vnto them that were fledde thither, and tolde them that he was contented to offer them their citie againe, ſo that they would becóme good frendes and confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS, forſaking the alliance of the ACHAIANS. Philopæmen would by no meanes ſuffer the MEGALOPOLITANS to accept this gracious offer of Cleomenes, nor alſo to leaue their alliance with the ACHAIANS: telling them, that he ment not to geue them their citie againe, but to take them alſo with their citie: and therefore draue Thearidas and Lyſandridas out of MESSENA, that moued this practiſe. It was that Philopæmen that afterwardes was the chiefeſt man of E the ACHAIANS, and that wanne ſuche fame and honor among the GRÆCIANS, as we haue particularly declared in his life. This worde being brought to Cleomenes, who had kept the city from ſpoyling vntill that time: he was then ſo thorowly offended, that he gaue the goods in praye to the ſouldiers, ſent away their goodly tables, images, and pictures vnto SPARTA, and defaced the chiefeſt partes of the citie, and then returned home againe, being affrayed of Antigonus, and the ACHAIANS. Howebeit they ſturred not, bicauſe of the parlament that was kept at that time in the citie of ÆGIVM, where Aratus being in the pulpit for orations, and holding his gowne a long time before his face, the people maruelling at it, willed him to tell what he ayled: he anſwered them, MEGALIPOLIS is taken, and raſed by Cleomenes. The ACHAIANS being amazed at the ſodainnes of this great loſſe, ſtraight brake of their F parlament and aſſemblie. But Antigonus thinking to ayde them, ſent preſently for all his garriſons, who being long a comming, he willed them to ſtay where they were, and he him ſelfe taking a fewe ſouldiers with him, went vnto the citie of ARGOS. Therefore the ſeconde

beit Polybius wryteth, that it was an attempt of greate wisedome and policie. For Cleomenes vnderstanding that the MACEDONIANS were dispersed in garrisons in diuers places, and that Antigonus lay all the winter in the citie of ARGOS, with a certeyne number of footemen that were straungers: he inuaded the contrie of the ARGIVES with his armie, perswading him selfe, that either Antigonus woulde for shame come and fight with him, or if he did not, that then he shoulde put him in disgrace with the ARGIVES: which in deede came so to passe. The ARGIVES seeinge their contrie spoyled by Cleomenes, were in a maruelous rage, and gatheringe together at Antigonus lodginge, they cryed out vnto him, either to goe into the fielde, and fight with the enemie: or else if he were affrayed, to resigne his office of Generall of GRÆCE, vnto others that were vallianter than him selfe. But Antigo- B nus like a wise and excellent Captayne, thinkinge it a dishonour to him rashely to put him selfe in daunger, and his frendes also, though he were prouoked with many iniuries and opprobrious wordes: woulde not goe into the fielde, but stoode constant in his first determination. Then Cleomenes hauing brought his armie hard to the walles of the citie of ARGOS, and spoyled and destroyed the contrie rounde about: without lette or daunger he safely returned home againe. Within a while after, Cleomenes beinge aduertised that Antigonus was come vnto TEGEA, with intent to inuade the contrie of LACONIA: he goinge an other way with his armie, (vnwitting to his enemies) they wondered when they saw him in the morning by the citie of ARGOS, spoylinge their contrie, and cuttinge downe their corne, not with sickles and knyues as other doe vse, but with long poles in forme of Sythes, C that the souldiers as they went sportingewise, did ouerthrowe and spoyle it. But when they came to the place of exercises in the suburbes, called Cyllabaris, certaine of the souldiers goinge about to haue sette it afire, Cleomenes woulde not suffer them, and tolde them, that what he had done at MEGALIPOLIS, it was rather angrily then honestlie done. Now Antigonus, presentlye returninge backe againe, beinge minded first to haue gone directly to the citie of ARGOS, but sodainely alteringe his minde, did campe vpon the toppe of hilles and mountaynes. Cleomenes seeminge not to be affrayed of him, sent Heraulde to him to desire the keyes of the temple of Iuno, and then after he had done sacrifice, he woulde departe his waye. Thus mockinge Antigonus, after he had sacrificed vnto the goddesse, vnder the temple that was shut vp, he sent his armie vnto PHLIVNTA, D and hauinge driuen awaye the garrison out of OLOGVNTA, he came vnto the citie of ORCHOMENVM, hauinge not onely incouraged his citizens, but gotten euen amongest the enemies them selues, a fame also to be a noble Captaine, and worthie to manage greate affaires. For euerie man iudged him to be a skillfull souldier, and a valliant Captaine, that with the power of one onely citie, did mainteine warre against the kingdom of MACEDON, against all the people of PELOPONNESVS, and against the treasure of so greate a king: and withall, not onely to keepe his owne contrie of LACONIA vnfoyled, but farre otherwise to hurte his enemies contries, and to take so many greate cities of theirs. But he that sayed first, that money was the sinewe of all thinges, spake it chiefly in my opinion, in respect of the warres. Demades the Orator sayed on a time, when the E ATHENIANS commaunded certaine gallies shoulde be put out of the arsenall into the sea, and presently rigged and armed with all possible speed, though they lacked money: he that rules the prowe, must first see before him. Meaning, munition and vittells must be prouided, before the shippes be sette out. And it is reported also, that the auncient Archidamus, when the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS at the beginninge of the warre of PELOPONNESVS required, that they might be sessed at a certeine rate, aunswered: the charges of warre haue no certeyne stinte. For like as wrestlers that exercise their bodies continuallie in games, are better able to wrestle, and ouerthrowe them with tyme, that haue no strength, but onely arte and slight: euen so Kinge Antigonus, who by the greatnesse of his kingdome did defraye the charge of this warre, did wea- F rie and ouercome Cleomenes at the length, bicause he lacked money bothe to paye the straungers that serued him, and also to mayntayne his owne citizens. For otherwise, Cleomenes ouercomen by Antigonus, for lacke of money to pay his souldiers.

A doubtleſſe the time ſerued his turne well, bicauſe the troubles that fell apon Antigonus in his realme, did make him to be ſent for home. For the barbarous people his neighbours, in his abſence did ſpoyle and deſtroye the realme of MACEDON, and ſpeciallie the ILLYRIANS of the high contrie that came downe then with a greate armie: whereupon, the MACEDONIANS being ſpoyled and harried on all ſides by them, they ſent poſte vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come home. If theſe letters had bene brought him but a litle before the battell, as they came afterwardes: Antigonus had gone his waye, and left the ACHAIANS. But fortune, that alwayes ſtriketh the ſtroke in all weightieſt cauſes, gaue ſuche ſpeede and fauour vnto time: that immediatly after the battell was fought at SELASIA, (where Cleomenes loſt his armie and citie) the verie meſſengers arriued that came for Antigonus to come home, B the which made the ouerthrowe of king Cleomenes ſo muche more lamentable. For if he had delayed battell but two dayes lenger, when the MACEDONIANS had bene gone, he might haue made what peace he would with the ACHAIANS: but for lacke of money, he was driuen (as Polybius wryteth) to geue battell, with twentie thowſande men, againſt thirtie thowſande: where he ſhewed him ſelfe an excellent and skilfull Captaine, and where his citizens alſo fought like valliant men, and the ſtraungers in like caſe did ſhewe them ſelues good ſouldiers. But his onely ouerthrowe was, by the manner of his enemies weapons, and the force of their battell of footemen. But Phylarchus wryteth, that treaſon was the cauſe of his ouerthrowe. For Antigonus had appointed the ACARNANIANS, and the ILLYRIANS which he had in his armie, to ſteale vppon the winge of his enemies armie, where Euclidas, king C Cleomenes brother was, to compaſſe him in behinde, whileſt he did ſette the reſt of his men in battell. When Cleomenes was got vp vpon ſome hill to looke about him, to ſee the countenaunce of the enemie, and ſeeing none of the ACARNANIANS, nor of the ILLYRIANS: he was then affrayed of Antigonus, that he went about ſome ſtratageame of warre. Wherefore he called for Demoteles, whoſe charge was to take heede of ſtratageames and ſecret ambuſhes, and commaunded him to looke to the rereward of his armie, and to be verie circumſpect all about. Demoteles, that was bribed before (as it is reported) with money, tolde him that all was cleere in the rereward, and bad him looke to ouerthrowe his enemies before him. Cleomenes truſting this reporte, ſette forward againſt Antigonus, and in the ende, his citizens of SPARTA which he had about him, gaue ſuche a fierce charge apon the ſquaD dron of the MACEDONIAN footemen, that they draue them backe fiue furlonges of. But in the meane time, Euclidas his brother, in the other wing of his armie, being compaſſed in behinde, Cleomenes turning him backe, and ſeeing the ouerthrowe, cried out alowde: alas, good brother, thou art but ſlaine, yet thou dyeſt valliantlie, and honeſtlie, and thy death ſhall be a worthie example vnto all poſteritie, and ſhall be ſong by the praiſes of the women of SPARTA. So Euclidas and his men being ſlaine, the enemies came ſtraight to ſette vpon Cleomenes winge. Cleomenes then ſeeing his men diſcouraged, and that they durſt no lenger reſiſt the enemie, fledde, and ſaued him ſelfe. Many of the ſtraungers alſo that ſerued him, were ſlaine at this battell: and of ſixe thowſande SPARTANS, there were left aliue but onely two hundred. Now Cleomenes being returned vnto SPARTA, the citizens comming to ſee him, E he gaue them counſell to yeeld them ſelues vnto Antigonus the conqueror: and for him ſelfe, if either aliue or dead he could doe any thing for the honor and benefit of SPARTA, that he would willingly doe it. The women of the citie alſo, comming vnto them that flying had eſcaped with him, when he ſaw them vnarme the men, and bring them drinke to refreſh them with: he alſo went home to his owne houſe. Then a maide of the houſe, which he had taken in the citie of MEGALIPOLIS (and whom he had enterteined euer ſince the death of his wife) came vnto him as her maner was, to refreſh him comming hot from the battell: howbeit he would not drinke though he was extreame drie, nor ſit being verie wearie, but armed as he was, layed his arme a croſſe apon a piller, and leaning his head apon it, repoſed himſelfe a litle, and caſting in his minde all the wayes that were to be thought of, he tooke his frendes F with him, and went to the hauen of Gythium, and there hauing his ſhippes which he had appointed for the purpoſe, he hoyſed ſayle, and departed his way. Immediatly after his departure, came Antigonus into the citie of SPARTA, and curteouſly intreated the citizens and inhabitants he found, and did offend no man, nor prowdly despise the auncient honor and dignitie of SPARTA: but referring them to their owne lawes and gouernment, when he had sacrificed to the goddes for his victorie, he departed from thence the thirde daye, newes being brought him that the warre was verie great in MACEDON, and that the barbarous people did spoyle his contrie. Now a disease tooke him, whereof he dyed afterwards, which appeared a tificke, mixt with a sore catarre: but yet he yeelded not to his disease, and bare it out, that fighting for his contrie, and obteyning a famous victorie, with great slaughter of the barbarous people, he might yet dye honorably, as in deede he did, by Phylarchus testimonie, who sayth, that with the force of his voyce, fiercely crying out in the middest of his fight, he tare his lunges and lightes, worse then they were before. Yet in the schooles it is sayd, that after he had wonne the battell, he was so ioyfull of it, that crying out, O blessed day: he brake out into a great bleeding at the mouth, and a great feuer tooke him withall, that he dyed of it. Thus much touching Antigonus. Now Cleomenes departing out of the Isle of CYTHERA, went and cast ancker in an other Iland, called ÆGIALIA. Then determining to saile ouer to the citie of CYRENA, Therycion, one of Cleomenes frendes (a man that in warres shewed him selfe verie valliant, but a boaster besides of his owne doinges) tooke Cleomenes aside, and sayd thus vnto him: Truely O king, we haue lost an honorable occasion to dye in battell, though euery man hath heard vs vaunt and say, that Antigonus should neuer ouercome the king of SPARTA aliue, but dead. A seconde occasion yet is offered vs to dye, with much lesse honor and fame notwithstanding, then the first. Whether doe we saile to no purpose? Why doe we flie the death at hand, and seeke it so farre of? If it be no shame nor dishonor for the posteritie & race of Hercules to serue the successors of Philip and Alexander: let vs saue then our labor, and long daungerous sailing, and goe yeelde our selues vnto Antigonus, who in likelyhoode will better vse vs then Ptolomy, bicause the MACEDONIANS are farre more nobler persons then the ÆGYPTIANS. And if we disdaine to be commaunded by them which haue ouercommen vs in battell, why then will we make him Lord of vs, that hath not ouercomen vs: in steade of one, to make vs inferior vnto both, flying Antigonus, and seruing king Ptolomy? Can we say that we goe into ÆGYPT, in respect to see your mother there? A ioyfull sight no doubt, when she shall shew king Ptolomyes wiues her sonne, that before was a king, a prisoner, & fugitiue now. Were it not better for vs, that hauing yet LACONIA our contrie in sight, and our swordes besides in our owne hands, to deliuer vs from this great miserie, & so doing to excuse our selues vnto them that are slaine at SELASIA, for defence of SPARTA: then cowardly loosing our time in ÆGYPT, to inquire whom Antigonus left his Lieutenaunt and Gouernor in LACEDÆMON? Therycion ending his oration, Cleomenes aunswered him thus: Doest thou thinke it a glorie for thee to seeke death, which is the easiest matter, and the presentest vnto any man, that can be: and yet, wretche that thou art: thou flyest now more cowardly and shamefully, then from the battell. For diuers valliant men, and farre better then our selues, haue often yeelded vnto their enemies, either by some misfortune, or compelled by greater number and multitude of men: but he say I, that submitteth him selfe vnto paine and miserie, reproache and praise of men, he can not but confesse that he is ouercome by his owne vnhappinesse. For, when a man will willingly kill him selfe, he must not doe it to be rid of paynes and labour, but it must haue an honorable respect and action. For, to liue or dye for his owne respect, that can not but be dishonorable: the which now thou perswadest me vnto, to make me flie this present miserie we are in, without any honor or profitte in our death. And therefore, I am of opinion, that we shoulde not yet cast of the hope we haue to serue our contrie in time to come: but when all hope fayleth vs, then we may easely make our selues awaye when we list. Thereunto Therycion gaue no aunswere, but as soone as he founde oportunitie to slippe from Cleomenes, he went to the sea side, and slewe him selfe. Cleomenes hoysinge sayle from the Ile of ÆGIALIA, went into AFRICKE, and was brought by the kinges seruauntes vnto the citie of ALEXANDRIA. King Ptolomy at his first comming, gaue Cleomenes no speciall good, but indifferent intertainment: but after that he had shewed him selfe to be of great wisedom and iudgement, and that Ptolomy saw in the simplicity of his LACONIAN life he had also a noble disposition and corage, nothing degenerating from the princely race & blood of Hercules, and

A and that he yelded not to his aduersitie: he tooke more delight in his company, then in all the company of his flatterers and hangers on him: and then repented him greatly, that he had made no more account of him before, but had suffered him to be ouerthrowne by Antigonus, who through the victory of him, had maruelously enlarged his honor and power. Then he began to comfort Cleomenes, and doing him as great honor as could be, promised that he would send him with shippes and money into GRÆCE, and put him againe into his kingdom: & further, gaue him an annuall pencion in the meane time, of foure and twenty talents, with the which he simply and soberly enterteyned him selfe and his men about him: and bestowed all the rest apon his contrymen that came out of GRÆCE into ÆGYPT. But now, old king Ptolomy deceasing before he could performe the promise he made vnto Cleomenes, to send him into B GRÆCE: the Realme falling then into great lasciuiousnes, dronckennes, and into the gouernment of women, his case and miserie was cleane forgotten. For the young king his sonne was so giuen ouer to women and wine, that when he was most sober, and in his best witts, he most disposed him selfe to make feastes and sacrifices, and to haue the taber playing in his Court, to gather people together, like a stage player or iugler, whileſt one Agathoclea his lemman, and her mother, and Oenanthes a bawde, did rule all the affayres of the state. But when he came to be king, it appeared he had neede of Cleomenes: bicause he was affraid of his brother Magas, who by his mothers meanes, was very wel esteemed of among souldiers. Wherefore he called Cleomenes to him, and made him of his priuy counsel, where he deuised by practise, which way to kill his brother. All other his friends that were of counsell with him, did counsell him to do C it: but Cleomenes onely vehemently disswaded him from it, and tolde him, that if it were possible, rather moe brethren should be begotten vnto the king for the safetie of his person, and for deuiding of the affayres of the kingdome betweene them. Amongest the kinges familliers that was chiefest about him, there was one Sosibius that said vnto Cleomenes: so long as his brother Magas liued, the souldiers that be straungers, whom the king entertayned, would neuer be true to him. Cleomenes aunswered him, for that matter there was no daunger: for sayth he, of those hiered straungers, there are three thowsand PELOPONNESIANS, which he knewe at the twinckling of an eye, would be at his commaundement, to come with their armor & weapon where he would appoynt them. These words of Cleomenes at that tyme shewed his fayth and good will he bare vnto the king, and the force he was of besides. But afterwards, Ptolomyes
D fearefulnes increasing his mistrust: (as it commonly hapneth, that they that lacke wit, thinke it the best safetie to be fearefull of euery wagging of a strawe, and to mistrust euery man) the remembrance of Cleomenes wordes made him much suspected of the Courtiers, vnderstanding that he could doe so much with the souldiers that were straungers: insomuch as some of them sayd, see (meaning Cleomenes) there is a lyon amongest sheepe. In deede, considering his facions and behauior, they might well say so of him: for he would looke thorough his fingers as though he saw nothing, and yet saw all what they did. In fine, he required an armie & ships of the king: and vnderstanding also that Antigonus was dead, and that the ACHAIANS and ÆTOLIANS were at great warres together, and that the affaires of his contry did call him home, all PELOPONNESVS being in armes and vprore, he prayed that they would licence him to de-E part with his friends. But neuer a man would giue eare vnto him, and the king also heard nothing of it, bicause he was continually entertained among Ladies, with banckets, daunsing, & maskes. But Sosibius that ruled all the Realme, thought that to keepe Cleomenes against his wil, were a hard thing, and also daungerous: and to let him goe also, knowing that he was a valiant man, and of a sturring minde, and one that knew the vices and imperfections of their gouernment: he thought that also no safe way, sithe no giftes nor presents that could be offered him, could soften him. For as the holy bull (which they call in ÆGYPT Apis) that is ful fed in goodly pasture, doth yet desire to followe his naturall course and libertie, to runne and leape at his pleasure, and plainely sheweth that it is a griefe to him to be kept stil by the Priest: euen so the courtly pleasures did nothing delight Cleomenes, but as Homer writeth of Achilles:

Cleomenes vertue.

F It irkt his noble hart to sit at home in slothfull rest, VVhen martiall matters vvere in hand, the vvhich he liked best.

Nowe Cleomenes standing in these tearmes, there arriued in ALEXANDRIA one Nicagoras Nicagoras Messenian, an enemy to Cleomenes.

MESSENIAN, who maliced Cleomenes in his hart, but yet shewed as though he loued him. This Nicagoras on a time had sold Cleomenes certein land, but was not payed for it, either bicause he had no present money, or els by occasiō of the warres which gaue him no leasure to make payment. Cleomenes one day by chaunce walking vpon the sandes, he sawe Nicagoras landing out of his shippe, being newly arriued, and knowing him, he curteously welcomed him, and asked what wind had brought him into ÆGYPT. Nicagoras gently saluting him againe, tolde him that he had brought the king excellent horse of seruice. Cleomenes smiling, told him, thou haddest bene better haue brought him some curtisans & daunsers, for they would haue pleased the king better. Nicagoras faintly laughed at his aunswer, but within few dayes after he did put him in remembraunce of the land he sold him, and prayed him then that he would helpe him to money, telling him that he would not haue prest him for it, but that he had susteyned losse by marchandise. Cleomenes aunswered him, that all his pension was spent he had of the king. Nicagoras being offended with this aunswer, he went and told Sosibius of the mocke Cleomenes gaue the king. Sosibius was glad of this occasion, but yet desiring further matter to make the king offended with Cleomenes, he perswaded Nicagoras to write a letter to the king agaynst Cleomenes, as though he had conspired to take the citie of CYRENA, if the king had giuen him shippes, money, and men of warre. When Nicagoras had written this letter, he tooke shippe, and hoysed sayle. Foure dayes after his departure, Sosibius brought his letter to the king, as though he had but newly receiued it. The king apon sight of it was so offended with Cleomenes, that he gaue present order he should be shut vp in a great house, where he should haue his ordinary dyet allowed him, howbeit that he should keepe his house. This grieued Cleomenes much, but yet he was worse affraid of that which was to come, by this occasion: Ptolomy the sonne of Chrysermus, one of the kings familliers, who had oftentimes before bene very conuersant and familliar with Cleomenes, and did franckly talke together in all matters: Cleomenes one daye sent for him, to praye him to come vnto him. Ptolomy came at his requeste, and familliarly discoursing together, went about to dissuade him from all the suspicions he had, and excused the king also for that he had done vnto him: so taking his leaue he left him, not thinking that Cleomenes followed him (as he did) to the gate, where he sharply tooke vp the souldiers, saying, that they were very negligent and careles in looking to such a fearefull beast as he was, & so ill to be taken, if he once escaped their handes. Cleomenes heard what he sayd, and went into his lodging againe, Ptolomy knowing nothing that he was behind him: and reported the very wordes againe vnto his friendes. Then all the SPARTANS conuerting their good hope into anger, determined to be reuenged of the iniurie Ptolomy had done them, and to dye like noble SPARTANS not tarying til they should be brought to the shambles like fat weathers, to be sold and killed. For it would be a great shame and dishonor vnto Cleomenes, hauing refused to make peace with Antigonus, a noble Prince and warrier: to tary the kinges pleasure till he had left his dronckennes and daunsing, and then to come and put him to death. They beeing fully resolued hereof, as you haue heard: king Ptolomy by chaunce went vnto the citie of CANOBVS, & first they gaue out in ALEXANDRIA, that the king minded to set Cleomenes at libertie. Then Cleomenes friendes obseruing the custom of the kings of ÆGYPT, when they ment to set a prisoner at libertie (which was, to send the prisoners meate, and presents before to their supper) did send vnto him such manner of presents, & so deceiued the souldiers that had the keeping of him, saying, that they brought those presents from the king. For Cleomenes him selfe did sacrifice vnto the goddes, and sent vnto the souldiers that kept him, parte of those presents that were sent vnto him, and supping with his friendes that night, made mery with them, euery man being crowned with garlands. Some say, that he made the more haste to execute his enterprise, sooner then he would haue done, by meanes of one of his men that was priuye vnto his conspiracie: who went euery night to lye with a woman he kept, and therefore was affraid lest he would bewray them. Cleomenes about noone, perceiuing the souldiers had take in their cuppes, and that they were a sleepe: he put on his coate, and vnripping it on the right shoulder, went out of the house with his sword drawen in his hand, accompanied with his friends, following him in that sort, which were thirty in all. Amongest them there was one called Hippotas, who being lame, went very liuely out with them at the first: but when he saw they went faier Cleomenes committed to prison in Alexandria.

Cleomenes practiseth to kill king Ptolomy.

A faier and ſoftly bicauſe of him, he prayed them to kil him, bicauſe they ſhould not hinder their enterpriſe for a lame man, that could doe them no ſeruice. Notwithſtanding, by chaunce they met with a townes man a horſebacke, that came hard by their dore, whome they pluckt from his horſe, and caſt Hippotas vppon him: and then ranne through the citie, and cryed to the people, libertie, libertie. Now the people had no other corage in them, but onely commended Cleomenes, and wondred at his valiantnes: but otherwiſe to follow him, or to further his enterpriſe, not a man of them had any hart in them. Thus running vp and downe the towne, they met with Ptolomy (the ſame whome we ſayde before was the ſonne of Chryſermus) as he came out of the Court: Whereuppon three of them ſetting on him, ſlue him preſently. There was alſo another Ptolomy that was gouernor and Lieuetenant of the citie of ALEXANDRIA: who B hearing a rumor of this ſturre, came vnto them in his coche. They went and met him, and firſt hauing driuen away his garde and ſouldiers that went before him, they pluckt him out of his coche, and ſlue him alſo. After that they went towards the caſtell, with intent to ſet all the priſoners there at libertie to take their part. Howbeit the gaylers that kept them had ſo ſtrongly locked vp the priſon dores, that Cleomenes was repulſed, and put by his purpoſe. Thus wandring vp and downe the citie, no man neither came to ioyne with him, nor to reſiſt him, for euery man fled for feare of him. Wherefore at length being weary with going vp and downe, he turned him to his friends, and ſayd vnto them: it is no maruell though women commaund ſuch a cowardly people, that flye in this ſort from their libertie. Thereuppon he prayed them all to dye like men, and like thoſe that were brought vp with him, and that were worthy of the C fame of his ſo noble deedes. Then the firſt man that made him ſelfe be ſlayne, was Hippotas, who dyed of a wound one of the younge men of his company gaue him with a ſword at his requeſt. After him euery man ſlue them ſelues, one after another, without any feare at all, ſauing Panteas, who was the firſt man that entred the citie of MEGALIPOLIS. He was a faier younge man, and had bene very well brought vp in the LACONIAN diſcipline, and better then any man of his yeares. Cleomenes did loue him dearely, and commaunded him that when he ſhould ſee he were dead, and all the reſt alſo, that then he ſhould kill him ſelfe laſt of all. Now they all being layed on the ground, he ſearched them one after another with the poynt of his ſword, to ſee if there were any of them yet left aliue: and when he had pricked Cleomenes on the heele amongeſt others, and ſaw that he did yet knit his browes, he kiſſed him, & ſate downe D by him. Then perceiuing that he had yelded vp the ghoſt, imbracing him when he was dead, he alſo ſlue him ſelfe, and fell vpon him. Thus Cleomenes hauing raigned king of SPARTA ſixteene yeares, being the ſame manner of man we haue deſcribed him to be: he ended his dayes in this ſort as ye heare. Now, his death being preſently bruted through the citie, Crateſiclea his mother, though otherwiſe ſhe had a noble minde, did notwithſtanding a litle forget her greatnes, through the extreame ſorow ſhe felt for the death of her ſonne: and ſo imbracing Cleomenes ſonnes, ſhe fell to bitter lamentacion. But the eldeſt of his ſonnes, (no man miſtruſting any ſuch matter) found meanes to get out of her handes, & running vp to the toppe of the houſe, caſt him ſelfe headlong downe to the ground, that his head was all broken and ſplitted, yet died not, but was taken vp crying, and angry with them, that they would not ſuffer him to dye.

The ende and death of Cleomenes and his friendes.

The corage of Panteas.

E This newes being brought to king Ptolomy, he commaunded they ſhould firſt flea Cleomenes, and then hange vp his body, and alſo, that they ſhould put his children, his mother, and all her women wayting on her to death: among the which was Panteas wife, one of the fayreſt and curteouſeſt women in her tyme. They had not beene longe maried before, when theſe miſchieues lighted apon them, at what tyme their loue was then in greateſt force. Her parents then would not let her depart, and imbarke with her husband, but had locked her vp, and kept her at home by force. Howbeit ſhortly after ſhe found the meanes to get her a horſe, & ſome money, and ſtale away in the night, and gallopped towards the hauen of Tænarus, where finding a ſhippe ready bound for ÆGYPT, ſhe imbarked, and went to ſeeke her husband, with whome ſhe gladly and louingly ledde her life, forſaking her owne contry, to liue in a ſtraunge F Realme. Now when the Sergeaunts came to take Crateſiclea to put her to death, Panteas wife led her by the arme, carying vp her traine, and did comfort her, although Crateſiclea otherwiſe was not affraid to dye, but onely asked this fauor, that ſhe might dye before her litle children.

This notwithstanding, when they came to the place of execution, the hangman first slue her children before her eyes, and then her selfe afterwards, who in such great griefe and sorowe, sayd no more but thus: Alas, my poore children, what is become of you? And Panteas wife also, being a mighty tall woman, girding her clothes to her, tooke vp the slayne bodies one after another, and wrapped them vp in such things as she could get, speaking neuer a word, nor shewing any signe or token of griefe: and in fine, hauing prepared her self to dye, and plucked of her attyre her selfe, without suffering any other to come neare her, or to see her, but the hangman that was appoynted to stryke of her head. In this sorte she dyed as constantly, as the stowtest man liuing could haue done, and had so couered her body, that no man needed after her death to touche her: so carefull was she to her ende, to keepe her honestie, which she had alwayes kept in her life, and in her death was mindefull of her honor, wherewith she decked her body in her life tyme. Thus these LACEDÆMON Ladies playing their partes in this pitifull tragedie, contending at the time of death, euen with the corage of the slayne SPARTANS their contrymen, which of them should dye most constantly: left a manifest proofe and testimonie, that fortune hath no power ouer fortitude and corage. Shortly after, those that were appoynted to keepe the body of king Cleomenes that hong vpon the crosse, they spied a great Serpent wreathed about his head, that couered all his face, insomuch as no rauening fowle durst come neare him to eate of it: whereuppon the king fell into a superstitious feare, being affrayd that he had offended the goddes. Hereuppon, the Ladyes in his Court began to make many sacrifices of purification, for the cleering of this sinne: perswading them selues, that they had put a man to death, beloued of the gods, and that he had something more in him then a man. The ALEXANDRINIANS thereuppon went to the place of execution, and made their prayers vnto Cleomenes, as vnto a demy god, calling him the sonne of the goddes. Vntill that the learned men brought them from that error, declaring vnto them, that like as of oxen being dead and rotten, there breede bees, and of horse also come waspes, & of asses likewise bitels: euen so mens bodies, when the marie melteth and gathereth together, doe bringe forth Serpents. The which comming to the knowledge of the auncients in olde tyme, of all other beastes they did consecrate the Dragon to Kinges and Princes, as proper vnto man.

TIBERIVS AND CAIVS GRACCHI.

NOW that we haue declared vnto you the hiſtorie of the liues of theſe two GRÆCIANS, Agis, and Cleomenes aforeſayd: we muſt alſo write the hiſtorie of two ROMANES, the which is no leſſe lamentable for the troubles and calamities that chaunced vnto Tiberius and Caius, both of them the ſonnes of Tiberius Gracchus. He hauing bene twiſe Conſul, and once Cenſor, and hauing had the honor of two triumphs: had notwithſtanding more honor and fame onely for his valiantnes, for the which he was thought worthy to marye with Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, who ouercame Hanniball after the deathe of his father: though while he liued he was neuer his friend, but rather his enemy. It is reported, that Tiberius on a tyme found two ſnakes in his bed, and that the Soothſayers and wyſards hauing conſidered the ſignification thereof, did forbid him to kill them both, and alſo to let them both eſcape, but one onely: aſſuring him that if he killed the male, he ſhould not liue long after: and if he killed the female, that then his wife Cornelia ſhoulde dye. Tiberius then louing his wife dearely, thinking it meeter for him alſo, that he being the elder of both, and ſhe yet a younge woman, ſhould dye before her: he ſlue the male, and let the female eſcape, howbeit he dyed ſoone after, leauing twelue children aliue, all of them begotten of Cornelia. Cornelia after the death of her husband, taking vpon her the rule of her houſe and children, led ſuch a chaſt life, was ſo good to her children, and of ſo noble a minde: that euery man thought Tiberius a wiſe man for that he dyed, and left her behind him. She remayning widow, king Ptolomy made ſute vnto her, and would haue made her his wife and Queene. But ſhe refuſed, and in her widowehed loſt all her children, but one Daughter, (whome ſhe beſtowed vpon the younger Scipio African) and Tiberius, and Caius, whoſe liues we preſently write. Thoſe ſhe ſo carefully brought vp, that they being become more ciuill, and better conditioned, then any other ROMANES in their time: euery man iudged, that education preuailed more in them, then nature. For, as in the fauors and pictures of Caſtor and Pollux, there is a certaine difference diſcerned, whereby a man may know that the one was made for wreſtling, and the other for running: euen ſo betwene theſe two young brethren, amongeſt other the great likenes betwene them, being both happely borne to be valiant, to be temperate, to be liberall, to be learned, and to be nobly minded, there grew notwithſtanding great difference in their actions and doings in the common wealth: the which I thinke conuenient to declare, before I proceede any farther. First of all, for the fauor of the face, the looke and mouing of the bodye, Tiberius was much more milde and tractable, and Caius more hotte and earneſt. For the firſt in his orations was very modeſt, and kept his place: and the other of all the ROMANES was the firſt, that in his oration ietted vp and downe the pulpit, and that plucked his gowne ouer his ſhowlders: as they write of Cleo ATHENIAN, that he was the firſt of all Orators that opened his gowne, and clapped his hand on his thighe in his oration. Furthermore, Caius wordes, and the vehemencie of his perſwaſion, were terrible and full of paſſion: but Tiberius wordes in contrary manner, were mild, and moued men more to compaſſion, beeing very propper, and excellently applyed, where Caius wordes were full of finenes and curioſitie. The like difference alſo was betwene them in their fare and dyet. For Tiberius alwayes kept a conuenient ordinarie: and Caius alſo in reſpect of other ROMANES, liued very temperately, but in reſpect of his brothers fare, curiouſly and ſuperfluouſly. Inſomuch as Druſus on a tyme reproued him, bicauſe he had bought certayne Dolphyns of ſiluer, to the value of a thowſand two hundred and fiftie Drachmas for euery pownd waight. And now, as touching the manners and naturall diſpoſition of them both, agreeing with the diuerſitie of their tongues, the one being milde and plauſible, and the other hotte and chollerike: inſomuch that otherwhile forgetting him ſelfe in his oration, agaynſt his will he would be very earneſt, and ſtrayne his voice beyond his compaſſe, and ſo with great vncomelines confound his wordes. Yet finding his owne fault, he deuiſed this remedye. He had a ſeruaunt called Licinius, a good wiſe man, who with an inſtrument of Muſicke he had, by the which they teache men to ryſe and fall in their tunes, when he was in his oration, he euer ſtoode behinde him: and when he perceyued that his Maiſters voyce was a litle too lowde, and that through choller he exceeded his ordinary ſpeache: he played a ſofte ſtoppe behinde him, at the ſownde whereof Caius immediatly fell from his extreamitie, and eaſily came to him ſelfe agayne. And here was the diuerſitie betweene them. Otherwiſe, for their hardines againſt their enemies, the iuſtice vnto their tennaunts, the care and paynes in their offices of charge, and alſo their continencie againſt voluptuouſnes: in all theſe they were both alike. For age, Tiberius was elder by nyne yeares, by reaſon whereof their ſeuerall authoritie and doings in the common wealth fell out at ſundry times. And this was one of the chiefeſt cauſes why their doings proſpered not, bicauſe they had not both authoritie in one ſelfe time, nether could they ioyne their power together: the which if it had mette at one ſelfe time, had bene of great force, & peraduenture inuincible. Wherefore we muſt write perticularly of them both, but firſt of all we muſt begin with the elder. He, when he came to mans ſtate, had ſuch a name and eſtimacion, that immediatly they made him fellow, in the colledge of the Prieſts, which at ROME are called Augures: (being thoſe that haue the charge to conſider of ſignes and predictions of things to come) more for his valiantnes, then for nobility. The ſame doth Appius Clodius witneſſe vnto vs, one that hath bene both Conſul and Cenſor, & alſo Preſident of the Senate, and of greater authoritie then any man in his time. This Appius at a ſupper when all the Augures were together, after he had ſaluted Tiberius, & made very much of him, he offered him his daughter in mariage. Tiberius was very glad of the offer, and therewithall the mariage was preſently concluded betwene them. Thereuppon Appius comming home to his houſe, at the threſhold of his dore he called a lowd for his wife, and told her Antiſtia, I haue beſtowed our Daughter Clodia. She wondring at it, ô goddes ſayd ſhe, and what needed all this haſte? what couldeſt thou haue done more, if thou haddeſt gotten her Tiberius Gracchus for her husband? I know that ſome refer this hiſtorie vnto Tiberius, father of theſe two men we write of, and vnto Scipio the AFRICAN: but the moſt part of writers agree with that we write at this preſent. And Polybius him ſelfe alſo writeth, that after the death of Scipio AFRICAN, his friendes beeing met together, they choſe Tiberius before all the other younge men of the citie, to marye him vnto Cornelia, being free, and vnpromiſed, or beſtowed apon any man by her father. Now Tiberius the yonger being in the warres in AFRICKE vnder Scipio the ſecond, who had maryed his ſiſter: lying in his tent with him, he found his Captaine indued with many noble giftes of nature, to allure mens harts to deſire to follow his valiantnes. So in a ſhort tyme he did excell all the younge men of his tyme, aſwell in obedience, as in the

A valiantnes of his perſon: inſomuch that he was the firſt man that ſcaled the walles of the enemies, as Fannius reporteth, who ſayeth that he ſcaled the walles with him, and did helpe him in that valiant enterpriſe. So that being preſent, all the campe were in loue with him: & when he was abſent, euery man wiſhed for him againe. After this warre was ended, he was choſen Treaſorer, and it was his chaunce to goe againſt the NVMANTINES, with Caius Mancinus one of the Conſuls, who was an honeſt man, but yet had the worſt lucke of any Captaine the ROMANES had. Notwithſtanding, Tiberius wiſedome and valiantnes, in this extreame ill lucke of his Captaine, did not onely appeare with great glorye to him, but alſo moſt wonderfull, the great obedience and reuerence he bare vnto his Captaine: though his misfortunes did ſo trouble and grieue him, that he could not tell him ſelfe, whether he was Captaine or not. Tiberius Gracchus choſen Queſtor.

B For when he was ouerthrowen in great foughten fieldes, he departed in the night, and left his campe. The NVMANTINES hearing of it, firſt tooke his campe, and then ranne after them that fled, and ſetting vpon the rereward, ſlue them, and enuyronned all his armye. So that they were driuen into ſtraight and narrowe places, where out they could by no meanes eſcape. Thereuppon Mancinus diſpayring that he could get out by force, he ſent a Herauld to the enemyes to treate of peace. The NVMANTINES made aunſwer, that they would truſt no man but Tiberius onely, and therefore they willed he ſhoulde bee ſent vnto them. They deſired that, partly for the loue they bare vnto the vertues of the younge man, bicauſe there was no talke of any other in all this warre but of him: and partly alſo, as remembring his father Tiberius, who making warres in SPAYNE, and hauing there ſubdued many nations, he

C graunted the NVMANTINES peace, the which he cauſed the ROMANES afterwardes to confirme and ratifie. Hereuppon Tiberius was ſent to ſpeake with them, and partly obteyning that he deſired, and partly alſo graunting them that they required: he concluded peace with them, whereby aſſuredly he ſaued the liues of twenty thowſande ROMANE Citizens, beſides ſlaues and other ſtragglers that willingly followed the campe. This notwithſtanding, the NVMANTINES tooke the ſpoyle of all the goods they founde in the ROMANES campe, amonge the which they founde Tiberius bookes of accompt touching the money diſburſed of the treaſure in his charge. Tiberius beeing maruailous deſirous to haue his bookes agayne, returned backe to NVMANTIA with two or three of his friendes onely, though the armye of the ROMANES were gone farre on their waye. So comming to the towne, he ſpake vnto the go- Tiberius Gracchus concludeth peace with the Numantines.

D uernors of the citie, and prayed them to redeliuer him his bookes of accompt, bicauſe his malicious enemies ſhould not accuſe him, calling him to accompt for his doings. The NVMANTINES were very glad of this good happe, and prayed them to come into the towne. He ſtanding ſtill in doubt with him ſelfe what to doe, whether he ſhould goe into the towne or not: the gouernors of the citie came to him, and taking him by the hande, prayed he would thinke they were not his enemies, but good friendes, and that he would truſt them. Whereuppon Tiberius thought beſt to yeelde to their perſwaſion, beeing deſirous alſo to haue his bookes agayne, and the rather, for feare of offending the NVMANTINES, if he ſhoulde haue denyed and miſtruſted them. When he was brought into the citie, they prouided his dynner, and were very earneſt with him, intreating him to dyne with them. Then they gaue him

E his bookes againe, and offered him moreouer to take what he woulde of all the ſpoyles they had gotten in the campe of the ROMANES. Howebeit of all that he woulde take nothing but frankenſence, which he vſed, when he did any ſacrifice for his contry: and then taking his leaue of them, with thankes he returned. When he was returned to ROME, all this peace concluded was vtterly miſliked, as diſhonorable to the maieſtie of the Empire of ROME. Yet the parents and friendes of them that had ſerued in this warre, making the greateſt part of the people: they gathered about Tiberius, ſaying that what faultes were committed in this ſeruice, they were to impute it vnto the Conſul Mancinus, and not vnto Tiberius, who had ſaued ſuch a number of ROMANES liues. Notwithſtanding, they that were offended with this The peace broken with the Numantines.

F diſhonorable peace, would that therein they ſhould follow the example of their forefathers in the like caſe. For they ſent backe their Captaines naked vnto their enemies, bicauſe they were contented the SAMNITS ſhould ſpoyle them of that they had, to eſcape with life. Moreouer, they did not onely ſend them the Captaines and Conſuls, but all thoſe alſo that bare any office in the fielde, and had consented vnto that condition: to the ende they might lay all the periurie and breache of peace apon them. Herein therefore did manifestly appeare, the loue and good will the people did beare vnto Tiberius. For they gaue order, that the Consul Mancinus should be sent naked, and bound vnto the NVMANTINES, and for Tiberius sake, they pardoned all the rest. I thinke Scipio, who bare great sway at that time in ROME, and was a man of greatest accompt, did helpe him at that pinche: who notwithstanding was ill thought of, bicause he did not also saue the Consul Mancinus, and confirme the peace concluded with the NVMANTINES, considering it was made by Tiberius his friend & kinsman. But these mislikings grew chiefly through the ambition of Tiberius friendes, & certein learned men, which stirred him vp against Scipio. But yet it fell not out to open malice betwene them, neither followed there any hurte apon it. And surely I am perswaded, that Tiberius had not fallen into those troubles he did afterwards, if Scipio AFRICAN had bene present, when he passed those thinges he preferred. But Scipio was then in warres at the seege of NVMANTIA, when Tiberius apon this occasion passed these lawes. When the ROMANES in olde tyme had ouercomen any of their neighbours, for raunsom they tooke oftentymes a great deale of their land from them, parte whereof they solde by the cryer, for the benefite of the common wealth, and parte also they reserued to their state as demeane, which afterwards was let out to farme for a small rent yearely, to the poore Citizens that had no lands. Howbeit the riche men inhaunsed the rents, and so began to thrust out the poore men. Thereuppon was an ordinance made, that no Citizen of ROME should haue aboue fiue hundred acres lande. This lawe for a tyme did bridle the couetousnes of the riche men, and did ease the poore also that dwelt in the contry, apon the farmes they had taken vp of the common wealth, and so liued with their owne, or with that their Aunceſtors had from the beginning. But by proces of time, their riche neighbours, by names of other men, got their farmes ouer their heads, and in the end, the most of them were openly seene in it in their own names. Whereuppon, the poore people being thus turned out of all, went but with faint corage afterwards to the warre, nor cared any more for bringing vp of children: So that in short time, the free men left ITALY, and slaues and barbarous people did repleniſh it, whom the rich men made to plough those landes, which they had taken from the ROMANES. Caius Lælius, one of Scipioes friends, gaue an attempt to reforme this abuse: but bicause the chiefest of the citie were against him, fearing it would breake out to some vprore, he desisted from his purpose, and therefore he was called Lælius the wise. But Tiberius being chosen Tribune, he did forthwith preferre the reformation aforesayd, being allured vnto it (as diuers writers report) by Diophanes the Orator, and Bloßius the Philosopher: of the which, Diophanes was banished from the citie of MITYLENE, and Bloßius the ITALIAN from the citie of CVMES, who was scholler and familliar vnto Antipater of TARSVS at ROME, by whome he was honored by certaine workes of Philosophie he dedicated vnto him. And some also do accuse their mother Cornelia, who did twit her sonnes in the teeth, that the ROMANES did yet call her Scipioes mother in law, and not the mother of the GRACCHI. Other say it was Spurius Posthumius, a companion of Tiberius, and one that contended with him in eloquence. For Tiberius returning from the warres, and finding him farre beyond him in fame and reputacion, and well beloued of euery one: he sought to excell him by attempting this noble enterprise, and of so great exspectacion. His owne brother Caius in a certaine booke, wrote, that as he went to the warres of NVMANTIA, passing through THVSCAN, he founde the contrye in manner vnhabited: and they that did followe the ploughe, or keepe beastes, were the moste of them slaues, and barbarous people, comen out of a straunge contrie. Whereuppon euer after it ranne in his minde to bringe this enterprise to passe, which brought great troubles to their house. But in fine, it was the people onely that moste set his harte afire to couet honor, and that hastened his determinacion: first bringing him to it by bylles sette vppe on euery wall, in euery porche, and vppon the tombes, praying him by them to cause the poore Citizens of ROME to haue their landes restored, which were belonging to the common wealth. This notwithstanding he him selfe made not the lawe alone of his owne head, but did it by the counsell and aduise of the chiefest men of ROME, for vertue and estimation: Amonge the which, Crassus the high Bishoppe was one, and Mutius Scæuola the Lawyer, that then was Consul, Counsellers to Tiberius for preferring the law.

A Conſul, and Appius Claudius his father in lawe. And truely it ſeemeth, that neuer lawe was made with greater fauor, then that which he preferred againſt ſo great iniuſtice, and auarice. For thoſe that ſhould haue bene puniſhed for tranſgreſſing the lawe, and ſhould haue had the landes taken from them by force, which they vniuſtly held againſt the lawe of Rome, and that ſhould alſo haue bene amerced for it: he ordeyned that they ſhould be payed by the common wealth to the value of the landes, which they held vniuſtly, and ſo ſhould leaue them to the poore Citizens againe that had no land, and lacked helpe and reliefe. Now, though the reformation eſtabliſhed by this lawe, was done with ſuch great fauor: the people notwithſtanding were contented, and would forget all that was paſt, ſo that they might haue no more wrongs offred them in time to come. But the rich men, and men of great poſſeſſions, hated the lawe for B their auarice, and for ſpight and ſelfwill (which would not let them yeeld) they were ſtudied in ſhode with the Lawyer that had preferred the lawe, and ſought by all deuiſe they could to diſſwade the people from it: telling them that Tiberius brought in this law Agraria againe, to diſturbe the common wealth, and to make ſome alteracion in the ſtate. But they preuailed not. For Tiberius defending the matter, which of it ſelfe was good and iuſt, with ſuch eloquence as might haue iuſtified an euill cauſe, was inuincible: and no man was able to argue againſt him to confute him, when ſpeaking in the behalfe of the poore Citizens of Rome, the people being gathered round about the pulpit for orations) he told them, that the wild beaſtes through Italy had their dennes and caues of abode, and that the men that fought, and were ſlaine for their contry, had nothing els but ayer and light, & ſo were compelled to wander vp & down C with their wiues & children, hauing no reſting place nor houſe to put their heads in: and that the Captaines do but mocke their ſouldiers, when they encorage them in battel to fight valiantly for the graues, the temples, their owne houſes, & their predeceſſors. For, ſaid he, of ſuch a number of poore Citizens as there be, there can not a man of them ſhew any auncient houſe or tombe of their auncеſtors: bicauſe the poore men doe go to the warres, & be ſlaine for the rich mens pleaſures and wealth: beſides they falſely cal them Lordes of the earth, where they haue not a handfull of ground, that is theirs. Theſe & ſuch other like wordes being vttered before all the people with ſuch vehemency & trothe, did ſo moue the common people withall, and put them in ſuch a rage, that there was no aduerſarye of his able to withſtand him. Therefore, leauing to contrary and deny the lawe by argument, the rich men did put all their truſt in D Marcus Octauius, colleague and fellow Tribune with Tiberius in office, who was a graue and wiſe young man, and Tiberius very familiar friend. So that the firſt time they came to him, to oppoſe him againſt the confirmation of this lawe: he prayed them to holde him excuſed, bicauſe Tiberius was his very friend. But in the ende, being compelled vnto it through the great number of the riche men that were importunate with him: he did withſtande Tiberius lawe, the which was enoughe to ouerthroweit. For if any one of the Tribunes ſpeake againſt it, though all the other paſſe with it, he ouerthroweth it: bicauſe they all can doe nothing, if one of them be againſt it. Tiberius being very much offended with it, proceeded no further in this firſt fauorable law, and in a rage preferred an other more gratefull to the common people, as alſo more extreme againſt the riche. In that law he ordeyned, that whoſoeuer had any landes E contrary to the auncient lawes of Rome, that he ſhould preſently depart from them. But thereuppon there fel out cõtinual brawles in the pulpit for orations, againſt Octauius: in the which, though they were very earneſt and vehement one againſt another, yet there paſſed no fowle words from them, (how hot ſoeuer they were one with another) that ſhould ſhame his companion. Whereby it appeareth, that to be well brought vp, breedeth ſuch a ſtay & knowledge in a man, not onely in things of pleaſure to make him regard his credit, both in word & deede: but in paſſion and anger alſo, & in their greateſt ambition of glory. Thereuppon Tiberius finding that this lawe among others touched Octauius, bicauſe he enioyed a great deale of landes that was the common wealthes: he prayed him ſecretly to contend no more againſt him, promiſing him to giue him of his owne, the value of thoſe lands which he ſhould be driuen to forſ F ſake, although he was not very able to performe it. But when he ſawe Octauius would not be perſwaded, he then preferred a law, that all Magiſtrats and Officers ſhould ceaſe their authoritie, till the law were either paſt, or reiected, by voices of the people: & thereuppon he ſet his own seale vpon the doores of the temple of Saturne, where the cofers of the treasure lay, himself the treasurers them selues during that time, should neither take out nor put in any thing, vpon great penalties to be forfited by the Praetors or an other Magistrat of authority, that should breake this order. Hereuppon all the Magistrates fearing this penaltie, did leaue to exercise their office for the time. But then the riche men that were of great liuings, chaunged their ap parell, and walked very sadly vp and downe the market place, and layed secret wayte to take Tiberius, hauing hyred men to kill him: which caused Tiberius him selfe, openly before them all, to weare a shorte dagger vnder his longe gowne, properly called in Latine, Dolon. When the day came that this lawe should be established, Tiberius called the people to giue their voyces: and the riche men on the other side, they tooke away the pots by force, wherein the papers of mens voyces were throwen, so that there was like to fall out great stirre vpon it. For the faction of Tiberius was the stronger side, by the number of people that were gathered about him for that purpose: had it not bene for Manlius & Fabius, both the which had ben Consuls, who went vnto him, & besought him with the teares in their eies, & holding vp their hands, that he would let the lawe alone. Tiberius thereuppon, foreseeing the instant daunger of some great mischief, as also for the reuerence he bare vnto two such noble persons, he stayed a litle, & asked them what they would haue him to doe. They made answer, that they were not able to counsel him in a matter of so great waight, but they praied him notwithstanding, he would be contented to referre it to the iudgement of the Senate. Thereuppon he graunted them presently. But afterwards perceiuing that the Senate sate apon it, & had determined nothing, bycause the rich men were of too great authoritie: he entred into another deuise that was neither honest nor meete, which was, to depriue Octauius of his Tribuneship, knowing that otherwise he could not possibly come to passe the law. But before he tooke that course, he openly intreated him in the face of the people with courteous words, and tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to stand no more against him, & to doe the people this pleasure, which required a matter iust & reasonable, & onely requested this final recompence for the great paines they tooke in seruice abroad for their contry. Octauius denied him plainely. Then said Tiberius openly, that both of them being brethren in one selfe place and authoritie, & contrary one to another in a matter of so great waight, this contencion could not be possibly ended, without ciuill warre: and that he could see no way to remedy it, vnles one of them two were deposed from their office. Thereuppon he bad Octauius begin first with him, & he would rise from the benche with a good will, and become a priuate man, if the people were so contented. Octauius would doe nothing in it. Tiberius then replyed, that he would be doing with him, if he altered not his mind, apon a better breathe and consideracion: and so dismissed the assemblye for that daye. The next morning the people being againe assembled, Tiberius going vp to his seate, attempted agayne to perswade Octauius to leaue of. In fine, finding him still a man vnremoueable, he referred the matter to the voyce of the people, whether they were contented Octauius should be deposed from his office. Nowe there were fiue and thirtie trybes of the people, of the which seuenteene of them had already passed their voyces agaynst Octauius, so that there remayned but one tryb more to put him out of his office. Then Tiberius made them staye for proceeding any further, and prayed Octauius agayne, imbracing him before all the people, with all the intreatye possible: that for selfewill sake he would not suffer such an open shame to be done vnto him; as to be put out of his office: neither also to make him the occasion and instrument of so pitifull a deede. They saye that Octauius at this last intreatie was somewhat moued and wonne by his perswasions, and that weeping, he stayed a longe tyme, and made no answer. But when he looked apon the riche men that stoode in a great company together, he was ashamed (I thinke) to haue their ill willes, and rather betooke him selfe to the losse of his office, and so bad Tiberius doe what he would. Thereuppon he beeing deposed by voyces of the people, Tiberius commaunded one of his infranchised bondmen to pull him out of the pulpit for orations: for he vsed his infranchised bondmen in steede of Seruitours. This made the sight so much more lamentable, to see Octauius thus shamefully plucked away by force. Yea furthermore, the common people would haue ronne apon him, but the riche men came to rescue him, and would not suffer him to doe him further hurte.

Tiberius deposeth Octauius of his Tribuneship.

A So Octauius saued him selfe running away alone, after he had bene rescued thus from the fury of the people. Moreouer, there was a faithfull seruaunt of Octauius, who stepping before his Maister to saue him from hurt, had his eyes pulled out, against Tiberius minde, who ranne to the rescue with all speede when he heard the noyse. After that, the lawe Agraria passed for diuision of landes, and three Commissioners were appoynted to make inquirie and distribution thereof. The Commissioners appoynted were these: Tiberius him selfe: Appius Claudius his father in lawe, and Caius Gracchus his brother: who was not at that tyme in Rome, but in the campe with Scipio AFRICAN, at the seege of the citie of NVMANTIA. Thus Tiberius very quietly passed ouer these matters, and no man durst withstand him: and furthermore, he substituted in Octauius place no man of qualitie, but onely one of his followers, called Mutius. Tiberius preferreth the law Agraria.

B Wherewith the noble men were so sore offended with him, that fearing the increase of his greatnes, they being in the Senate house did what they could possible to doe him despyte and shame. For when Tiberius demaunded a tent at the charge of the common wealth, when he should goe abroad to make diuision of these landes, as they vsually graunted vnto others, that many tymes went in farre meaner commissions: they flatly denyed him, and through the procurement of P. Nasica (who being a great landed man in his contry, shewed him selfe in this action his mortall enemie, taking it greeuously to be compelled to depart from his land) onely graunted him nyne of their obuli a day, for his ordinarye allowance. But the people on the other side were all in an vprore against the riche. Insomuch as one of Tiberius frendes beeing deade vppon the sodaine, vppon whose body beeing deade there appeared very ill signes: the

C common people ranne sodainely to his buriall, and cryed out that he was poysoned: And so taking vppe the beere whereon his bodie laye vppon their showlders, they were present at the fire of his funeralls, where immediatly appeared certaine signes to make them suspect, that in deede there was vehement cause of presumption he was poysoned. For his belly burst, whereout there issued such aboundance of corrupt humors, that they put out the first fire, and made them fetche another, the which also they could not make to burne, vntil that they were compelled to cary the bodie into some other place, where notwithstanding they had much a doe to make it burne. Tiberius seeing that, to make the common people mutyne the more, he put on mourning apparell, and brought his sonnes before them, and besought the people to be good vnto them and their mother, as one that dispayred of his health and safetie. About that

D tyme dyed Attalus, surnamed Philopater, and Eudemus PERGAMENIAN brought his will to ROME, in the which he made the people of ROME his heires. Wherefore Tiberius, still to encrease the good wil of the common people towards him, preferred a law immediatly, that the ready money that came by the inheritaunce of this king shoulde bee distributed amonge the poore Citizens, on whose lot it should fall to haue any parte of the diuision of the landes of the common wealth, to furnishe them towardes house, and to set vppe their tillage. Furthermore, he sayd, that concerning the townes and cities of the kingdome of Attalus, the Senate had nothing to doe to take any order with them, but that the people were to dispose of them, and that he him selfe would put it out. That made him againe more hated of the Senate then before, insomuch as there was one Pompey a Senator, that standing vp, sayde: that he was next

E neighbour vnto Tiberius, and that by reason of his neighbourhed he knew that Eudemus PERGAMENIAN had giuen him one of king Attalus royall bands, with a purple gowne besides, for a token that he should one day be king of ROME. And Quintus Metellus also reproued him, for that his father being Censor, the ROMANES hauing supped in the towne, and repayring euery man home to his house, they did put out their torches and lights, bicause men seeing them returne, they should not thinke they taryed too long in companie bancketing: and that in contrary maner, the seditious and needy rabble of the common people did light his sonne home, and accompany him all night long vp and downe the towne. At that tyme there was one Titus Annius, a man that had no goodnes nor honestie in him, howbeit taken for a great reasoner, and for a suttell questioner and aunswerer. He prouoked Tiberius to aunswer him, whe-

F ther he had not committed a shamefull facte to his companion and brother Tribune, to defame him, that by the lawes of ROME should haue bene holy, & vntouched. The people tooke this prouocation very angrily, and Tiberius also comming out, and hauing assembled the people, commaunded them to bringe this Annius before him, that he might be endyted in the market place: But he finding him selfe farre inferior vnto Tiberius, both in dignitie and eloquence, ranne to his fine suttill questions, to take a man at his worde: and prayed Tiberius before he did proceede to his accusation, that he would first aunswer him to a question he would aske him. Tiberius bad him saye what he would. So silence being made, Annius asked him: if thou wouldest defame me, and offer me iniurie, and that I called one of thy companions to helpe me, and he should ryse to take my parte, and anger thee: wouldest thou therefore put him out of his office? It is reported that Tiberius was so grauelled with this question, that though he was one of the readiest speakers, and the boldest in his orations of any man: yet at that tyme he held his peace, and had no power to speake, and therefore he presently dismissed the assemblie. Afterwards, vnderstanding that of al the things he did, the deposing of Octauius from his office was thought (not onely of the nobilitie, but of the common people also) as fowle and wilfull a parte as euer he played, for that thereby he had imbased, and vtterly ouerthrowen the dignitie of the Tribunes, the which was alwayes had in great veneration vntill that present tyme: to excuse him selfe therefore, he made an excellent oration to the people, whereby shall appeare vnto you some special poyntes thereof, to discerne the better the force and effect of his eloquence. The Tribuneship sayd he, in deede was a holy and sacred thing, as perticularly consecrated to the people, and established for their benefit and safetie: Where contrariwise, if the Tribune doe offer the people any wronge, he thereby minisheth their power, and taketh away the meanes from them to declare their wills by voyces, besides that, he doth also imbase his owne authoritie, leauing to doe the thing for the which his authority first was giuen him. Or otherwise we could not choose but suffer a Tribune, if it pleased him, to ouerthrow the Capitoll, or to set fire on the arsenall: and yet notwithstanding this wicked part, if it were committed, he should be Tribune of the people still, though a lewde Tribune. But when he goeth about to take away the authoritie and power of the people, then he is no more a Tribune. Were not this against all reason, thinke you, that a Tribune when he list, may take a Consul, and commit him to prison: and that the people should not withstand the authoritie of the Tribune, who gaue him the same, when he would vse his authoritie to the preiudice of the people? for the people are they that doe choose, both Consul and Tribune. Furthermore, the kingly dignitie (bicause in the same is conteyned the absolute authoritie and power of all other kindes of Magistrates and offices together) is consecrated with very great and holy ceremonies, drawing very neare vnto the godhed: and yet the people expulsed king Tarquin, bicause he vsed his authoritie with crueltie, and for the iniurie he offered one man onely, the most auncient rule and gouernment, (by the which the foundacion of Rome was first layed) was vtterly abolished. And who is there in all the citie of Rome to be reckoned so holy as the Vestall Nunnes, which haue the custodie and keeping of the euerlasting fire? and yet if any of these be taken in fornication, she is buried aliue for her offence: for when they are not holy to the goddes, they lose the libertie they haue, in respect of seruing the goddes. Euen so also it is vnmeete, that the Tribune if he offend the people, should for the peoples sake be reuerenced any more: Seeing that through his owne folly he hath depriued him selfe of that authoritie they gaue him. And if it be so that he was chosen Tribune by the most parte of the trybes of the people: then by greater reason is he iustly depriued, that by all the whole trybes together is forsaken and deposed? There is nothing more holy nor inuiolate, then thinges offered vp vnto the goddes: and yet it was neuer seene that any man did forbid the people to take them, to remoue and transport them from place to place, as they thought good. Euen so, they may as lawfully transferre the office of the Tribune vnto any other, as any other offring consecrated to the goddes. Furthermore, it is manifest that any Officer or Magistrate may lawfully depose him selfe: For, it hath bene often seene, that men in office haue depriued them selues, or otherwise haue sued to be discharged. This was the effect of Tiberius purgation. Now his friendes perceiuing the threats the riche and noble men gaue out against him, they wished him for the safetie of his person, to make sute to be Tribune againe the next yeare. Whereuppon he began to flatter the common people againe afresh, by new lawes which he preferred: by the which he tooke away the time and number of yeares prescribed, when euery

A citizen of Rome was bound to goe to the warres being called, and his name billed. He made it lawfull also for men to appeale from sentence of the Iudges vnto the people, and thrust in also amongst the Senators (which then had absolute authoritie to iudge among them selues) a like number of the Romane Knightes, and by this meanes sought to weaken and imbase the authority of the Senate, increasing also the power of the people, more of malice then any reason, or for any iustice or benefit to the common wealth. Furthermore, when it came to the gathering of the voyces of the people for the confirmacion of his new lawes, finding that his enemies were the stronger in the assembly, bicause all the people were not yet come together: he fell a quarrelling with his brethren the Tribunes, alwayes to winne time, and yet in the end brake vp the assembly, commaunding them to returne the next morning. There he would be B the first man in the market place apparelled all in blacke, his face beblubbered with teares, & looking heauely vpon the matter, praying the people assembled to haue compassion vpon him, saying, that he was affrayed least his enemies would come in the night, and ouerthrow his house to kill him. Thereupon the people were so moued withall, that many of them came and brought their tentes, and lay about his house to watche it. At the breake of the day, the keeper of the chickins, by signes of the which they doe diuine of thinges to come, brought them vnto him, and cast them downe meate before them. None of them would come out of the cage but one only, and yet with much a doe, shaking the cage: and when it came out, it would eate no meate, but only lift vp her left wing, and put forth her legge, and so ranne into the cage againe. This signe made Tiberius remember an other he had had before. He had a C maruelous fayer helmet and very riche, which he ware in the warres: vnder it were crept two snakes vnwares to any, and layed egges, and hatched them. This made Tiberius wonder the more, bicause of the ill signes of the chickins: notwithstanding, he went out of his house, when he heard that the people were assembled in the Capitoll, but as he went out, he hit his foote such a blow against a stone at the thresshold of the dore, that he brake the nayle of his great toe, which fell in suche a bleeding, that it bled through his shooe. Againe, he had not gone farre, but he saw vpon the toppe of a house on his left hand, a couple of rauens fighting together: and notwithstanding that there past a great number of people by, yet a stone which one of these rauens cast from them, came & fell hard at Tiberius foote. The fall thereof staied the stowtest man he had about him. But Blossius the Philosopher of Cumes that did accõpany D him, told him it were a great shame for him, and enough to kill the harts of all his followers: that Tiberius being the sonne of Gracchus, and nephew of Scipio the African, and the chiefe man besides of all the peoples side, for feare of a rauen, should not obey his citizens that called him: and how that his enemies and ill willers would not make a laughing sporte of it, but would plainly tell the people that this was a tricke of a tyran that raigned in dede, and that for pride and disdaine did abuse the peoples good wills. Furthermore, diuers messengers came vnto him, and sayd that his frends that were in the Capitoll, sent to pray him to make hast, for all went well with him. When he came thither, he was honorably receiued: for the people seeing him comming, cried out for ioy to welcome him, and when he was gotten vp to his seate, they shewed them selues both carefull and louing towardes him, loooking warely that E none came neere him, but such as they knew well. While Mutius beganne againe to call the tribes of the people to geue their voyces, he could not procede according to the accustomed order in the like case, for the great noyse the hindmost people made, thrusting forward, and being driuen backe, and one mingling with an other. In the meane time, Flauius Flaccus, one of the Senators, got vp into a place where all the people might see him, and when he saw that his voyce coulde not be heard of Tiberius, he made a signe with his hande that he had some matter of great importance to tell him. Tiberius straight bad them make a lane through the prease. So, with much a doe, Flauius came at length vnto him, and tolde him, that the riche men in open Senate, when they could not frame the Consull to their wills, determined them selues to come and kill him, hauing a great number of their frendes, and bondmen armed for F the purpose. Tiberius immediatly declared this conspiracy vnto his frends and followers: who straight girte their long gownes vnto them, and brake the sergeaunts iauelins which they caried in their handes to make roome among the people, and tooke the tronchions of the same both his hands on his head, bicauſe they coulde not heare his voyce for the great noyſe that made. His enemies ſeeing the ſigne he gaue, ranne preſently to the Senate, crying out, that Tiberius required a royall bande or diadeame of the people, and that it was an euident ſigne, bicauſe they ſawe him clappe his handes apon his head. This tale troubled all the companie.

Whereupon Naſica beſought the Conſul, chiefe of the Senate, to help the common wealth, and to take away this tyran. The Conſul gently aunſwered againe, that he would vſe no force, neither put any citizen to death, but lawfully condemned: as alſo he would not receiue Tibe- rius, nor protect him, if the people by his perſwaſion or commaundement, ſhould commit any acte contrarie to the law. Naſica then riſing in anger, ſith the matter is ſo, ſayd he, that the B to the Capitoll. They that followed him alſo tooke their gownes, and wrapt them about their armes, and layed at as many as they might, to make them geue way: and yet very few of the people durſt meete with ſuch ſtates as they were to ſtay them, bicauſe they were the chiefeſt men of the citie, but euery man flying from them, they fell one on an others necke for haſte.

They that followed them, had brought from home great leauers & clubbes, and as they went, they tooke vp feete of treſtles and chaires which the people had ouerthrowen and broken, running away, and hyed them a pace to meete with Tiberius, ſtriking at them that ſtoode in their way: ſo that in ſhort ſpace they had diſperſed all the common people, and many were C flying, one tooke him by the gowne, and ſtayed him: but he leauing his gowne behinde him, ranne in his coate, and running fell vpon them that were downe before. So, as he was riſing vp againe, the firſt man that ſtrake him, and that was plainly ſeene ſtrike him, was one of the Tribunes his brethren, called Publius Satureius: who gaue him a great rappe on the head with the foote of a chaire, & the ſecond blow he had, was geuen him by Lucius Rufus that boaſted of it, as if he had done a notable acte. In this tumult, there were ſlaine aboue three hundred men, and were all killed with ſtaues and ſtones, and not one man hurt with any iron. This was the firſt ſedition among the citizens of Rome, that fell out with murder, and bloodſhed, ſince the expulſion of the kinges. But for all other former diſſentions (which were no trifles) they D were eaſily pacified, either partie geuing place to other: the Senate for feare of the commoners, and the people for reuerence they bare to the Senate. And it ſeemeth, that Tiberius him ſelfe woulde eaſely haue yeelded alſo, if they had proceeded by faire meanes and perſwaſion, ſo they had ment good faith, and would haue killed no man: for at that time he had not in all, aboue 3000. men of the people about him. But ſurely it ſeemes this conſpiracie was executed againſt him, more for very ſpite and malice the rich men did beare him, then for any other apparant cauſe they preſuppoſed againſt him. For proofe hereof may be alleaged, the barbarous cruelty they vſed to his body being dead. For they would not ſuffer his owne brother to haue his bodie to burie it by night, who made earneſt ſute vnto them for it: but they threw him amongeſt the other bodies into the riuer, and yet this was not the worſt. For, ſome of his frends E incloſed in a pype among ſnakes and ſerpentes, and put him to death in this ſorte. Bloſſius alſo the Philoſopher of Cumes, was brought before the Conſuls, and examined about this matter: who boldly confeſſed vnto them, that he did as much as Tiberius commaunded him.

When Naſica did aske him, and what if he had commaunded thee to ſet fire on the Capitoll?
He made him aunſwere, that Tiberius would neuer haue geuen him any ſuche commaunde-ment. And when diuers others alſo were ſtill in hand with him about that queſtion: but if he had commaunded thee? I would ſure haue done it, ſayd he: for he would neuer haue commaunded me to haue done it, if it had not bene for the commoditie of the people. Thus he F ſcaped at that time, and afterwards fled into Asia vnto Ariſtonicus, whom misfortune hauing ouerthrowen, he ſlue him ſelfe. Now, the Senate to pacifie the people at that preſent time,

did no more withstand the law Agraria, for diuision of the lands of the common wealth, but suffered the people to appoint another Commissioner for that purpose, in Tiberius place. Thereupon Publius Crassus was chosen, being allied vnto Tiberius, for Caius Gracchus (Tiberius brother) had maried his daughter Licinia. Yet Cornelius Nepos sayth, that she was not Crassus daughter, Caius maried, but the daughter of Brutus, that triumphed for the Lvsitanians. Howbeit the best writers and authority, agree with that we write. But assoone as he was dead, the people were maruelously offended with his death, and men might easily perceiue, that they looked but for time and oportunity to be reuenged, and did openly threaten Nasica to accuse him. Whereupon the Senate fearing some trouble towards him, deuised a way vpon no occasion, to sende him into Asia. For the common people did not dissemble the malice they bare him when they met him, but were verie rounde with him, and called him tyran, and murderer, excommunicate, and wicked man, that had imbrued his hands in the blood of the holy Tribune, and within the most sacred temple of all the citie. So in the ende he was inforced to forsake Rome, though by his office he was bounde to solemnise all the greatest sacrifices, bicause he was then chiefe Bishoppe of Rome. Thus trauelling out of his countrie like a meane man, and troubled in his minde: he dyed shortly after, not farre from the citie of Pergamvm. Truely it is not greatly to be wondred at, though the people so much hated Nasica, considering that Scipio the African him selfe (whom the people of Rome for iuster causes had loued better then any man else whatsoeuer) was like to haue lost all the peoples good will they bare him, bicause that being at the siege of Numantia, when newes was brought him of Tiberius death, he rang out this verse of Homer:

Nasica chiefe Bishoppe of Rome.

Such end vpon him euer light, Wt bich in such doings doth delight.

Furthermore, being asked in the assemblie of the people, by Caius, or Fabius, what he thought of Tiberius death: he answered them, that he did not like his doinges. Whiles that the people handled him very churlishly, & did euer breake of his oration, which they neuer did before: & he him selfe also would reuile the people euen in the assembly. Now Caius Gracchus at the first, bicause he feared the enemies of his deade brother, or otherwise for that he sought meanes to make them more hated of the people: he absented him selfe for a time out of the common assembly, and kept at home and meddled not, as a man contented to liue meanely, without busying him selfe in the common wealth: insomuch as he made men thinke and report both, that he did vtterly mislike those matters which his brother had preferred. Howbeit he was then but a young man, and nine yeares younger then his brother Tiberius, who was not thirty yeare old when he was slaine. But in processe of time, he made his manners and conditions (by litle and litle) appeare, who hated sloth and idlenesse, and was least of all geuen vnto any couetous minde of getting: for he gaue him selfe to be eloquent, as preparing him wings afterwardes to practise in the common wealth. So that it appeared plainely, that when time came, he would not stand still, and looke on. When one Vettius a frende of his was sued, he tooke vpon him to defend his cause in courte. The people that were present, and heard him speake, they leaped for ioy to see him: for he had such an eloquent tongue, that all the Orators besides were but children to him. Hereuppon the rich men began to be affrayed againe, and whispered among them selues, that it behoued them to beware he came not to be Tribune. It chaunced so that he was chosen Treasorer, and it was his fortune to goe into the Ile of Sardinia, with the Consul Orestes. His enemies were glad of that, and he him selfe was not sory for it. For he was a martiall man, and as skilfull in armes, as he was else an excellent Oratour but yet he was affrayed to come into the pulpit for Orations, and mistrusted to deale in matters of state, albeit he could not altogether deny the people, and his frendes that prayed him forbearance. For this cause therfore he was very glad of this voyage, that he might absent him selfe for a time out of Rome: though diuers were of opinion, that he was more popular, and desirous of the common peoples good will and fauor, then his brother had bene before him. But in deede he was cleane contrarie: for it appeared that at the first he was drawen rather against his will, then of any speciall desire he had to deale in the common wealth. Cicero the Orator also sayth, that Caius was bent altogether to flie from office in the common wealth, and to liue quietly as a priuat man. But Tiberius (Caius brother) appeared to him in his sleepe, and calling him by his name, sayd vnto him: brother, why doest thou prolong time, for thou canst not possiblie escape? For we were both predestined to one maner of life and death, for procuring the benefite of the people. Now when Caius arriued in SARDINIA, he shewed all the proofes that might be in a valliant man, and excelled all the young men of his age, in hardines against his enemies, in iustice to his inferiors, and in loue & obedience towards the Consul his Captaine: but in temperaunce, sobrietie, and in painfulnes, he excelled all them that were elder then he. The winter by chaunce fell out very sharpe, & full of sickenes in SARDINIA: whereupon the Consul sent vnto the cities to helpe his souldiers with some clothes: but the townes sent in poste to ROME, to pray the Senate they might be discharged of that burden. The Senate found their allegacion reasonable, whereuppon they wrote to the Consul to finde some other meanes to clothe his people. The Consul coulde make no other shift for them, and so the poore souldiers in the meane time smarted for it. But Caius Gracchus went him selfe vnto the cities and so perswaded them, that they of them selues sent to the ROMANES campe such thinges as they lacked. This being caried to ROME, it was thought straight it was a pretie beginning to creepe into the peoples fauor, and in dede it made the Senate also affrayed. In the necke of that, there arriued Ambassadors of AFRICKE at ROME, sent from king Micipsa, who told the Senate that the king their maister, for Caius Gracchus sake, had sent their armie corne into SARDINIA. The Senators were so offended withall, that they thrust the Ambassadours out of the Senate, and so gaue order that other souldiers shoulde be sent in their places that were in SARDINIA: and that Orestes should still remaine Consul there, meaning also to continue Caius their Treasorer. But when he hearde of it, he straight tooke sea, and returned to ROME in choller. When men saw Caius returned to ROME vnlooked for, he was reproued for it not onely by his enemies, but by the common people also: who thought his returne verie straunge before his Captaine, vnder whom he was Treasorer. He being accused hereof before the Censors, prayed he might be heard. So, aunswering his accusation, he so turned the peoples mindes that heard him, that they all sayd he had open wrong. For he told them, that he had serued twelue yeares in the warres, where others were enforced to remaine but ten yeres: and that he had continued Treasorer vnder his Captaine, the space of three yeares, where the law gaue him libertie to returne at the end of the yeare. And that he alone of all men else that had bene in the warres, had caried his purse full, and brought it home empty: where others hauing dronke the wyne which they caried thither in vessells, had afterwardes brought them home full of gold & siluer. Afterwards they went about to accuse him as accessarie to a conspiracie, that was reuealed in the citie of FREGELLES. But hauing cleared all that suspicion, and being discharged, he presently made sute to be Tribune: wherein he had all the men of qualitie his sworne enemies. On thother side also he had so great fauor of the common people, that there came men out of all partes of ITALIE to be at his election, & that such a number of them, as there was no lodging to be had for them all. Furthermore, the field of Mars not being large enough to hold such a multitude of people, there were that gaue their voyces vpon the toppe of houses. Nowe the noble men coulde no otherwise let the people of their will, nor preuent Caius of his hope, but where he thought to be the first Tribune, he was only pronounced the fourth. But when he was once possest officer, he became immediatly the chiefe man, bicause he was as eloquent as any man of his time. And furthermore, he had a large occasion of calamity offred him: which made him bolde to speake, bewailing the death of his brother. For what matters soeuer he spake of, he alwayes fell in talke of that, remembring them what matters had passed: & laying before them the examples of their auncesters: who in olde time had made warre with the PHALISCES, by the meanes of one Genutius Tribune of the people, vnto whom they had offered iniurie: who also did condemne Caius Veturius to death, bicause that he onely woulde not geue a Tribune place, comming through the market place. Where these sayd he, that standing before you in sight, haue slaine my brother Tiberius with staues, and haue dragged his bodie from the mount of the Capitoll, all the citie ouer, to throw it into the riuer: and with him also haue most cruellie slaine all his frendes they coulde come by, without any lawe or iustice at all. And yet by an auncient custome of long time

Caius Gracchus returneth out of Sardinia vnto Rome.

Caius Gracchus, Tribune of the people.

A time obſerued in this citie of Rome, when any man is accuſed of treaſon, and that of duety he muſt appeare at the time appointed him: they doe notwithſtanding in the morning ſende a trompet to his houſe, to ſummone him to appeare: and moreouer the Iudges were not wont to condemne him, before this ceremony was performed: ſo carefull and reſpectiue were our predeceſſors, where it touched the life of any Romane. Now Caius hauing firſt ſtirred vp the people with theſe perſwaſions (for he had a maruelous lowde voyce) he preferred two lawes. The firſt, that he that had once bene put out of office by the people, ſhould neuer after be capable of any other office. Caius Gracchus lawes.

The ſeconde, that if any Conſul had baniſhed any citizen without lawefull accuſation, the ſentence and hearing of the matter ſhould perteine to the people.

B The firſt of theſe two lawes did plainly defame Octauius, whom Tiberius his brother had by the people depoſed from the Tribunſhippe. The ſeconde alſo touched Populius, who being Prætor, had baniſhed his brother Tiberius frendes: whereuppon he ſtayed not the triall, but willingly exiled him ſelfe out of Italie. And touching the firſt law, Caius him ſelfe did afterwards reuoke it, declaring vnto the people, that he had ſaued Octauius at the requeſt of his mother Cornelia. The people were verie glad of it, and confirmed it, honoring her no leſſe for reſpect of her ſonnes, then alſo for Scipioes ſake her father. For afterwards they caſt her image in braſſe, & ſet it vp with this inſcription: Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi. Many cõmon matters are found written touching Cornelia his mother, & eloquently pleaded in her behalfe, by Caius againſt her aduerſaries. As when he ſayd vnto one of them: how dareſt thou preſume Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi, honored of the people of Rome.

C to ſpeake euill of Cornelia, that had Tiberius to her ſonne? And the other partie alſo that ſlandered her, being ſorely ſuſpected for a Sodomite: and art thou ſo impudent, ſayd he, to ſhew thy face before Cornelia? Haſt thou brought foorth children as ſhe hath done? And yet it is wel knowẽ to all men in Rome, that ſhe being but a woman, hath liued longer without a man, than thou that art a man. Thus were Caius words ſharpe & ſtinging, and many ſuch like are to be gathered out of his wrytinges. Furthermore he made many other lawes afterwardes to increaſe the peoples authoritie, and to imbaſe the Senates greatnes. Other lawes preferred by Caius Gracchus.

The firſt was, for the reſtoring of the Colonies to Rome, in diuiding the landes of the common wealth vnto the poore citizens that ſhould inhabite there.

The other, that they ſhoulde apparell the ſouldiers at the charge of the common wealth,

D and that it ſhould not be deducted out of their paye: and alſo, that no citizen ſhould be billed to ſerue in the warres, vnder ſeuenteene yeares of age at the leaſt.

An other law was, for their confederats of Italie: that through all Italie they ſhoulde haue as free voyces in the election of any Magiſtrate, as the naturall citizens of Rome it ſelfe.

An other ſetting a reaſonable price of the corne that ſhould be diſtributed vnto the poore people.

An other touching iudgement, whereby he did greatly miniſh the authority of the Senate. For before, the Senators were onely Iudges of all matters, the which made them to be the more honored and feared of the people, and the Romane Knights: and now he ioyned three

E hundred Romane Knights vnto the other three hundred Senators, and brought it ſo to paſſe, that all matters iudiciall ſhoulde be equally iudged, among thoſe ſix hundred men. After he had paſſed this law, it is reported he was verie curious in obſerning all other thinges, but this one thing ſpecially: that where all other Orators ſpeaking to the people turned them towards the pallace where the Senators ſate, and to that ſide of the market place which is called Comitium: he in contrarie manner when he made his Oration, turned him outwardes towardes the other ſide of the market place, and after that kept it conſtantly, and neuer failed. Thus, by a litle turning and altering of his looke only, he remoued a great matter. For he ſo transferred all the gouernment of the common wealth from the Senate, vnto the iudgement of the peo-

F ple: to teach the Orators by his example, that in their Orations they ſhould behold the people, not the Senate. Now, the people hauing not only confirmed the law he made touching the Iudges, but geuen him alſo full power and authoritie to chooſe amonge the Romane Knightes ſuche Iudges as he liked of: he founde thereby he had abſolute power in his owne Caius Gracchus power.

hands, insomuche as the Senators them selues did aske counsell of him. So did he euer geue good counsell, and did preferre matters meete for their honor. As amongest others, the lawe he made touching certaine wheate that Fabius Viceprætor had sent out of SPAYNE: which was a good and honorable acte. He perswaded the Senate that the corne might be solde, and so to send backe againe the money therof vnto the townes and cities from whence the corne came: and therewithall to punish Fabius for that he made the Empire of ROME hatefull and intollerable vnto the prouinces and subiectes of the same. This matter wanne him great loue and commendacion of all the prouinces subiect to ROME. Furthermore, he made lawes for the restoring of the decayed townes, for mending of high wayes, for building of garners for prouision of corne. And to bring all these things to passe, he him selfe tooke apon him the only care and enterprise, being neuer wearied with any paines taken in ordering of so great affaires. For, he followed all those thinges so earnestly and effectually, as if he had had but one matter in hand: insomuch that they who most hated and feared him, wondred most to see his diligence and quicke dispatche in matters. The people also wondred muche to beholde him only, seeing alwaies suche a number of laborers, artificers, Ambassadors, officers, souldiers, and learned men, whom he easely satisfied and dispatched, keping still his estate, and yet vsing great curtesie and ciuilitie, entertaining euery one of them priuately: so that he made his accusers to be found lyers, that sayd he was a stately man, and very cruell. Thus he wanne the good will of the common people, being more popular and familiar in his conuersation and deedes, then he was otherwise in his Orations. But the greatest paines and care he tooke apon him was, in seeing the high wayes mended, the which he woulde haue as well done, as profitablie done. For he would cast the cawcies by the lyne in the softest ground in the fields, and then woulde paue them with hard stone, and cast a great deale of grauell vpon it, which he caused to be brought thither. When he found any low or waterie places which the riuers had eaten into, he raised them vp, or else made bridges ouer them, with an euen height equall to either side of the cawcie: so that all his worke caried a goodly leauell withall euen by the lyne or plummet, which was a pleasure to beholde it. Furthermore, he deuided these high wayes by myles, euery myle conteining eight furlonges, and at euery myles ende he set vp a stone for a marke. At either end also of these high wayes thus paued, he set certaine stones of conuenient height, a prety way a sunder, to helpe the trauellers by to take their horse backes againe, without any helpe. The people for these things highly praising & extolling him, and being readie to make shew of their loue and good will to him any maner of way: he told them openly one day in his Oration, that he had a request to make vnto them, the which if it would please them to graunt him, he woulde thinke they did him a maruelous pleasure: and if they denied him also, he cared not muche. Then euerie man thought it was the Consulshippe he ment to aske, and that he woulde sue to be Tribune and Consul together. But when the day came to choose the Consuls, euery man looking attentiuely what he would doe: they marueled when they sawe him come downe the fielde of Mars, and brought Caius Fannius with his frends, to further his sute for the Consulshippe. Therein he serued Fannius turne, for he was presently chosen Consul: and Caius Gracchus was the seconde time chosen Tribune againe, not of his owne sute, but by the good will of the people. Caius perceiuing that the Senators were his open enemies, and that Fannius the Consul was but a slacke frende vnto him, he began againe to currie fauor with the common people, and to preferre new lawes, setting forth the lawe of the Colonies, that they should send of the poore citizens to replenishe the cities of TARENTVM and CAPVA, & that they should graunt all the Latines the freedom of ROME. The Senate perceiuing his power grew great, and that in the end he would be so strong that they coulde not withstande him: they deuised a new and straunge way to plucke the peoples good will from him, in graunting them things not altogether very honest. There was one of the Tribunes, a brother in office with Caius, called Liuius Drusus, a man noblely borne, and as well brought vp as any other ROMANE: who for wealth and eloquence was not inferior to the greatest men of estimacion in ROME. The chiefest Senators went vnto him, and perswaded him to take parte with them against Caius, not to vse any force or violence against the people to withstand them in any thing, but contrarily to graunt them those things which were more honesty

A honeſtie for them to deny them with their ill will. Liuius offering to pleaſure the Senate with his authority, preferred lawes neither honorable nor profitable to the cõmon wealth, & were to no other ende, but contending with Caius, who ſhould moſt flatter the people of them two, as plaiers do in their cõmon plaies, to ſhew the people paſtime. Wherby the Senate ſhewed, that they did not ſo much miſlike Caius doings, as for the deſire they had to ouerthrow him & his great credit with the people. For where Caius preferred but the repleniſhing of the two cities, and deſired to ſend the honeſteſt citizens thither: they obiected againſt him, that he did corrupt the common people. On the other ſide alſo they fauored Druſus, who preferred a law that they ſhould repleniſh twelue Colonies, & ſhould ſend to euery one of them three thowſande of the pooreſt citizens. And where they hated Caius for that he had charged the poore B citizens with an annual rent for the lands that were deuided vnto them: Liuius in contrary maner did pleaſe them by disburdening them of that rent & payment, letting thẽ haue the lands ſcotfree. Furthermore alſo, where Caius did anger the people, bicauſe he gaue all the Latines the fredom of ROME to geue their voyces in chooſing of Magiſtrates as freely as the naturall ROMANES: when Druſus on thother ſide had preferred a law that thencefoorth no ROMANE ſhould whip any ſouldier of the Latines with rods to the warres, they liked the law, & paſt it. Liuius alſo in euery law he put forth, ſaid in all his orations, that he did it by the counſell of the Senate, who were very carefull for the profit of the people: and this was all the good he did in his office vnto the cõmon wealth. For by his meanes the people were better pleaſed with the Senate, & where they did before hate all the noble men of the Senate, Liuius tooke away that C malice, when the people ſaw that all that he propounded, was for the preferment & benefit of the common wealth, with the conſent & furtheraunce of the Senate. The only thing alſo that perſwaded the people to thinke that Druſus ment vprightly, & that he only reſpected the profit of the common people was: that he neuer preferred any law for him ſelfe, or for his owne benefit. For in the reſtoring of theſe Colonies which he preferred, he alwaies ſent other Commiſſioners, & gaue them the charge of it, and would neuer finger any money him ſelfe: where Caius tooke apon him the charge & care of all things himſelfe, & ſpecially of the greateſt matters. Rubrius alſo an other Tribune, hauing preferred a law for the reedifying & repleniſhing of CARTHAGE againe with people, the which Scipio had raſed and deſtroyed: it was Caius happe to be appointed one of the Commiſſioners for it. Whereupon he tooke ſhippe, & ſailed into D AFRIKE. Druſus in the meane time taking occaſion of his abſence, did as much as might be to ſeeke the fauor of the common people, and ſpecially by accuſing Fuluius, who was one of the beſt frends Caius had, & whom they had alſo choſen Commiſſioner with him for the diuiſion of theſe landes among the citizens, whom they ſent to repleniſh theſe Colonies. This Fuluius was a ſeditious man, & therefore maruelouſly hated of the Senate, & withall ſuſpected alſo of them that tooke parte with the people, that he ſecretly practiſed to make their confederats of ITALIE to rebell. But yet they had no euident proofe of it to iuſtifie it againſt him, more then that which he himſelfe did verifie, bicauſe he ſemed to be offended with the peace & quietnes they enioyed. And this was one of the chiefeſt cauſes of Caius ouerthrow, bicauſe that Fuluius was partely hated for his ſake. For when Scipio AFRICAN was found dead one morning in his E houſe, without any manifeſt cauſe how he ſhould come to his death ſo ſodainly: (ſauing that there appeared certaine blinde markes of ſtripes on his body that had bene geuen him: as we haue declared at large in his life) the moſt parte of the ſuſpicion of his death was layed to Fuluius, being his mortall enemy, & bicauſe the ſame day they had bene at great wordes together in the pulpit for orations. So was Caius Gracchus alſo partly ſuſpected for it. Howſoeuer it was, ſuch a horrible murder as this, of ſo famous & worthy a man as any was in ROME, was yet notwithſtanding neuer reuenged, neither any inquirie made of it: bicauſe the common people would not ſuffer the accuſacion to goe forward, fearing leaſt Caius would be found in fault, if the matter ſhould go forward. But this was a great while before. Now Caius at that time being in AFRICK about the reedifying and repleniſhing of the city of CARTHAGE againe, the which F he named IVNONIA: the voice goeth that he had many ill ſignes & tokens appeared vnto him. For the ſtaffe of his enſigne was broken with a vehemẽt blaſt of wind, & with the force of the enſigne bearer that held it faſt on thother ſide. There came a flaw of winde alſo that caried a-which they had ſet downe to limite the bonds of their circuite, & caried him quite away. This notwithſtanding, Caius hauing diſpatched all things in the ſpace of three ſcore & ten daies, he returned incontinently to Rome, vnderſtanding that Fuluius was oppreſſed by Druſus, and that man of great credit with the Senate, being the yeare before put by the Conſulſhippe, by Caius practiſe, who cauſed Fannius to be choſen: he had good hope this yere to ſpeede, for the great number of frends that furthered his ſute. So that if he could obtaine it, he was fully bent to ſet Caius beſide the ſaddle, & the rather, bicauſe his eſtimacion and countenaunce he was wont to haue among the people, began now to decay, for that they were ful of ſuch deuiſes as his were: B bicauſe there were diuers others that preferred the like to pleaſe the people withal, & yet with the Senates great good will & fauor. So Caius being returned to Rome, he remoued from his houſe, and where before he dwelt in mount Palatine, he came now to take a houſe vnder the market place, to ſhew him ſelfe therby the lowlier & more popular, bicauſe many of the meaner ſorte of people dwelt thereaboutes. Then he purpoſed to goe forward with the reſt of his lawes, & to make the people to eſtabiſh thē, a great number of people repairing to Rome out of all parts for the furtherance thereof. Howbeit the Senate counſelled the Conſul Fannius to make proclamacion, that al thoſe which were no natural Romanes, reſident & abiding within the city ſelf of Rome: that they ſhould depart out of Rome. Beſides all this, there was a ſtraūge proclamacion made, and neuer ſeene before: that none of all the frends & confederats of the C Romanes, for certaine daies ſhould come into Rome. But Caius on thother ſide ſet vp bills on euery poſt, accuſing the Conſul for making ſo wicked a proclamacio: & further, promiſed the confederates of Rome to aide them, if they would remaine there againſt the Conſuls proclamacion. But yet he performed it not. For when he ſaw one of Fannius ſergeaūts cary a frend of his to priſon, he held on his way, & would ſee nothing, neither did he helpe him: either of likelyhoode bicauſe he feared his credit with the people, which began to decay, or elſe bicauſe he was loth (as he ſaid) to picke any quarrell with his enemies, which ſought it of him. Further-Caius Gracchus fell out with the Tribunes. more, he chaunced to fall at variance with his brethren the Tribunes, about this occaſion.

The people were to ſee the paſtime of the ſword plaiers or fenſers at the ſharp, within the very market place, and there were diuers of the officers that to ſee the ſport, did ſet vp ſcaffoldes D rounde about, to take money for the ſtanding. Caius cōmaunded them to take them downe again, bicauſe the poore men might ſee the ſport without any coſt. But not a man of thē would yeeld to it. Wherefore he ſtaid till the night before the paſtime ſhould be, & then he tooke all his laborers he had vnder him, & went & ouerthrew the ſcaffolds euery one of thē: ſo that the next morning all the market place was clere for the cōmon people, to ſee the paſtime at their pleaſure. For this fact of his, the people thanked him maruelouſly, & tooke him for a worthie man. Howbeit his brethren the Tribunes were very much offended with him, & tooke him for Caius Gracchus repulſed from the third Tribuneſhip. a bold preſumptuous man. This ſeemeth to be the chiefe cauſe why he was put from his third Tribuneſhip, where he had the moſt voices of his ſide: bicauſe his colleagues, to be reuēged of the part he had plaied thē, of malice & ſpight, made falſe report of the voices. Howbeit there E is no great troth in this. It is true that he was very angry with this repulſe, & it is reported he ſpake ſomwhat too prowdly to his enemies, that were mery with the matter, & laughed him to ſcorne: that they laughed a Sardonians laugh, not knowing how darkely his deedes had wrapt them in. Furthermore, his enemies hauing choſen Opimius Conſul, they began imme-diatly to reuoke diuers of Caius lawes: as among the reſt, his doings at Carthage for the reedifying of that city, procuring thus all the waies they could to anger him, bicauſe they might haue iuſt occaſion of anger to kil him. Caius notwithſtanding did paciently beare it at the firſt: but afterwards his frends, & ſpecially Fuluius, did encorage him ſo, that he began againe to gather men to reſiſt the Conſul. And it is reported alſo, that Cornelia his mother did help him in it, ſecretly hyring a great number of ſtraungers which ſhe ſent vnto Rome, as if they had bene F reapers, or harueſt men. And this is that ſhe wrote ſecretly in her letter, vnto her ſonne in ci-phers. And yet other write to the contrary, that ſhe was very angry he did attēpt thoſe things.

When

A When the day came that they ſhould proceede to the reuocation of his lawes, both parties met by breake of day at the Capitoll. There when the Conſul Opimius had done ſacrifice, one of Caius ſergeaunts called Quintus Antyllius, carying the intrals of the beaſt ſacrificed, ſaid vnto Fuluius, and others of his tribe that were about him: giue place to honeſt men, vile citizens that ye be. Some ſay alſo, that beſides theſe iniurious wordes, in skorne & contempt he held out his naked arme to make thē aſhamed. Whereupon they ſlue him preſently in the field with great botkins to wryte with, which they had purpoſely made for that intent. Hereupon the cōmon people were maruelouſly offended for this murther, & the chiefe men of both ſides alſo were diuerſly affected. For Caius was very ſory for it, & bitterly reproued them that were about him, ſaying, that they had giuen their enemies the occaſion they looked for, to ſet vpon thē. Opimius B the Conſul in contrary maner, taking this occaſion, roſe apon it, & did ſtirre vp the people to be reuenged. But there fell a ſhower of raine at that time that parted them. The next morning the Conſul hauing aſſembled the Senate by breake of day, as he was diſpatching cauſes within, ſome had takē the body of Antyllius & layed it naked vpon the beere, & ſo caried it through the market place (as it was agreed vpon before amongſt thē) & brought it to the Senate dore: where they began to make great mone & lamētacion, Opimius knowing the meaning of it, but yet he diſſembled it, & ſeemed to wonder at it. Wherupon the Senators went out to ſee what it was, & finding this beere, in the market place, ſome fell a weeping for him that was dead, others cried out that it was a ſhamefull act, & in no wiſe to be ſuffred. But on the other ſide, this did reuiue the old grudge and malice of the people, for the wickednes of the ambitious noble C men: who hauing thēſelues before ſlaine Tiberius Gracchus that was Tribune, & within the Capitoll it ſelfe, & had alſo caſt his body into the riuer, did now make an honorable ſhow openly in the market place, of the body of a ſergeaūt Antyllius (who though he were wrōgfully ſlaine, yet had himſelfe geuen thē the cauſe that ſlue him, to do that they did) & all the whole Senate were about the beere to bewaile his death, & to honor the funeralls of a hyerling, to make the people alſo kill him, that was only left the protector & defender of the people. After this, they went againe vnto the Capitoll, & there made a decree, wherby they gaue the Conſul Opimius extraordinary power & authority, by abſolute power to prouide for the ſafety of the common wealth, to preſerue the city, & to ſuppreſſe the tyrans. This decree being eſtabliſhed, the Conſul preſently commaunded the Senators that were preſent there, to go arme thē ſelues: & ap-D pointed the ROMANE Knights, that the next morning betimes euery man ſhould bring two of their men armed with thē. Fuluius on the other ſide, he prepared his foree againſt them, & aſſembled the cōmon people together. Caius alſo returning from the market place, ſtayd before the image of his father, & looked earneſtly apon it without euer a word ſpeaking, only he burſt out a weeping, and fetching a great ſigh, went his way. This made the people to pitie him that ſaw him: ſo that they talked among them ſelues, that they were but beaſts & cowards at ſuch a ſtraight to forſake ſo worthy a man. Therupon they went to his houſe, ſtayed there all night & watched before his gate: not as they did that watched with Fuluius, that paſſed away the night in guſeling and drinking drunke, crying out, and making noyſe, Fuluius him ſelfe being dronke firſt of all, who both ſpake and did many thinges farre vnmeete for his calling. For they that E watched Caius on thother ſide, were very ſorowfull, and made no noyſe, euen as in a common calamitie of their contrie, deuiſing with them ſelues what would fall out apon it, waking, and ſleeping one after an other by turnes. When the day brake, they with Fuluius did awake him, who ſlept yet ſoundly for the wine he dranke ouer night, and they armed them ſelues with the ſpoiles of the GAVLES that hong rounde about his houſe, whom he had ouercome in battell the ſame yeare he was Conſul: and with great cries, and thundering threats, they went to take the mount Auentine. But Caius would not arme him ſelfe, but went out of his houſe in a long gowne, as if he woude haue gone ſimply into the market place according to his wonted maner, ſauing that he caried a ſhort dagger at his girdel vnder his gowne. So as he was going out of his houſe, his wife ſtayed him at the dore, and holding him by the one hand, and a litle child F of his in her other hand, ſhe ſayd thus vnto him: Alas Caius, thou doeſt not now goe as thou wert wont, a Tribune into the market place to ſpeake to the people, neither to preferre any new lawes: neither doeſt thou goe vnto an honeſt warre, that if vnfortunately that ſhoulde pulled his hand from her, and left her, geuing her neuer a word, but went on with his frends. B But ſhe reaching after him to take him by the gowne, fell to the ground, and lay flatling there a great while, ſpeaking neuer a word: vntill at length her ſeruaunts tooke her vp in a ſwoone, and caried her ſo vnto her brother Craſſus. Now Fuluius, by the perſwaſion of Caius, when all rodde in his hand for his ſafetie. This boy humbly preſenting his duetie, with the teares in his eyes, before the Conſul and Senate, offred them peace. The moſt of them that were preſent thought verie well of it. But Opimius made aunſwere ſaying, that it became them not to ſend meſſengers, thinking with fayer wordes to winne the Senate; but it was their duetie to come thẽ ſelues in perſons, like ſubiects & offendors to make their triall, & ſo to craue pardon, & to ſeeke to pacifie the wrath of the Senate. Then he commaunded the boy he ſhould not returne C againe to them, but with this condicion he had preſcribed. Caius (as it is reported) was ready to go and cleare him ſelfe vnto the Senate: but the reſidue would not ſuffer him to go. Wheruppon Fuluius ſent his ſonne backe againe vnto them, to ſpeake for them as he had done before. But Opimius that was deſirous to fight, cauſed the boy to be taken, and committed him in ſafe cuſtodie, & then went preſently againſt Fuluius with a great number of footemen well armed, & of CRETAN archers beſides: who with their arrowes did more trouble & hurt their enemies, then with any thing elſe, that within a while they all began to flie. Fuluius on the other ſide fled into an old hottehouſe that no body made reckoning of, and there being found where he would haue killed him ſelfe, had not his very good frends Pomponius and Licinius ſaued him. For both they being with him at that time, tooke his ſword from him, and counſel-led him to flie. It is reported that then he fell downe on his knees, and holding vp both his hands vnto the goddeſſe, he beſought her that the people might neuer come out of bondage, to be reuenged of this their ingratitude & treaſon. For the common people (or the moſt parte of them) plainly turned their coats, when they heard proclamacion made, that all men had him ſo neere, that they ouertooke him apon the wodden bridge, where two of his frends that were with him ſtayed, to defende him againſt his followers, and bad him in the meane time make ſhift for him ſelfe, whileſt they fought with them apon the bridge: and ſo they did, and E kept them that not a man got the bridge of them, vntill they were both ſlaine. Nowe there was none that fled with Caius, but one of his men called Philocrates: notwithſtanding, euerie man did ſtill encorage and counſell him, as they do men to winne a game, but no man would helpe him, nor offer him any horſe, though he often required it, bicauſe he ſawe his enemies ſo neere vnto him. This notwithſtanding, by their defence that were ſlaine apon the bridge, he got ground on them ſo, that he had leaſure to crepe into a litle groue of wodde which was conſecrated to the furies. There his ſeruaunt Philocrates ſlue him, and then ſlue him ſelfe alſo, and fell dead vpon him. Other write notwithſtanding, that both the maiſter & ſeruaunt were of the enemies could ſtrike him for all the blowes they gaue, before he was ſlaine him ſelfe. So F one of the murderers ſtrake of Caius Gracchus head to carie to the Conſul. How beit one of O-pimius frendes called Septimuleius, tooke the head from the other by the way, bicauſe procla-

A macion was made before they fought by trompet, that whosoeuer brought the heades of Fuluius and Caius, they should be payed the weight of them in gold. Wherefore this Septimuleius caried Caius head vpon the toppe of his speare vnto Opimius: whereuppon the skales being brought to wey it, it was found that it weyed seuentesne pounde weight and two third partes of a pound, bicause Septimuleius besides the horrible murder he had committed, had also holpen it with this villanie, that he had taken out his braine, and in stew thereof had filled his scull with lead. Now the other also that brought Fuluius head, bicause they were poore men, they had nothing. The bodies of these two men, Caius Gracchus and Fuluius, and of other their followers (which were to the number of three thowsand that were slaine) were all throwen into the riuer, their goods confiscate, and their widowes forbidden to mourne for their death. Fur-B thermore, they tooke from Licinia Caius wife, her ioynter: but yet they delt more cruelly and beastly with the young boy, Fulaius sonne: who had neither lift vp his hand against them, nor was in the fight among them, but only came to the to make peace before they fought, whom they kept as prisoner, and after the battell ended, they put him to death. But yet that which most of all other grieued the people, was the temple of concorde, the which Opimius caused to be built: for it appeared that he boasted, and in maner triumphed, that he had slaine so many citizens of Rome. And therefore there were that in the night wrote vnder the inscription of the temple these verses:

The temple of concord built by Opimius the Consul.

A furious fact and full of beastly shame, This temple built, that beareth concordes name.

C This Opimius was the first man at Rome, that being Consul, vsurped the absolute power of the Dictator: and that without law or iustice condemned three thowsand citizens of Rome, besides Fuluius Flaccus, (who had also bene Consul, and had receiued the honor of triumphe) and Caius Gracchus a young man in like case, who in vertue & reputacion excelled all the men of his yeares. This notwithstanding, coulde not keepe Opimius from theuerie and extorcion. For when he was sent Ambassador vnto Iugurthe king of Numidia, he was bribed with money: & therupon being accused, he was most shamefully conuicted, and condemned. Wherefore he ended his dayes with this reproch and infamy, hated, and mocked of all the people: bi-cause at the time of the ouerthrow he delt beastly with them that fought for his quarrell. But shortly after, it appeared to the world, how much they lamented the losse of the two brethren D of the Gracchi. For they made images and statues of them, and caused them to be set vp in an open and honorable place, consecrating the places where they had bene slaine: and many of them also came and offred to them, of their first frutes and flowers, according to the time of the yere, & went thither to make their prayers on their knees, as vnto the temples of the gods.
Their mother Cornelia, as writers report, did beare this calamity with a noble hart: and as for the chappells which they built & consecrated vnto them in the place where they were slaine, she said no more, but that they had such graues, as they had deserued. Afterwardes she dwelt continually by the mount of Misene, and neuer chaunged her manner of life. She had many frends, and bicause she was a noble Ladie, and loued euer to welcome straungers, she kept a very good house, and therefore had alwayes great repaire vnto her, of Grecians & learned E men: besides, there was no king nor Prince, but both receiued giftes from her, and sent her againe. They that frequented her cõpany, delighted maruelously to heare her report the dedes and maner of her fathers life, Scipio African: but yet they wondred more, to heare her tell the actes and death of her two sonnes, Tiberius and Caius Gracchi, without sheading teare, or making any shew of lamentacion or griefe, no more then if she had told an history vnto them that had requested her. Insomuch some writers report, that age, or her great misfortunes, had ouercomen and taken her reason and sence from her, to feele any sorowe. But in deede they were senseless to say so, not vnderstandinge, howe that to be noblie borne, and vertuouslie brought vp, doth make men temperatly to disgest sorow, and that fortune oftentimes ouercomes vertue, which regardeth honestie in all respectes, but yet F with any aduersity she can not take away the temperaunce from them, whereby they paciently beare it.

THE COMPARISON OF Tiberius and Caius Gracchi with Agis and Cleomenes.

The wisedom of the Gracchi.

NOw that we be come to the end of this history, we are to compare the liues of these two men the one with the other. First, as touching the two Gracchi: their enemies that most hated them, and spake the worst they could of them, could not deny but that they were the best geuen to vertue, and as well taught and brought vp, as any ROMANES that were in their time. But yet it appeareth, that nature had the vpper hand of them, in Agis and Cleomenes. For they hauing bene very ill brought vp, both for learning and good manners, for lacke whereof the oldest men were almost spoyled: yet did they notwithstandinge make them selues the first maisters and example of sobrietie, temperaunce, and simplicitie of life. Furthermore, the two first hauing liued in that time, when ROME florished most in honor and vertuous desires: they were more then ashamed to forsake the vertues inherited from their auncesters. These two last also being borne of fathers that had a cleane contrarie disposicion, and finding their contrie altogether without any order, and infected with dissolute life: were not therefore any whit the more moued with desire to do well. Furthermore, the greatest praise they gaue vnto the two Gracchi, was, their abstinence and integritie from taking of money all the time they were in office, and delt in matters of state, euer keeping their handes cleane, and tooke not a pennie wrongfully from any man. Where Agis on thother side was offended if any man praised him, for that he tooke nothing from an other man: seeing that he dispossessed him selfe of his owne goods, and gaue it to his citizens, which amounted in readie coyne to the value of six hundred talents. Whereby men may easely iudge, how grieuous a sinne he thought it to take any thing wrongfully from any man: seeing that he thought it a kinde of auarice, lawfully to be richer then others. Furthermore, there was maruelous great difference in their alteracions, and renuing of the state, which they did both preferre. For the actes of the two ROMANES were to mend high wayes, and to reedifie and repleniſh decayed townes: and the worthiest acte Tiberius did, was the lawe Agraria, which he brought in for

A diuiding of the lands of the common wealth amongest the poore Citizens. And the best and his brother Caius also did, was the mingling of the Iudges: adding to the three hundred Senators, three hundred ROMANS knightes to be indifferent Iudges with them. Whereas Agis and Cleomenes in contrary maner were of opinion, that to reforme smal faults, & to redresse them by litle and litle, was (as Plato sayd) to cut of one of the Hydraes heads, of the which came afterwards seuen in the place: and therefore they tooke vpon them a change and innouation, euen at once to roote out all the mischiefs of their contry, (or to speake more truely, to take away the disorder which brought in all vice and mischief to the common wealth) and so to restore the citie of SPARTA againe to her former auncient honorable estate. Nowe this may be said againe, for the gouernment of the GRACCHI: that the chiefest men of ROME were euer a-B gainst their purposes. Where, in that that Agis attempted, and Cleomenes ended, they had the noblest ground that could be, & that was the auncient lawes and ordinances of SPARTA, touching temperance and equalitie: the first, instituted in old time by Lycurgus, the other confirmed by Apollo. Furthermore, by the alteracions of the first, ROME became no greater then it was before. Where, by that which Cleomenes did, all GRAECIA in short time sawe that SPARTA commaunded all the rest of PELOPONNESVS, and fought at that time against those that were of greatest power in all GRAECI, for the signiorie thereof. Whereby their onely marke & purpose was, to rid all GRAECE from the warres of the GAVLES and ILLYRIANS, and to restore it againe to the honest gouernment of the race and lyne of Hercules. Their deathes, me thinkes, doe shew great difference of their corages. For the GRACCHI fighting with their owne Citi-C zens, were slaine flying. Of these two also, Agis, bicause he would put neuer a Citizen to death, was slayne in manner voluntarily: and Cleomenes receiuing iniurie stoode to his defence, and when he had no oportunitie to doe it, he stowtly killed him selfe. And so may it be said on thother side, that Agis did neuer any noble acte of a Captaine or souldier, bicause he was slayne before he could come to it. And for the victories of Cleomenes on thother side, may be opposed the scaling of the walls of CARTHAGE, where Tiberius was the first man that at the assault got vp vpon the wall, which was no small exployte: and the peace which he made also at the seege of NVMANTIA, whereby he saued twenty thowsand fighting men of the ROMANES, the which had no meanes otherwise to saue their liues. And Caius also in the selfe same warre, at the seege of NVMANTIA, and afterwards in SARDINIA, did many noble feates of warre: so that D there is no doubt, but if they had not bene slaine so soone as they were, they might haue bene compared with the excellentest Captaines that euer were in ROME. Again, touching their doings in ciuill pollicie, it appeareth that Agis delt more slackly, being abused by Agesilaus: who likewise deceiued the poore Citizens of the diuision of the landes which he had promised them. In fine, for lacke of corage, bicause he was very young, he left the thinges vndone which he had purposed to haue performed. On thother side, Cleomenes went too rowndly to worke to renew the auncient gouernment of the common wealth againe, by killing the Ephores with too much crueltie, whom he might easily haue wonne, or otherwise by force haue gotten the vpper hande. For it is not the parte of a wise Phisition, nor of a good gouernor of a common weale to vse the sword, but in great extreamitie, where there is no other helpe nor remedie: &
E there lacked iudgement in them both, but worst of all in the one, for iniury is euer ioyned with crueltie. The GRACCHI on thother side, nether the one nor the other, began to embrew their hands in the blood of their Citizens. For it is reported, that though they did hurt Caius, yet he would neuer defend him selfe: and where it was knowen that he was very valliant in battell with his sword in his hand against the enemie, he shewed him selfe as cold againe in the vprore against his Citizens. For he went out of his house vnarmed, and fled when he saw them fight: being more circumspect not to doe hurt, then not to suffer any. Therefore they are not to be thought cowards for their flying, but rather men fearefull to offend any man. For they were driuen, either to yeeld to them that followed them, or els if they stayed, to stande to their de-F fence, bicause they might keepe them selues from hurt. And where they accuse Tiberius for the faults he committed, the greatest that euer he did, was when he deposed Octauius his colleague from the Tribuneship, and that he him selfe made suto for the second. And as for Caius, they falsely accused him for the death of Antyllius the Sergeaunt, who in deede was slayne vnknowen to him, and to his great griefe. Where Cleomenes on thother side, although we should forget the murder he committed vpon the Ephores, yet he set slaues at libertie, and ruled the kingdom in manner him selfe alone: but yet for manners sake onely he ioyned his owne brother with him, which was of the selfe same house. And when he had perswaded Archidamus, (who was next heire to the kingdom of the other royall house) to be bold to returne home from MESSENA vnto SPARTA: he suffered him to be slayne, and bicause he did not reuenge his death, he did confirme their opinion that thought he was consenting to his death. Lycurgus on the other side, whose example he did counterfeate to followe, bicause he did willingly resigne the kingdom vnto his brothers sonne Charilaus, and being afrayd also, that if the young child should chaunce to miscary, they would suspect him for his death: he exiled him selfe out of his owne contry a long time, trauelling vp and downe, and returned not to SPARTA againe, before Charilaus had gotten a sonne to succeede him in his kingdom. But we can not set another GRÆCIAN by Lycurgus comparable vnto him. We haue declared also that amongest Cleomenes deedes, there were many other greater alteracions then these, and also many other breaches of the lawe. So they that doe condemne the manners of the one and the other, say, that the two GRÆCIANS from the beginning had an aspyring minde to be tyrannes, still practising warres. Whereas the two ROMANES onely, euen by their most mortall enemies, could be blamed for nothing els, but for an extreame ambition, and did confesse that they were too earnest and vehement aboue their nature, in any strife or contencion they had with their aduersaries, and that they yelded vnto that choller and passion, as vnto ill windes, which brought them to doe those thinges they did in the ende. For what more iust or honest intent could they haue had, then the first was: had not the riche men (euen through stowtnes and authoritie to ouerthrow the lawes) brought them against their wills into quarrell: the one to saue his life, the other to reuenge his brothers death, who was slayne without order, iustice, or the authoritie of any officer? Thus thou maiest thy selfe see the difference, that was betwene the GRÆCIANS and ROMANES: and nowe to tell you plainly my opinion of both, I think that Tiberius was the stowtest of the foure, that the younge king Agis offended least, and that for boldnes and corage, Caius came nothing neare vnto Cleomenes.

A HE that made the litle booke of the praiſe of Alcibiades, touching the victorie he wanne at the horſe raſe of the Olympian games, (were it the Poet Euripides as ſome thinke, or any other) my friende Soſius: ſayde, that to make a man happy, he muſt of neceſſitie be borne in ſome famous citie. But to tell you what I thinke hereof, douteles, true happines chiefly conſiſteth in the vertue and qualities of the minde, being a matter of no moment, whether a man be borne in a pelting village, or in a famous citie: no more then it is for one to be borne of a fayer or fowle mother. For it were a madnes to thinke that the litle village of IVLIDE, being the leaſt part of the Ile of CEO (the whole Iland of it ſelfe being but a ſmall B thing) and that the Ile of ÆGINA (which is of ſo ſmal a length, that a certaine ATHENIAN on a time made a motion it might be taken away, bicauſe it was but as a ſtrawe in the ſight of the hauen of Piræa) could bring forth famous Poets, and excellent Comediants: and not breede an honeſt, iuſt, and wiſe man, and of noble corage. For, as we haue reaſon to thinke that artes and ſciences which were firſt deuiſed and inuented to make ſome thinges neceſſary for mens vſe, or otherwiſe to winne fame and credit, are drowned, and caſt away in litle poore villages: So are we to iudge alſo, that vertue, like a ſtrong and frutefull plant, can take roote, and bringe forth in euery place, where it is graffed in a good nature, and gentle perſon, that can patiently away with paines. And therefore if we chaunce to offend, and liue not as we ſhould: we can not accuſe the meanenes of our contry where we were borne, but we muſt iuſtly accuſe our C ſelues. Surely he that hath taken vpon him to put forth any worke, or to write any hiſtorie, into the which he is to thruſt many ſtraunge things vnknowen to his contry, and which are not ready at his hand to be had, but diſperſed abroad in diuers places, and are to be gathered out of diuers bookes and authorities: firſt of all, he muſt needes remaine in ſome great and famous citie throughly inhabited, where men doe delight in good and vertuous thinges, bicauſe there are commonly plenty of all ſortes of bookes: and that peruſing them, and hearing talke alſo of many things beſides, which other Hiſtoriographers peraduenture haue not written of, and which will cary ſo much more credit, bicauſe men that are aliue may preſently ſpeake of them as of their owne knowledge, whereby he may make his worke perfect in euery poynt, hauing many and diuers neceſſary things conteyned in it. But I my ſelfe that dwell in a poore litle towne,and yet doe remayne there willingly leaſt it ſhould become leſſe: whileſt I was in ITALY,and at ROME,I had no leyſure to ſtudy and exerciſe the Latine tongue, aſwell for the great buſines I had then to doe, as alſo to ſatisfie them that came to learne Philoſophie of me: ſo that euen ſomewhat too late,and now in my latter time, I began to take my Latine bookes in my hand. And thereby,a ſtraunge thing to tell you,but yet true: I learned not, nor vnderſtood matters ſo much by the words,as I came to vnderſtand the words,by common experience & knowledge I had in things. But furthermore, to knowe howe to pronownce the Latin tongue well,or to ſpeake it readily,or to vnderſtand the ſignification,tranſlations, and fine ioyning of the ſimple words one with another,which doe bewtifie & ſet forth the tongue: ſurely I iudge it to be a maruailous pleaſant and ſweete thing, but withall it requireth a long and laborſome ſtudy,meete for thoſe that haue better leyſure then I haue,& that haue young yeares on their backes to follow ſuch pleaſure. Therefore,in this preſent booke,which is the fift of this work, where I haue taken vpon me to compare the liues of noble men one with another: vndertaking to write the liues of Demoſthenes and Cicero, we will conſider and examine their nature, manners and condicions,by their acts and deedes in the gouernment of the common wealth, not meaning otherwiſe to conferre their workes and writings of eloquence, nether to define which of them two was ſharper or ſweeter in his oration. For,as the Poet Ion ſayth,

In this behalfe a man may rightly ſay, The Dolphynes in their proper ſoyle doe play.

Demoſthenes cõpared with Cicero.

The which Cæcilius litle vnderſtanding,being a man very raſhe in all his doings,hath vnaduiſedly written and ſet forth in print, a compariſon of Demoſthenes eloquence,with Ciceroes. But if it were an eaſie matter for euery man to know him ſelfe, then the goddes needed haue giuen vs no commaundement,nether could men haue ſaid that it came from heauen. But for my opiniõ,me thinks fortune euen from the beginning hath framed in maner one ſelf mowld of Demoſthenes and Cicero,and hath in their natures facioned many of their qualities one like to the other: as,both of them to be ambitious,both of them to loue the libertie of their contry, and both of them very feareful in any daunger of warres. And likewiſe their fortunes ſeeme to me,to be both much alike. For it is harde to finde two Orators againe,that being ſo meanely borne as they, haue comen to be of ſo great power and authoritie as they two, nor that haue deſerued the ill will of kings & noble men ſo much as they haue done, nor that haue loſt their Daughters,nor that haue bene baniſhed their contries,& that haue bene reſtored againe with honor,and that againe haue fled,and haue bene taken againe, nor that haue ended their liues with the libertie of their cõtry. So that it is hard to be iudged,whether nature haue made them liker in manners, or fortune in their doings, as if they had both like cunning workemaiſters ſtriued one with the other,to whome they ſhould make them beſt reſemble. But firſt of all we muſt write of the elder of them two.

The parentsage of Demoſthenes.

Demoſthenes the father of this Orator Demoſthenes, was as Theopompus writeth, one of the chiefe men of the citie,and they called him Machæropœus, to wete, a maker of ſworde blades, bicauſe he had a great ſhoppe where he kept a number of ſlaues to forge them. But touching AEſchynes,the Orators report of his mother,who ſaid that ſhe was the Daughter of one Gelon (that fled from ATHENS beeing accuſed of treaſon) and of a barbarous woman that was her mother: I am not able to ſay whether it be true,or deuiſed of malice to doe him deſpite. Howſoeuer it was,it is true that his father died, leauing him ſeuen yeare olde, and left him reaſonable wel: for his goods came to litle leſſe then the value of fifteene talents. Howbeit his gardians did him great wronge: for they ſtale a great parte of his goods them ſelues, and did let the reſt runne to naught,as hauing litle care of it, for they would not pay his ſchoolemaiſters their wages. And this was the cauſe that he did not learne the liberall ſciences which are vſually taught vnto honeſt mens ſonnes: and to further that want alſo, he was but a weakling, & very tender,and therefore his mother would not much let him goe to ſchoole,nether his maſters alſo durſt keepe him too hard to it,bicauſe he was but a ſickly childe at the firſt, and very weake. And it is reported alſo, that the ſurname of Battalus was giuen him in mockery by other ſchooleboyes his companions,bicauſe of his weaknes of bodye. This Battalus (as diuers men doe report) was an effeminate player on the flute,againſt whom the Poet Antiphanes to

A mocke him, deuiſed a litle play. Others alſo doe write of one Battalus, a diſſolute Orator, and that wrote laſciuious verſes: and it ſeemeth that the ATHENIANS at that time did call a certaine part of mans body vncomely to be named, Battalus. Now for Argas (which ſurname men ſay was alſo giuen him) he was ſo called, either for his rude and beaſtly maners, (bicauſe ſome Poets doe call a ſnake Argas) or els for his maner of ſpeech, which was very vnpleaſant to the eare: for Argas is the name of a Poet, that made alwayes bawdy & ill fauored ſongs. But hereof enough as Plato ſaid. Furthermore, the occaſion (as it is reported) that moued him to giue him ſelfe to eloquence, was this. Caliſtratus the Orator was to defend the cauſe of one Oropus before the Iudges, and euery man longed greatly for this daye of pleading, both for the excellencie of the Orator, that then bare the bell for eloquence: as for the matter, and his accuſati-

B on, which was manifeſtly knowen to all. Demoſthenes hearing his ſchoolemaſters agree together to goe to the hearing of this matter, he prayed his ſchoolemaſter to be ſo good, as to let him goe with him. His Maiſter graunted him, and being acquainted with the keepers of the hal dore where this matter was to be pleaded, he ſo intreated them, that they placed his ſcholler in a very good place, where being ſet at his eaſe, he might both ſee and heare all that was done, and no man could ſee him. Thereuppon, when Demoſthenes had heard the caſe pleaded, he was greatly in loue with the honor which the Orator had gotten, when he ſawe howe he was wayted vpon home with ſuch a trayne of people after him: but yet he wondred more at the force of his great eloquence, that could ſo turne and conuey all thinges at his pleaſure. Thereuppon he left the ſtudie of all other ſciences, and all other exerciſes of witte and bodye,

C which other children are brought vp in: and beganne to labor continually, and to frame him ſelfe to make orations, with intent one day to be an Orator amonge the reſt. His Maiſter that taught him Rethoricke was Iſæus, notwithſtanding that Iſocrates alſo kept a ſchoole of Rethoricke at that time: either bicauſe that beeing an orphane he was not able to paye the wages that Iſocrates demaunded of his ſchollers, which was ten Minas: or rather for that he founde Iſæus manner of ſpeeche more propper for the vſe of the eloquence he deſired, bicauſe it was more finer, & ſutler. Yet Hermippus writeth notwithſtanding, that he had red certayne bookes, hauing no name of any author, which declared that Demoſthenes had bene Platoes ſcholler, and that by hearing of him, he learned to frame his pronunciation and eloquence. And he writeth alſo of one Cteſibius, who reporteth that Demoſthenes had ſecretly redde Iſocrates workes of Re-

D thoricke, and alſo Alcidamus bookes, by meanes of one Callias SYRACVSAN, and others. Wherefore when he came out of his wardeſhippe, he beganne to put his gardians in ſute, and to write orations and pleas againſt them: who in contrary manner did euer vſe delayes and excuſes, to ſaue them ſelues from giuing vp any accompt vnto him, of his goods and patrimony left him. And thus, following this exerciſe (as Thucydides writeth) it proſpered ſo well with him, that in the ende he obtayned it, but not without great paynes and daunger: and yet with all that he could doe, he could not recouer all that his father left him, by a good deale. So hauing now gotten ſome boldnes, and being vſed alſo to ſpeake in open preſence, and withall, hauing a feeling and delight of the eſtimation that is wonne by eloquence in pleading: afterwards he attempted to put forward him ſelfe, and to practiſe in matters of ſtate. For, as there

E goeth a tale of one Laomedon an ORCHOMENIAN, who hauing a grieuous paine in the ſplene, by aduiſe of the Phiſitions was willed to runne long courſes to helpe him: and that following their order, he became in the end ſo luſty & nymble of body, that afterwards he would needes make one to ronne for games, & in deede grew to be the ſwifteſt runner of all men in his time. Euen ſo the like chaunced vnto Demoſthenes. For at the firſt, beginning to practiſe oratorie for recouerie of his goods, and thereby hauing gotten good skill and knowledge how to pleade: he afterwards tooke apon him to ſpeake to the people in aſſemblies, touching the gouernment of the common wealth, euen as if he ſhould haue contended for ſome game of price, & at length did excell all the Orators at that time that got vp into the pulpit for orations: notwithſtanding that when he firſt ventred to ſpeake openly, the people made ſuch a noyſe, that

F he could ſcant be heard, and beſides they mocked him for his manner of ſpeeche that was ſo ſtraunge, bicauſe he vſed ſo many long confuſed peryods, and his matter he ſpake of was ſo intricate with arguments one apon another, that they were tedious, and made men weary to heare him. And furthermore, he had a very soft voice, an impediment in his tongue, and had A also a short breath, the which made that men could not well vnderstand what he ment, for his long periods in his oration were oftentimes interrupted, before he was at the ende of his sentence. So that at length, perceiuing he was thus reiected, he gaue ouer to speake any more before the people, and halfe in dispaire withdrew him selfe into the hauen of Piræa. There Eu- nomus the THESSALIAN beeing a very olde man, founde him, and sharpely reproued him, and told him that he did him selfe great wronge, considering, that hauing a manner of speeche much like vnto Pericles, he drowned him selfe by his faynt harte, bicause he did not seeke the way to be bolde against the noyse of the common people, and to arme his body to away with the paines and burden of publike orations, but suffering it to growe feebler, for lacke of vse and practise. Furthermore, being once againe repulsed and whistled at, as he returned home, B hanging downe his heade for shame, and vtterly discouraged: Satyrus an excellent player of comedies, being his familliar friende, followed him, and went and spake with him. Demosthe- nes made his complaynt vnto him, that where he had taken more paynes then all the Orators besides, and had almost euen worne him selfe to the bones with studie, yet he coulde by no meanes deuise to please the people: whereas other Orators that did nothing but bybbe all day long, and Maryners that vnderstoode nothing, were quietly heard, and continually occupied the pulpit with orations: and on thother side that they made no accompt of him. Saty- rus then aunswered him, thou sayest true Demosthenes, but care not for this, I will helpe it straight, and take away the cause of all this: so thou wilt but tell me without booke certaine verses of Euripides, or of Sophocles. Thereuppon Demosthenes presently rehearsed some vnto C him, that came into his minde. Satyrus repeating them after him, gaue them quite another grace, with such a pronunciation, comely gesture, and modest countenance becomming the verses, that Demosthenes thought them cleane chaunged. Whereby perceiuing how much the action (to wete, the comely manner and gesture in his oration) doth giue grace and comlines in his pleading: he then thought it but a trifle, and almost nothing to speake of, to exercise to pleade well, vnles therewithall he doe also study to haue a good pronunciation and gesture.

Demosthenes celler.

Thereuppon he built him a celler vnder the ground, the which was whole euen in my time, & he would daily goe downe into it, to facion his gesture and pronunciation, and also to exercise his voice, and that with such earnest affection, that oftentimes he would be there two or three monethes one after an other, and did shaue his heade of purpose, bicause he durst not goe a- D broade in that sorte, although his will was good. And yet he tooke his theame and matter to declame apon, and to practise to pleade of the matters he had had in hande before, or els vpon occasion of such talke as he had with them that came to see him, while he kept his house. For they were no sooner gone from him, but he went downe into his celler, and repeated from the first to the last all matters that had passed betwene him and his friendes in talke together, and alleaged also both his owne and their aunswers. And if peraduenture he had bene at the hearing of any long matter, he would repeate it by him selfe: and would finely cowche and conuey it into propper sentences, and thus chaunge and alter euery way any matter that he had heard, or talked with others. Thereof came the opinion men had of him, that he had no very quicke capacitie by nature, and that his eloquence was not naturall, but artificially gotten E with extreame labor. And for proofe hereof, they make this probable reason, That they neuer Demosthenes seldom pleaded on the suddein.

sawe Demosthenes make any oration on the suddein, and that oftentymes when he was sette in the assemblie, the people would call him by his name, to say his opinion touching the matter of counsell then in hand: Howbeit that he neuer rose vpon their call, vnles he had first studied the matter well he would speake of. So that all the other Orators would many times giue him a tawnte for it: as Pytheas among other, that tawnting him on a tyme, tolde him, his reasons smelled of the lampe. Yea, replyed Demosthenes sharply againe: so is there great difference, Py- theas, betwixt thy labor and myne by lampelight. And him selfe also speaking to others, did not altogether deny it, but told them plainly, that he did not alwaies write at length all that he would speake, nether did he also offer to speake, before he had made briefes of that he would F speake. He sayd furthermore, that it was a token the man loued the people well, that he would be carefull before what he would say to them. For this prepratiue (sayd he) doth shewe that he doth

A doth honor and reuerence them. In contrary manner also, he that passeth not how the people take his words, it is a plaine token that he despiseth their authoritie, & that he lacketh no good will (if he could) to vse force against them, rather then reason and perswasion. But yet further to enlarge the proofes, that Demosthenes had no hart to make any oration on the suddein, they doe alleage this reason: that Demades many times rose vpon the sodaine to mainteyne Demosthenes reasons, when the people otherwhile did reiect him: and that Demosthenes on thother side did neuer rise to make Demades words good, which he had spoken in his behalfe. But now might a man aske againe: if Demosthenes was so timerous to speake before the people vpon the sodaine: what ment AEschines then to say, that he was maruelous bold in his words. And how chanceth it, that he rising vpon the sodaine, did presently aunswer the Orator Python BIZAN-B TINE in the field, that was very lusty in speech, (& rough like a vehement running streame) against the ATHENIANS. And how chanced it that Lamachus MYRRINÆIAN, hauing made an oration in the praise of Philip and Alexander, kings of MACEDON, in the which he spake all the ill he could of the THEBANS, and of the OLYNTHIANS, and when he had red and pronounced it in the open assembly of the Olympian games: Demosthenes apon the instant rising vp on his feete, declared, as if he had red some historie, & poynted as it were with his finger vnto all the whole assembly, the notable great seruice & worthy deedes the which the CHALCIDIANS had done in former times, for the benefit and honor of GRÆCE. And in contrary maner also, what mischief & inconuenience came by meanes of the flatterers, that altogether gaue them selues to curry fauor with the MACEDONIANS? With these and such like perswasions, Demosthenes
C made such sturre amongest the people, that the Orator Lamachus being affraid of the sodaine vprore, did secretly conuey him selfe out of the assembly. But yet to tell you what I thinke, Demosthenes in my opinion facioning him selfe euen from the beginning, to followe Pericles steppes and example, he thought that for other qualities he had, they were not so requisite for him, and that he would counterfeate his grauitie and sober countenance, and to be wise, not to speake ouer lightly to euery matter at all aduentures: iudging, that by that manner of wisedom he came to be great. And like as he would not let slippe any good occasion to speake, where it might be for his credit: so would he not likewise ouer rashely hazard his credit and reputacion to the mercy of fortune. And to proue this true, the orations which he made vpon the sodaine without premeditacion before, doe shewe more boldnes and courage, then D those which he had written, and studied long before: if we may beleeue the reports of Eratosthenes, Demetrius PHALERIAN, and of the other comicall Poets. For Eratosthenes sayd, that he would be often caried away with choller and furie. Demetrius also sayth, that speaking one daye to the people, he swaare a great othe in ryme, as if he had bene possessed with some diuine spirit, and sayd,

By sea and land, by riuers, springes, and Ponds.

There are also certaine comicall Poets that doe call him Ropoperperethra, as who would say, a great babbler that speaketh all thinges that commeth to his tongues ende. Another mocked him for too much affecting a figure of Rethoricke called, Antitheton: which is, opposicion, with saying, Sic recepit sicut cepit, (which signifieth, he tooke it as he found it.) In the vse of E this figure Demosthenes much pleased him selfe, vnles the poet Antiphanes speaketh it of pleasure, deriding the counsel he gaue the people, not to take the Ile of HALONESVS of king Philip, as of gift: but to receiue it as their owne restored. And yet euery body did graunt, that Demades of his owne naturall wit, without arte, was inuincible: and that many times speaking vpon the sodaine, he did vtterly ouerthrow Demosthenes long studied reasons. And Aristo, of the Ile of CHIO, hath written Theophrastus iudgement of the Orators of that time. Who being asked what maner of Orator he thought Demosthenes: he aunswered, worthy of this citie. Then again, how he thought of Demades: aboue this citie, said he. The same Philosopher writeth also, that Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN, (one of those that practised at that time in the common wealth) gaue this sentence: that Demosthenes in deede was a great Orator, but Phocions tongue had a sharper F vnderstanding, bicause in fewe wordes, he comprehended much matter. And to this purpose, they say that Demosthenes him selfe said also, that as oft as he saw Phocion get vp into the pulpit for orations to speake against him, he was wont to say to his friends: see, the axe of my words riſeth. And yet it is hard to iudge, whether he ſpake that in reſpect of his tongue, or rather for the eſtimacion he had gotten, bicauſe of his great wiſedome: thinking (as in deede it is true) that one word only, the twinckling of an eye, or a nod of his head of ſuch a man (that through his worthines is attained to that credit) hath more force to perſwade, then all the fine reaſons & deuiſes of Rethoricke. But now for his bodily defects of nature, Demetrius PHALERIAN writeth, that he heard Demoſthenes him ſelfe ſay, being very olde, that he did helpe them by theſe meanes. Firſt, touching the ſtammering of his tongue, which was very fat, and made him that he could not pronounce all ſyllables diſtinctly: he did helpe it by putting of litle pybble ſtones into his mouth, which he found vpon the ſands by the riuers ſide, & ſo pronounced with open mouth the orations he had without booke. And for his ſmal and ſoft voice, he made that lowder, by running vp ſteepe and high hills, vttering euen with full breath ſome orations or verſes that he had without booke. And further it is reported of him, that he had a great looking glaſſe in his houſe, and euer ſtanding on his feete before it, he would learne and exerciſe him ſelfe to pronounce his orations. For proofe hereof it is reported, that there came a man vnto him on a time, and prayed his helpe to defend his cauſe, and tolde him that one had beaten him: and that Demoſthenes ſayd agayne vnto him, I doe not beleeue this is true thou telleſt me, for ſurely the other did neuer beate thee. The playntif then thruſting out his voyce alowde, ſayde: what, hath he not beaten me? yes, in deede, q. Demoſthenes then: I beleeue it now, for I heare the voyce of a man that was beaten in deede. Thus he thought, that the ſound of the voyce, the pronunciation or geſture in one ſort or other, were thinges of force to beleeue or diſcredit that a man ſayth. His countenaunce when he pleaded before the people, did maruailouſly pleaſe the common ſorte: but the noble men, and men of vnderſtanding, found it too baſe and meane, as Demetrius Phalerius ſayde, amonge others. And Hermippus writeth, that one called AEſion, beeing asked of the auncient Orators, and of thoſe of his tyme, aunſwered: that euery man that had ſeene them, would haue wondred with what honor, reuerence, and modeſtie, they ſpake vnto the people: howbeit that Demoſthenes orations (whoſoeuer red them) were too artificiall and vehement. And therefore we may eaſily iudge, that the orations Demoſthenes wrote are very ſeuere and ſharpe. This notwithſtanding, otherwhile he would giue many pleaſant and witty aunſwers apon the ſodain. As when Demades one day ſayd vnto him, Demoſthenes will teach me: after the common prouerbe, the ſowe will teach Minerua. He aunſwered ſtraight againe: This Minerua not long ſince, was in Collytus ſtreete, taken in adulterie. A certein theefe alſo called Chalcus (as much to ſay, as of copper) ſtepping forth to ſaye ſomewhat of Demoſthenes late ſitting vp a nights, and that he wrote and ſtudied the moſt part of the night by lampe light: in deede, q. Demoſthenes, I know it grieues thee to ſee my lampe burne all night. And therefore, you, my Lords of ATHENS, me thinkes you ſhould not wonder to ſee ſuch robberies in your citie, conſidering we haue theeues of copper, and the walles of our houſes be but of claye. We could tell you of diuers others of his like wittie and pleaſant aunſwers, but theſe may ſuffice for this preſent: and therefore we will proceede to conſider further of his nature and conditions, by his actes and deedes in the affaires of the common wealth. Now Demoſthenes firſt beginning when he came to deale in the affaires of the ſtate, was in the time of the warre made with the PHOCIANS, as him ſelfe reporteth: and as appeareth further in his orations which he made againſt Philip: of the which, the laſt were made after the warre was ended, & the firſt doe touch alſo ſome particuler doings of the ſame. He made the oration againſt Midias, when he was but 32. yeare old, and was of ſmall countenance & reputacion in the common wealth: the want whereof was the chiefeſt cauſe (as I thinke) that induced him to take money for the iniury he had done him, & to let his action fall againſt him.

He vvas not of a meeld and gentle mind, But feerce and haſtie to reuenge by kind.

But, knowing that it was no ſmall enterpriſe, nor that could take effect by a man of ſo ſmall power & authoritie as him ſelfe, to ouerthrow a man ſo wealthy, ſo befriended, & ſo eloquent as Midias: he therfore yelded him ſelfe vnto thoſe, that did ſpeake & intreate for him. Nether do I think that the three thowſand Drachmas which he receiued, could haue brideled the bitternes of his nature, if otherwiſe he had ſeene any hope or likelihood that he could haue prevailed

A trailed againſt him. Now at his firſt cõming vnto the common wealth, taking a noble matter in hãd to ſpeak againſt Philip, for the defence & maintenãce of the lawes & liberties of the GRÆCIANS, wherein he handled himſelf ſo worthely: that in ſhort ſpace he wanne him maruelous fame for his great eloquence and plaine manner of ſpeech. Thereby he was maruelouſly honored alſo through all GRÆCE, and greatly eſteemed with the king of PERSIA: and Philip himſelf made more accompt of him, then of all the Orators in ATHENS, & his greateſt foes which were moſt againſt him, were driuen to confeſſe that they had to doe with a famous man. For, in the orations which AEſchines & Hyperides made to accuſe him, they write thus of him. And therefore I maruell what Theopompus ment, when he wrote that Demoſthenes had a ſuttell, vnconſtant mind, & could not long continue with one kind of men, nor in one mind for matters

B of ſtate. For in contrary maner, in my iudgement, he continued conſtant ſtill to the end, in one ſelfe maner & order, vnto the which he had betaken him ſelf at the beginning: & that not only he neuer chaunged all his life time, but to the contrary he loſt his life, bicauſe he would be no chaungeling. For he did not like Demades, who to excuſe him ſelf for that he had oft turned coate in matters of gouernment, ſaid, that he went oftentimes againſt his own ſayings, as matters fel out: but neuer againſt the benefit of the common wealth. And Melanopus alſo, who was euer againſt Calliſtratus, hauing his mouth ſtopped many times with money, he would vp to the pulpit for orations, & tel the people, that in deede Calliſtratus, which mainteineth the contrary opinion againſt me, is mine enemy, & yet I yeld vnto him for this time: for, the benefit of the common wealth muſt cary it. And another alſo, Nicodemus MESSENIAN, who being firſt of

C Caſſanders ſide, toke part afterwards with Demetrius, & then ſaid, that he did not ſpeake againſt him ſelfe, but that it was meete he ſhould obey his ſuperiors. They can not detect Demoſthenes with the like, that he did euer halt or yeld, either in word or deed: For he euer continued firme and conſtant in one mind in his orations. Inſomuch that Panetius the Philoſopher ſayth, that the moſt part of all his orations are grounded vpon this maxime and principle: that for it ſelfe, nothing is to be taken or accepted, but that which is honeſt. As, the oration of the crowne, the which he made againſt Ariſtocrates: that alſo which he made for the franches and freedom: and in fine, all his orations againſt Philip of MACEDON. And in all thoſe he doth not perſwade his contry men to take that which is moſt pleaſant, eaſieſt, or moſt profitable: but he proueth that oftentimes honeſtie is to be preferred aboue ſafetie or health. So that, had he in

D all his orations and doings, ioyned to his honeſtie, curteſie, and francke ſpeeche, valliantnes in warres, and cleane hands from briberye: he might deſeruedly haue bene compared, not with Myrocles, Polyeuctus, Hyperides and ſuch other Orators: but euen with the higheſt, with Cimon, Thucydides, and Pericles. For Phocion, who tooke the worſt way in gouernment of the common wealth, bicauſe he was ſuſpected that he tooke part with the MACEDONIANS: yet for valliantnes, wiſedom and iuſtice, he was euer thought as honeſt a man, as Ephialtes, and Ariſtides. But Demoſthenes on thother ſide (as Demetrius ſayth) was no man to truſt to for warres, nether had he any power to refuſe gifts and bribes. For, though he would neuer be corrupted with Philip king of MACEDON, yet he was bribed with gold and ſiluer that was brought from the cities of

E SVSA & ECBATANA, & was very ready to praiſe & commend the deedes of their auncеſtors, but not to follow them. Truely, yet was he the honeſteſt man of all other Orators in his time, excepting Phocion. And beſides, he did euer ſpeake more boldely and plainely to the people then any man els, and would openly contrary their mindes, and ſharpely reproue the ATHENIANS for their faultes, as appeareth by his orations. Theopompus alſo writeth, that the people on a time would haue had him to accuſe a man, whome they would needes haue condemned. But he refuſing to doe it, the people were offended, and did mutine againſt him. Thereuppon he riſing vp, ſayd openly vnto them: my Lordes ATHENIANS, I will alwayes counſell ye to that which I thinke beſt for the benefit of the common wealth, although it be againſt your mindes: but falſely to accuſe one, to ſatisfie your minds, though you commaund me, I wil not do it. Furthermore, that which he did againſt Antiphon, ſheweth plainly, that he was no people

F pleaſer, and that he did leane more vnto the authoritie of the Senate. For when Antiphon was quit by the people in an aſſemblie of the citie: Demoſthenes notwithſtanding tooke him, & called him againe into the Court of the Areopagites, ahd did not paſſe vpon the peoples ill will,

Note the inconſtancy and ſuttell euaſion of theſe Orators.

Demoſthenes preferreth honeſty, as a ſpeciall rule in his orations.

Demoſthenes, a timorous man, and giuen to bribes.

Demoſthenes franke ſpeech in his orations but there conuinced him for promising Philip of MACEDON to burne the arsenall of ATHENS: so by sentence of that court he was condemned, & suffred for it. He did also accuse the Nunne Theorides for many lewd parts committed, & amongst others, for that she taught slaues to deceiue their maisters: & so following the matter against her to death, she was condemned, and executed. It is thought also, that he made the oration Apollodorus spake against the Prætor Timotheus, & proued thereby that he was a detter to the common wealth, & so a naughty man: & that he wrote those orations also intituled vnto Formio and Stephanus, for the which he was iustly reproued. For Formio pleaded against Apollodorus with the oration which Demosthenes selfe had made for him: which was euen alike, as if out of one selfe cutlers shoppe, he had solde his enemies swords one to kil another. And for his knowen orations, those which he made against Androtion, Timocrates, and Aristocrates: he caused them to giue them vnto others, when he had not yet delt in matters of state. For in deede when he did put them forth, he was not passing seuen or eight and twenty yeare olde. The oration which he made against Aristogiton, and the other also of libertie, against Ctesippus the sonne of Cabrias, he spake them, as he saith him selfe, (or as others write) openly vnto the people, bicause he intended to marry Chabrias mother. Howbeit he did not, but maried a SAMIAN womā, as Demetrius Magnesius writeth in his booke he made intituled Synonyma, and in that he wrote against AEschines: where he accuseth him that he delt falsely when he was Ambassador. It is not knowen whether it was euer recited or not, although Idomeneus writeth, that there lacked but thirtye voices onely to haue quit AEschines. But in this me thinkes he spake not truely, and doth but coniecture it, by that the one & the other haue sayd in their orations against the crowne, in the which, nether the one nor the other doe say precisely, that this accusation proceeded to iudgement. But let other that lyst decide this doubt. Now before the warre beganne, it was euident enough, to which parte Demosthenes would incline in the common wealth: For, he would neuer leaue to reproue and withstand Philippes doings. Therefore he being more spoken of in Philippes Court, then any man els, he was sent vnto him the tenth person with nyne others in ambassade. Philippe gaue them all audience one after an other: howbeit he was more carefull and circumspect to aunswer Demosthenes oration, then all the rest. But otherwise out of that place, he did not Demosthenes so much honor, nor gaue him so good entertainment, as to his other companions. For Philip shewed more kindnes, and gaue better countenance vnto Æschines, and Philocrates, then vnto him. Wherefore when they did highly praise Philip, and sayd that he was a well spoken Prince, a fayer man, and would drinke freely, and be pleasant in company: Demosthenes smyled at it, and turned all those thinges to the worst, saying, that those qualities were nothing commendable nor meete for a king. For, the first was a qualitie meete for a pleader, the second for a woman, and the third for a sponge. In fine, warres falling out betwene them, bicause Philip of the one side could not liue in peace, & the ATHENIANS on the other side were stil incensed & stirred vp by Demosthenes daily orations. Whereupon, the ATHENIANS first sent into the Ile of EVBOEA, (the which by meanes of certaine priuate tyrannes that had taken the townes, became subiect againe vnto Philip) following a decree Demosthenes had preferred, & so went to expulse the MACEDONIANS againe. After that also he caused them to send ayde vnto the BIZANTINES, & vnto the PERINTHIANS, with whom Philip made warre. For he so perswaded the ATHENIANS, that he made them forget the malice they did beare vnto those two nations, & the faults which either of both the cities had committed against them in the warres, touching the rebellion of their confederats: & he caused them to send them ayde, which kept them frō Philips force & power. Furthermore, going afterwards vnto all the great cities of GRÆCE as Ambassador, he did so solicite & perswade them, that he brought them all in manner to be against Philip. So that the army which their tribe should find at their common charge, was fifteene thowsand footemen, all straungers, and two thowsand horsemen, besides the Citizens of euery citie which should also serue in the warres at their charge: and the money leauied for the maintenance of this warre, was very willingly disbursed. Theophrastus writeth, that it was at that tyme their confederats did pray that they would set downe a certaine summe of money, what euery citie shoulde paye: and that Crobylus an Orator shoulde make aunswer, that the warre had no certaine maintenance: inferring that the charges of warre was infinite Demosthenes orations which were true and which falst.

Demosthenes doings against Philip.

Demosthenes stirreth vp Græce against the Macedonians.

A infinite. Now all GRÆCE being in armes, attending what should happen, and all these people and cities being vnite in one league together, as, the EVBOIANS, the ATHENIANS, the CORINTHIANS, the MEGARIANS, the LEVCADIANS, and the GORGYRIÆTANS: the greatest matter Demosthenes had to do, was to perswade the THEBANS also to enter into this league, bicause their contry confined and bordered with ATTICA, besides, their force and power was of great importance, for that they caried the fame of all GRÆCIA at that time, for the valliantest souldiers. But it was no trifling matter to winne the THEBANS, and so make them breake with Philip, who but lately before had bound them vnto him by many great pleasures which he had done to them, in the warre of the PHOCIANS: besides also that betwixt ATHENS & THEBES, by reason of vicinitie, there fell out daily quarells and debates, the which with euery litle thing were B soone renued. This notwithstanding, Philippe being prowde of the victorie he had wonne by the citie of AMPHISSE, when he came and inuaded the contry of ELATEIA, and was entred into PHOCIDE: the ATHENIANS were then so amased with it, that no man durst occupie the pulpit for orations, neither could they tell what way to take. Thus the whole assemblie standing in a doubt with great silence, Demosthenes onely stept vp, and did agayne giue them counsell to seeke to make league and alliance with the THEBANS: and so did further encourage the people, and put them in good hope, as he was alwayes wont to doe. Then with others he was sent Ambassador vnto THEBES: and Philippe also for his parte, sent Ambassadors vnto the THEBANS, Amyntas and Clearchus, two gentlemen MACEDONIANS, and with them, Deochus, Thessalus, and Thrasydeus, to answer and withstande the perswasions of the ATHENIAN C Ambassadors. Thereuppon the THEBANS beganne to aduise them selues for the best, and layd before their eyes the miserable frutes and calamities of warre, their woundes being yet greene and vncured, which they gotte by the warres of PHOCIDE. Notwithstanding, the great force of Demosthenes eloquence (as Theopompus writeth) did so inflame the THEBANS courage with desire of honor, that it trode vnder their feete all manner of considerations, and did so rauishe them with the loue and desire of honestie: that they cast at their heeles, all feare of daunger, all remembrance of pleasures receiued, and all reason perswading the contrary. This acte of an Orator was of so great force, that Philippe forthwith sent Ambassadors vnto the GRÆCIANS, to intreate for peace, and all GRÆCE was vppe, to see what would become of this sturre. Thus, not onely the Captaines of ATHENS obeyed Demosthenes, doing all that he commaun-D ded them: but the gouernors also of THEBES, and of all the contry of BOEOTIA besides. And the assemblies also of the counsell of THEBES were as well gouerned by him, as the assemblies of ATHENS, being alike beloued both of the one and the other, and hauing a like authoritie to commaund both, and not vndeseruedly, as Theopompus sayth, but by iust desert. But some fatall destinie, and the reuolucion of times had determined the finall ende of the libertie of GRÆCE at that time, cleane contrary to his purpose and intent. There were also many celestiall signes that did foreshewe and prognosticate what ende should ensue thereof. And amonge others, Apolloes Nunne gaue these dreadful oracles: and this olde prophecie of the SIBYLS was com-E monly song in euery bodies mouth.

Demosthenes force of eloquence ioyned the Thebans with the Athenians, and wanne them from Philippe king of Macedon.

The ouerthrow of the Græcians foreshewed at Chæronea, by signes and auncient oracles.

VVhat time the bluddy battell shall be fought at Thermodon, God graunt I may be farre awray, or els (to looke theron) Haue Egles vvings to sore aboue, among the clouvdes on hye.
For there the vanquisht side shall vveepe, and Conquerer shall dye.

Men do report that this Thermodon is a litle riuer of our contry of CHÆRONEA, the which falleth into the riuer of Cephisus: howbeit at this present time there is neuer a riuer nor brook in all our contry, that I know, called Thermodon. And I thinke, that that riuer which we call now Hæmon, was in old time Thermodon: for it runneth by the temple of Hercules, where the GRÆCIANS lay in campe. And it may be, that bicause it was filled with dead bodies, and that it ranne bloud at the day of the battel, it chaunged her name, & was surnamed Hæmon, bicause Hæma in the Greeke tongue, signifieth bloud. Yet Duris writeth notwithstanding, that this
F Thermodon was no riuer, but that certaine men setting vp their tent, and trenching it about, found a litle image of stone, whereuppon were engrauen these letters, whereby it appeareth that it was a man called Thermodon, who caried an AMAZON hart in his armes, & that for this

The riuer of Thermodon, or Hæmon, in the contry of Chæronea.

Another opinion of Thermodon.

image of Thermodon, they do sing such another olde oracle as this: A

Ye Ernes and Rauens tary till the field of Thermodon There will be store of carkesses of men to fede vpon.

This notwithstanding, it is very hard to tell the trothe of these things. But Demosthenes trusting to the vallianenes and power of the GRÆCIANS, and being maruelously incoraged to see such a great number of valliant & resolute me, so willing to fight with the enemy: he bad them be of good corage, & not to busse about such olde tales, & to giue eare to those prophecies. And furthermore, he told them plainly, that he did mistrust the Nunne Pythia did leane vnto Philip, as fauoring him, & did put the THEBIANS in mind of their Captaine Epaminondas, & the ATHENIANS of Pericles, & perswaded them, that those two famous men were alwaies of opinion, that such prophecies were no other, but a fine cloke for cowards, & that taking no heede to them, B they did dispatch their matters according to their owne discretion. Vntil this present time, Demosthenes shewed him selfe alwaies an honest man: But when it came to the battel, he fled like a coward, and did no valliant acte any thing answerable to the orations whereby he had perswaded the people. For he left his ranck, & cowardly cast away his weapons to ronne the lighter, & was not ashamed at al, as Pythias said, of the words written vpon his shield in golden letters, which were, Good Fortune. Now Philip hauing wonne the battel, he was at that present so ioyfull, that he fell to commit many fond parts. For after he had droncke well with his friends, he went into the place where the ouerthrow was giuen, & there in mockery began to sing the beginning of the decree which Demosthenes had preferred, (by the which, the ATHENIANS accordingly proclaimed warres against him) rising and falling with his voyce, and dauncing it in C measure with his foote:

Demosthenes, the sonne of Demosthenes Peanian did put forth this.

Demosthenes flieth from the battell.

Demosthenes word and deuise vpon his shield.

But afterwards beginning to waxe sober, & leauing his dronckennes, & that he had remembred him selfe what daunger he had bene in: then his heare stood bolt vpright vpon his head, considering the force & power of such an Orator, that in a peece of a day had inforced him to hazard his Realme & life at a battell. Now Demosthenes fame was so great, that it was caried euen to the great king of PERSIANS court, who wrote vnto his Lieuetenants & gouernors, that they should feede Demosthenes with money, & should procure to entertaine him aboue all the men in GRÆCE, as he that could best withdraw Philip, & trouble him with the warres and tumults of GRÆCE. And this was afterwards proued by letters found of Demosthenes him selfe, D the which came to king Alexanders hands in the citie of SARDIS, and by other writings also of the gouernors & Lieuetenants of the king of PERSIA: in the which were named directly the expresse sommes of money which had bene sent & giuen vnto him. Now, the GRÆCIANS being thus ouerthrowen by battel, the other Orators, aduersaries vnto Demosthenes in the common wealth, began to set apon him, & to prepare to accuse him. But the people did not onely cleere him of all the accusations obiected against him, but did continue to honor him more then before, & to call him to assemblies, as one that loued the honor and benefit of his contry. So that when the bones of their contry men which were slayne at the battell of CHÆRONEA, were brought to be openly buried according to the custom: the people gaue him the honor to make the funeral oration in praise of the dead, & made no shew of sorow or griefe for the losse E they had receiued: (as Theopompus witnesseth, and doth nobly declare) but rather in contrary manner shewed that they did not repent them in following of his counsel, but did honor him that gaue it. Demosthenes then did make the funerall oration. But afterwards in all the decrees he preferred to the people, he would neuer subscribe any, to preuent the sinister lucke & misfortune of his name, but did passe it vnder his friends names one after another, vntill he grew coragious againe, shortly after that he vnderstoode of the death of Philip, who was slaine immediatly after the victorie he wanne at CHÆRONEA. And it seemeth this was the meaning of the prophecie or oracle in the two last verses:

Demosthenes corrupted with money of the king of Persia

Demosthenes praiseth them that were slaine at the battell of Chæronea.

The death of Philip king of Macedon.

The vanquished bewayles his luckelesse lot,
And he that vvinnes, vvith life escapeth not. F

Now Demosthenes hearing of Philips death, before the newes were openly known, to preuēt them, he would put the people again into a good hope of better lucke to come. Thereupon he went

A wēt with a cheerfull coũtenãce into the assembly of the coũsel, & told them there, that he had had a certain dreame that promised great good hap, & that out of hād vnto the Athenians: & immediatly after, the messengers arriued that brought certain newes of king Philips death. Thereupon the Athenians made sacrifices of ioy to the goddes for this happie newes, and appointed a crowne vnto Pausanias that had slaine him. Demosthenes also came abroade in his best gowne, and crowned with flowers, seuen dayes after the death of his daughter, as AEschines reporteth: who reproueth him for it, and noteth him to be a man hauing litle loue or charitie vnto his owne children. But in deede AEschines selfe deserueth more blame, to haue such a tender womanish hart, as to beleue, that weeping, and lamenting, are signes of a gentle and charitable nature, condemning them that with pacience and constancie doe passe away B such misfortunes. But now to the Athenians againe. I can neither thinke nor say that they did wisely to shew such open signes of ioy, as to weare crownes & garlands vpon their heads, nor also to sacrifice to the goddes for the death of a Prince, that behaued him selfe so Princely and curteously vnto them in the victories he had won of them. For, though in dede all cruelty be subiect to the reuenge of the goddes, yet is this an act of a vile and base minde, to honor a man, and while he liued to make him free of their citie, & now that an other hath slaine him, they to be in such an exceeding iolitie withall, and to exceede the bondes of modestie so farre, as to rampe in maner with both their feete vpon the dead, and to sing songes of victorie, as if they them selues had bene the men that had valliantly slaine him. In contrarie manner also, I praise and commend the constancie and corage of Demosthenes, that he leauing the teares and C lamẽtacion of his home trouble vnto women, did him selfe in the meane time that he thought was for the benefite of the common wealth: and in my opinion, I thinke he did therein like a man of corage, and worthy to be a gouernor of a common wealth, neuer to stowpe nor yeeld, but alwayes to be found stable and constant, for the benefit of the common wealth, reiecting all his troubles, cares, and affections, in respect of the seruice of his contrie, and to keepe his honor much more carefully, then common players vse to doe, when they play the partes of Kings and Princes, whom we see neither weepe nor laugh when they list, though they be on the stage: but when the matter of the play falleth out to geue them iust occasion. But omitting those reasons, if there be no reason (as in deede there is not) to leaue and forsake a man in his sorow and trouble, without geuing him some wordes of comfort, and rather to deuise some D matter to asswage his sorow, and to withdraw his minde from that, to thinke vpon some pleasaunter thinges: euen as they should keepe sore eyes from seeing bright and glaring colours, in offering them greene & darker. And from whence can a man take greater comfort for his troubles & grieues at home, when the common wealth doth well: then to ioyne their priuate grieues with common ioyes, to the end, that the better may obscure & take away the worse? But thus farre I disgressed from my historie, enlarging this matter, bicause AEschines in his Oration touching this matter, did moue the peoples hartes too muche to womanish sorow. But now to the rest. The cities of Græce being againe stirred vp by Demosthenes, made a new league againe together: and the Thebans also hauing armed them selues by his practise, did one day set vpon the garrison of the Macedonians within their city, and slue many of them.
E The Athenians prepared also to maintaine warre on the Thebans behalfe and Demosthenes was dayly at all the assemblies of counsell, in the pulpit, perswading the people with his Orations: and he wrote also into Asia vnto the king of Persians Lieutenaunts and Captaines, to make warre with Alexander on their side, calling him child, and Margites, as muche to say, as foole. But after that Alexander hauing set all his things at stay within his realme, came him selfe in person with his armie, and inuaded the contrie of Boeotia: then fell the pride of the Athenians greatly, & Demosthenes also plied the pulpit no more as he was wont. At length, the poore Thebans being left vnto them selues, forsaken of euerie man: they were compelled them selues alone to beare the brunte of this warre, & so came their city to vtter ruine and destruction. Thereby the Athenians being in a maruelous feare and perplexitie, did sodain-

Alexander required certaine Orators of Athens.

NIANS, to ſend vnto him ten of their Orators, as Idomeneus and Duris both doe write: or eight, A as the moſt writers and beſt hiſtoriographers doe reporte, which were theſe: Demoſthenes, Polyeuctus, Ephialtes, Lycurgus, Myrocles, Damon, Calliſthenes, and Charidemus. At which time, they wryte that Demoſthenes told the people of ATHENS, the fable of the ſheepe and woulues, how that the woulues came on a time, and willed the ſheepe, if they woulde haue peace with them, to deliuer them their maſtiues that kept them. And ſo he compared him ſelfe, and his companions that trauelled for the benefit of the contrie, vnto the dogges that kepe the flocks of ſheepe, and calling Alexander the woulfe. And ſo forth, ſayd he, like as you ſee theſe corne maiſters bringing a ſample of their corne in a diſh or napkin to ſhew you, and by that litle doe ſell all that they haue: ſo I thinke you will all wonder, that deliuering of vs, you will alſo deliuer your ſelues into the handes of your enemies. Ariſtobulus of CASSANDRA reporteth this B matter thus. Now the ATHENIANS being in conſultacion, not knowing how to reſolue: Demades hauing taken fiue talents of them whom Alexander demaunded, did offer him ſelfe, and promiſed to goe in this Ambaſſade vnto Alexander, and to intreate for them, either bicauſe he truſted in the loue the king did beare him, or elſe for that he thought he hoped he ſhoulde finde him pacified, as a Lyon glutted with the blood of beaſtes which he had ſlaine. Howſoeuer it happened, he perſwaded the people to ſend him vnto him, and ſo handled Alexander, that he got their pardon, and did reconcile him with the citie of ATHENS. Thereuppon Alexander being retyred, Demades and his fellowes bare all the ſway and authoritie, and Demoſthenes was vnder foote. In deede when Agis king of LACEDÆMON, came with his armie into the field, he began a litle to rowſe him ſelfe, and to lift vp his head: but he ſhrunke choller againe C ſoone after, bicauſe the ATHENIANS woulde not riſe with the LACEDÆMONIANS, who were ouerthrowen, and Agis ſlaine in battell. At that time was the cauſe of the crowne pleaded againſt Cteſiphon, and the plea was written a litle before the battell of CHÆRONEA, in the yeare when Charondas was Prouoſt of ATHENS: howbeit no ſentence was giuen but ten yeres after that Ariſtophon was Prouoſt. This was ſuch an open iudgement, and ſo famous, as neuer was any, as well for the great fame of the Orators that pleaded in emulacion one of the other, as alſo for the worthines of the Iudges that gaue ſentence thereof: who did not leaue Demoſthenes to his enemies, although in deede they were of greater power then he, and were alſo ſupported with the fauor and good will of the MACEDONIANS: but they did notwithſtanding ſo well quit him, that AEſchines had not ſo muche as the fift parte of mens voyces and opinions D in his behalfe. Wherefore immediatly after ſentence geuen, he went out of ATHENS for ſhame, and trauelled into the contrie of IONIA, and vnto the RHODES, where he did teache Rethoricke. Shortly after, Harpalus flying out of Alexanders ſeruice, came vnto ATHENS, being to be charged with many fowle matters he had committed by his exceeding prodigalitie: and alſo bicauſe he feared Alexanders furie, who was growen ſeuere and cruell, vnto his chiefeſt ſeruauntes. He comming now amongeſt the ATHENIANS, with ſtore of gold and ſiluer, the Orators being greedie and deſirous of the golde and ſiluer he had brought: beganne ſtraight to ſpeake for him, and did counſell the people to receiue & protect a poore ſuter that came to them for ſuccour. But Demoſthenes gaue counſell to the contrarie, and bad them rather driue him out of the citie, and take heede they brought not warres apon their backes, for E a matter that not onely was not neceſſarie, but furthermore meerely vniuſt. But within fewe daies after, inuentory being taken of all Harpalus goods, he perceiuing that Demoſthenes tooke great pleaſure to ſee a cuppe of the kings, and conſidered verie curiouſly the facion & workemanſhippe vpon it: he gaue it him in his hand, to iudge what it weyed. Demoſthenes peaſing it, wondered at the great weight of it, it was ſo heauie: ſo he asked how many pownd weight it weyed. Harpalus ſmiling, anſwered him: it will wey thee twentie talents. So when night was come, he ſent him the cuppe, with the twentie talentes. This Harpalus was a verie wiſe man, and found ſtraight by Demoſthenes countenaunce that he loued money, and coulde preſently iudge his nature, by ſeeing his pleaſaunt countenaunce, and his eyes ſtill vpon the cuppe. So Demoſthenes bribed by Harpalus with twenty talets.

Demoſthenes refuſed not his gift, and being ouercomen withall, as if he had receiued a garriſon into his houſe, he tooke Harpalus parte. The next morning, he went into the aſſemblie F

A his name to steppe vp into the pulpit, to speake to the people as he had done before: he made a signe with his head, that he had an impediment in his voyce, & that he could not speake. But wise men laughing at his fine excuse, tolde him it was no sinanche that had stopped his wesill that night, as he would make them beleue: but it was Harpalus argentsynanche which he had receiued, that made him in that case. Afterwardes when the people vnderstoode that he was corrupted; Demosthenes going about to excuse him selfe, they would not abide to heare him: but made a noyse and exclamacion against him. Thereuppon there rose vp a pleasaunt conceited man, that sayd: why my maisters, do ye refuse to heare a man that hath * such a golden tongue? The people thereuppon did immediatly banishe Harpalus, and fearing least king Alexander would require an accompt of the gold and siluer which the Orators had robbed and B pilfred away among them: they made very diligent searche and inquirie in euery mans house; excepting Callicles house, the sonne of Arrenidas, whose house they would haue searched by no meanes, bicause he was but newly maried, and had his newe spowse in his house, as Theopompus wryteth. Nowe Demosthenes desiring to shewe that he was in fault, preferred a decree, that the court of the Areopagites should heare the matter, and punish them that were found faultie, and therewithall straight offered him selfe to be tried. Howbeit he was one of the first whom the court condemned in the summe of fiftie talents, and for lacke of payment, they put him in prison: where he could not endure long, both for the shame of the matter for the which he was condemned, as also for his sickely body. So he brake prison, partely without the priuitie of his keepers, and partely also with their consent: for they were willing he should make a C scape. Some doe report that he fled not farre from the citie: where it was told him that certaine of his enemies followed him, whereuppon he would haue hidden him selfe from them. But they them selues first called him by his name, and comming to him, prayed him to take money of them, which they had brought him from their houses to helpe him in his banishment: and that therefore they ran after him. Then they did comfort him the best they could, & perswaded him to be of good cheere, & not to dispaire for the misfortune that was comen vnto him. This did pearce his hart the more for sorow, that he aunswered them: why, would you not haue me be sorie for my misfortune, that compelleth me to forsake the citie where in deede I haue so curteous enemies, that it is hard for me to finde any where so good frends? So D he tooke his banishment vnmanly, and remained the most parte of his banishment in the citie of Ægina, or at the citie of Troezen, where oftentimes he would cast his eyes towards the contrie of Attica, and weepe bitterly. And some haue written certeine words he spake, which shewed no minde of a man of corage, nor were aunswerable to the noble thinges he was wont to perswade in his Orations. For it is reported of him, that as he went out of Athens, he looked backe againe, and holding vp his handes to the castell, sayd in this sorte: O Ladie Minerua, Ladie patroneſſe of this city: why doest thou delight in three so mischieuous beastes: the owle, the draggon, and the people? Besides, he perswaded the young men that came to see him, and that were with him, neuer to meddle in matters of state, assuring them, that if they had offred him two wayes at the first, the one to goe into the assembly of the people, to make Orations in the pulpit, and the other to be put to death presently, and that he E had knowen as he did then, the troubles a man is compelled to suffer that medleth with the affaires of the state, the feare, the enuie, the accusacions, and troubles in the same: he would rather haue chosen the way to haue suffered death. So, Demosthenes continuing in his exile, king Alexander dyed, and all Græce was vp againe: insomuch as Leosthenes being a man of great valure, had shut vp Antipater in the citie of Lamia, and there kept him straightly besieged. Then Pytheas and Callimedon, surnamed Carabos, two Orators, and both of them banished from Athens, they tooke parte with Antipater, and went from towne to towne with his Ambassadors and frendes, perswading the Græcians not to sturre, neither to take parte with the Athenians. But Demosthenes in contrarie maner, ioyning with the Ambassadors sent from Athens into euerie quarter, to solicite the cities of Græce, to seeke to recouer F their libertie: he did aide them the best he coulde, to solicite the Græcians, to take armes with the Athenians, to driue the Macedonians out of Græce. And Phylarchus writeth, that Demosthenes encountered with Pytheas wordes in an open assemblie of the people in a certaine towne of ARCADIA. Pytheas hauing ſpoken before him, had ſaid: like as we preſume alwaies that there is ſome ſickeneſſe in the houſe whether we doe ſee aſſes milke brought: ſo muſt that towne of neceſſitie be ſicke, wherein the Ambaſſadors of ATHENS doe enter. Demoſthenes aunſwered him againe, turning his compariſon againſt him: that in deede they brought aſſes milke, where there was neede to recouer health: and euen ſo, the Ambaſſadors of ATHENS were ſent, to heale and cure them that were ſicke. The people at ATHENS vnderſtanding what Demoſthenes had done, they ſo reioyced at it, that preſently they gaue order in the fielde, that his baniſhment ſhould be reuoked. He that perſwaded the decree of his reuocation, was called Dæmon, PÆANIAN, that was his nephew: and thereupon the ATHENIANS ſent him a galley to bring him to ATHENS, from the city of ÆGINA. So Demoſthenes being arriued at the hauen of Piræa, there was neither Gouernor, Prieſt, nor almoſt any townes man left in the city, but went out to the hauen to welcome him home. So that Demetrius MAGNESIAN wryteth, that Demoſthenes then lifting vp his handes vnto heauen ſayed, that he thought him ſelfe happie for the honor of that iorney, that the returne from his baniſhment was farre more honorable, then Alcibiades returne in the like caſe had bene. For Alcibiades was called home by force: & he was ſent for with the good will of the citizens. This notwithſtanding, he remained ſtill condemned for his fine: for by the law, the people coulde not diſpence withall, nor remit it. Howbeit they deuiſed a way to deceiue the lawe: for they had a manner to geue certaine money vnto them that did prepare and ſette out the aulter of Iupiter ſauior, for the day of the ſolemnitie of the ſacrifice, the which they did yearely celebrate vnto him: ſo they gaue him the charge to make this preparacion for the ſumme of fifty talents being the ſumme of the fine aforeſayd wherin he was condemned. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the good happe of his reſtitucion to his contry and goodes. For the affaires of the GRÆCIANS were immediatly after brought to vtter ruine. For the battell of Cranon which they loſt, was in the moneth Munichyon (to wit, Iulie) and in the moneth Boedromion next enſuing, (to wit, Auguſt) the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS entred into the forte of Munichya. And in the moneth Pyanepſion (to wit, the October following) Demoſthenes died in this maner. When newes came to ATHENS, that Antipater and Craterus were comming thither with a great armie, Demoſthenes and his frends got out of the towne a litle before they entred, the people, by Demades perſwaſion, hauing condemned them to dye. So, euery man making ſhift for him ſelfe, Antipater ſent ſouldiers after them to take them: and of them Archias was Captaine, ſurnamed Phygadotheras, as muche to ſay, as a hunter of the baniſhed men. It is reported that this Archias was borne in the citie of THVRIES, and that he had bene ſometimes a common player of tragedies: and that Polus alſo who was borne in the citie of ÆGINES, (the excellenteſt craftes maiſter in that facultie of all men) was his ſcholler. Yet Hermippus doth recite him amongeſt the number of the ſchollers of Lacritus the Orator. And Demetrius alſo wryteth, that he had bene at Anaximenes ſchoole. Now, this Archias hauing founde the Orator Hyperides in the citie of ÆGINA, Ariſtonicus MARATHONIAN, and Himeræus the brother of Demetrius the PHALERIAN, which had taken ſanctuary in the temple of Aiax: he tooke them out of the temple by force, and ſent them vnto Antipater, who was at that time in the citie of CLEONES, where he did put them all to death: and ſome ſay, that he did cut of Hyperides tongue. Furthermore, hearing that Demoſthenes had taken ſanctuarie in the Ile of CALAVRIA, he tooke litle pinnaſies, and a certaine number of THRACIAN ſouldiers, & being comen thither, he ſought to perſwade Demoſthenes to be contented to goe with him vnto Antipater, promiſing him that he ſhould haue no hurt. Demoſthenes had a ſtraunge dreame the night before, and thought that he had played a tragedie contending with Archias, and that he handled him ſelfe ſo well, that all the lookers on at the Theater did commende him, and gaue him the honor to be the beſt player: howbeit that otherwiſe, he was not ſo well furniſhed, as Archias and his players, and that in all maner of furniture he did farre exceede him. The next morning when Archias came to ſpeake with him, who vſing gentle wordes vnto him, thinking thereby to winne him by fayer meanes to leaue the ſanctuarie: Demoſthenes looking him full in the face, ſitting ſtill where he was, without remouing, ſayd vnto him: O Archias, thou diddeſt neuer perſwade me when thou playedſt a play, neither ſhalt thou nowe perſwade me, though Demoſthenes dream.

A though thou promise me. Then Archias began to be angrie with him, and to threaten him. O, sayd Demosthenes, now thou speakest in good earnest, without dissimulacion, as the Oracle of MACEDON hath commaunded thee: for before, thou spakest in the clowdes, and farre from thy thought. But I pray thee stay a while, till I haue written somewhat to my frendes. After he had sayd so, he went into the temple as though he would haue dispatched some letters, and did put the ende of the quill in his mouth which he wrote withall, and bit it as his manet was when he did vse to write any thing, and held the ende of the quill in his mouth a pretie while together: then he cast his gowne ouer his head, and layed him downe. Archias souldiers seeing that, being at the dore of the temple, laughing him to scorne (thinking he had done so for that he was affrayed to dye) called him coward, and beast. Archias also comming to him, B prayed him to rise, and beganne to vse the former perswasions, to him, promising him that he would make Antipater his frende. Then Demosthenes feeling the poyson worke, cast open his gowne, and boldly looking Archias in the face, sayd vnto him: Nowe when thou wilt, play Creons parte, and throwe my bodie to the dogges, without further graue or buriall. For my parte, O god Neptune, I do goe out of thy temple being yet aliue, bicause I will not prophane it with my death: but Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS, haue not spared to defile thy sanctuarie with blood, and cruell murder. Hauing spoken these wordes, he prayed them to stay him vp by his armeholes, for his feete began alreadie to faile him, and thinking to goe forward, as he past by the author of Neptune, he fel downe, and geuing one gaspe, gaue vp the ghost. Now touching the poyson, Aristo reporteth, that he sucked and drewe it vp into his mouth out of C his quill, as we haue sayd before. But one Pappus, (from whom Hermippus hath taken his historie) wryteth, that when he was layed on the ground before the aulter, they founde the beginning of a letter which sayd: Demosthenes vnto Antipater, but no more. Nowe his death being thus sodaine, the THRACIAN souldiers that were at the temple dore, reported that they sawe him plucke the poyson which he put into his mouth, out of a litle cloth he had, thinking to them that it had bene a pece of gold he had swallowed downe. Howbeit a maide of the house that serued him, being examined by Archias about it: tolde him that he had caried it about him a long time, for a preseruatife for him. Eratosthenes writeth, that he kept this poyson in a litle boxe of gold made hollow within, the which he ware as a bracelet about his arme. There are many writers also that do reporte his death diuersly, but to recite them all it were in vaine: D sauing that there was one called Demochares (who was Demosthenes verie frende) sayd, that he dyed not so sodainly by poyson, but that it was the speciall fauor of the gods (to preserue him from the crueltie of the MACEDONIANS) that so sodainly tooke him out of his life, and made him feele so litle paine. Demosthenes dyed the sixteenth day of the moneth Pynepsion (to wit, October) on the which day they doe celebrate at ATHENS the feast of Ceres, called Thesmophoria, which is the dolefullest feast of all the yeare: on the which day also, the women remaine all day longe in the temple of the goddesse, without meate or drinke. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS to honor him according to his desertes, did cast his image in brasse, & made E a lawe besides, that the oldest man of his house shoulde for euer be kept within the pallace, at the charge of the common wealth: and ingraued these verses also apon the base of his image.

The time of Demosthenes death.

The Athenians honored Demosthenes after his death.

Hadst thou Demosthenes had strength according to thy hart, The Macedons should not haue vvrought the Greekes such vvoe and smart.

For they that thinke, that it was Demosthenes him selfe that made the verses in the Ile of CALAVRIA, before he tooke his poyson: they are greatly deceiued. But yet a litle before my first comming to ATHENS, there went a reporte that such a thing happened. A certaine souldier being sent for to come vnto his Captaine, did put such peeces of gold as he had into the handes of Demosthenes statue, which had both his hands ioyned together: and there grew hard by it a great plane tree, diuers leaues whereof either blowen of by winde by chaunce, or else put there of purpose by the souldier, couered so this golde, that it was there a long time, and F no man found it: vntill such time as the souldier came againe, and found it as he left it. Hereuppon this matter running abroade in euerie mans mouth, there were diuers wise men that tooke occasion of this subiect, to make epigrammes in the praise of Demosthenes, as one who in his life was neuer corrupted. Furthermore, Demades did not long enioy the honor he thought he had newly gotten. For the iuſtice of the goddes, reuenger of the death of Demoſthenes, brought him into MACEDON, to receiue iuſt puniſhment by death, of thoſe whom he diſhoneſtly flattered: being before growen hatefull to them, and afterwardes committed a fault whereby he coulde not eſcape. For there were letters of his taken, by the which he did perſwade, and pray * Perdiccas, to make him ſelfe king of MACEDON, & to deliuer GRÆCE from bondage, ſaying that it hong but by a threde, and yet it was halfe rotten, meaning thereby, Antipater. Dinarchus CORINTHIAN accuſed him, that he wrote theſe letters: the which ſo grieuouſly offended Caſſander, that firſt he ſlewe his owne ſonne in his armes, and then commaunded they ſhould afterwards kill Demades, making him feele then by thoſe miſeries (which are the cruelleſt that can happen vnto man) that traitors betraying their owne contrie do firſt of all betray them ſelues. Demoſthenes had often forewarned him of his end, but he would neuer beleue him. Thus, my frend Soſſius, you haue what we can deliuer you, by reading, or reporte, touching Demoſthenes life and doings.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Tullius Cicero.

AS touching Ciceroes mother, whoſe name was Heluia, it is reported ſhe was a gentlewoman borne, & liued alwayes verie honeſtly: but for his father, the reports of him are diuers and infinite. For ſome ſay that he was borne and brought vp in a fullers ſhoppe: others reporte that he came of Tullius Attius, who while he liued was honored among the VOLSCES as king, and made verie ſharpe and cruell warres with the ROMANES. But ſurely it ſeemes to me, that the firſt of that name called Cicero, was ſome famous man, and that for his ſake his offſpring continued ſtill that ſurname, and were glad to keepe it, though many men ſcorned it, becauſe Cicer in Engliſh ſignifieth a riche peaſe. That Cicero had a thing vpon the tippe of his noſe, as it had bene a litle wart, muche like to a riche peaſe, whereuppon they ſurnamed him Cicero. But this Cicero, whoſe life we write of nowe, nobly aunſwered certaine of

Cicero, why ſo called.

A of his frendes on a time geuing him counsell to chaunge his name, when he first made sute for office, and beganne to practise in matters of state: that he woulde endeuour him selfe to make the name of the Ciceroes more noble and famous, then the Scauri, or Catuli. After that, Cicero beinge made Treasorer in SICILE, he gaue an offering of certeine siluer plate vnto the goddes, and at large engraued on it his two first names, Marcus Tullius: and in place of his third name, he pleasauntly commaunded the workeman to cut out the forme and facion of a riche pease. Thus muche they wryte of his name. Nowe for his birth, it was sayed that his mother was brought a bedde of him without any paine, the third daye of Ianuarie: on which day the Magistrates and Gouernours of ROME doe vse at this present, yearely to make solemne prayers and sacrifices vnto the goddes, for the health and prosperi-B tie of the Emperour. Further, it is reported, that there appeared an image to his nurse, that did prognosticate vnto her she gaue a childe sucke, which in time to come shoulde doe great good vnto all the ROMANES. Nowe though such thinges may seeme but dreames and fables vnto many, yet Cicero him selfe shortly after proued this prophecie true: bicause that when he came of age to learne, he grewe so toward, and wanne suche fame among the boyes, for his excellent wit and quicke capacitie. For thereuppon came the other boyes fathers them selues to the schoole to see his face, and to be eye witnesses of the reporte that went of him, of his sharpe and quicke witte to learne. But others of the rude and baser sorte of men were offended with their sonnes, bicause to honor Cicero, they did alwayes put him in the middest betwene them, as they went in the streetes. Cicero in deede had suche a naturall witte and C vnderstanding, as Plato thought meete for learning, and apt for the studie of Philosophie. For he gaue him selfe to all kinde of knowledge, and there was no arte, nor any of the liberall sciences, that he disdained: notwithstanding in his first young yeares he was apter, and better disposed to the studie of Poetrie, then any other. There is a pretie poeme of his in verses of eight staues, called Pontius Glaucus, extant at this day, the which he made when he was but a boye. After that, being geuen more earnestlie vnto this studie, he was not onely thought the best Orator, but the best Poet also of all the ROMANES in his time: and yet doth the excellencie of his eloquence, and commendacion of his tongue continewe, euen to this daye, notwithstanding the great alteracion and chaunge of the Latine tongue. But his Poetrie hath lost the name and estimacion of it, bicause there were many after him that be-D came farre more excellent therein then he. After he had left his childishe studies, he beeame then Phileos scholler, the Academicke Philosophet, the onely scholler of all Clitomachus schollers, whome the ROMANES esteemed so muche for his eloquence, and loued more for his gentle behauiour and conuersation. He gaue him selfe also to be a follower of Mutius Scæuola, who at that time was a greate man in ROME, and Prince of the Senate, and who did also instruct Cicero in the lawes of ROME. He did also followe Sylla for a time, in the warres of the MARSIANS. But when he sawe that the common wealth of ROME fell to ciuill warres, and from ciuill warres to a monarchie: then he returned againe to his booke and contemplatiue life, and frequented the learned men of GREECE, and alwayes studied with them, vntill Sylla had gotten the vpper hande, and that he saw all the common wealth againe E at some stay. About that time, Sylla causing the goods of one that was sayd to be slaine, to be solde by the crier: (beinge one of the outlawes and proscriptes, to witte, banished by billes sette vp on postes) Chrysogonus, one of Syllaes freed bondemen, and in great fauour with his maister, bought them for the summe of two thowsande Drachmes. Therewithall the sonne and heire of the deade person called Roscius, being maruelously offended, he shewed that it was too shamefull an abuse: for his fathers goodes amounted to the summe of two hundred and fiftie talentes. Sylla finding him selfe thus openlie touched with pubblike fraude and deceite, for the onely gratifyinge of his man: he procured Chrysogonus to accuse him, that he had killed his owne father. Neuer an Orator durst speake in Roscius behalfe to defende F his cause, but shronke colour, feating Syllaes cruelties and seueritie. Wherefore poore Roscius the younge man, seeinge euerie man forsake him, had no other refuge but to goe to Cicero, whome his frendes did counsell and perswade boldly to take vpon him the defence of Roscius cause: for he shoulde neuer haue a happier occasion, nor so noble a beginning to bring him selfe into estimacion, as this. Thereuppon Cicero determined to take his cause in hande, and did handell it so well, that he obteyned the thing he sued for: whereby he wanne him greate fame and credit. But yet being affrayed of Syllaes displeasure, he absented him selfe from Rome, and went into Græce, geuinge it out that his trauell was for a disease he had vppon him. In deede Cicero was dogge leane, a litle eater, and woulde also eate late, bicause of the greate weakenesse of his stomacke: but yet he had a good lowde voyce, though it was somewhat harshe, and lacked grace and comelynesse. Furthermore he was so earnest and vehement in his Oration that he mounted still with his voyce into the highest tunes: insomuche that men were affrayed it woulde one daye put him in hazard of his life. When he came to Athens, he went to heare Antiochus of the citie of Ascalona, and fell in greate likinge with his sweete tongue, and excellent grace, though otherwise he misliked his newe opinions in Philosophie. For Antiochus had then forsaken the opinions of the newe Academicke Philosophers, and the sect of the Carneades: being moued thereunto, either through the manifest proofe of thinges, or by his certaine iudgement, or (as some say) for that of an ambition or dissention against the schollers and followers of Clitomachus and Philo, he had reproued the resolucions of the Academickes, which he had of long time defended, onely to leane for the moste parte to the Stoickes opinions. Howebeit Cicero had most affection vnto the Academickes, and did studie that sect more then all the rest, of purpose, that if he sawe he were forbidden to practise in the common wealth at Rome, he woulde then goe to Athens (leauing all pleaes and Orators in the common wealth) to bestowe the rest of his time quietly in the studie of Philosophie. At length, when he hearde newes of Syllaes death, and sawe that his bodie was growen to good state and health by exercise, and that his voyce became dayly more and more to fill mens eares with a sweete and pleasaunt founde, and yet was lowde enough for the constitucion of his bodie: receiuing letters dayly from his frendes at Rome, that prayed him to returne home, and moreouer, Antiochus selfe also earnestlie perswadinge him to practise in the common wealth: he beganne againe to fall to the studie of Rethoricke, and to frame him selfe to be eloquent, being a necessarie thing for an Orator, and did continuallie exercise him selfe in making Orations vppon any speache or propoficion, and so frequented the chiefe Orators and maisters of eloquence that were at that time. To this ende therefore he went into Asia vnto Rhodes, and amongest the Orators of Asia, he frequented Xenocles Adramettin, and Dionysius Magnesian, and studied also with Menippus Carian: at Rhodes he hearde Apollonius Molon, and the Philosopher Posidonius. And it is reported also, that Apollonius wanting the Latine tongue, he did pray Cicero for exercise sake, to declame in Græke. Cicero was verie well contented with it, thinkinge that thereby his faultes shoulde be the better corrected. When he had ended his declamacion, all those that were present were amazed to heare him, and euerie man praised him one after an other. Howebeit Apollonius all the while Cicero spake, did neuer shewe any glad countenaunce: and when he had ended, he stayed a greate while and sayed neuer a worde. Cicero misliking withall, Apollonius at length sayed vnto him. As for me Cicero, I doe not onely praise thee, but more then that, I wonder at thee: and yet I am sorie for poore Græce, to see that learning and eloquence (which were the two onely giftes and honor left vs) are by thee obtained with vs, and caried vnto the Romanes. Nowe Cicero being verie well disposed, to goe with good hope to practise at Rome, he was a litle discouraged by an Oracle that was tolde him. For, inquiring of the god Apollo Delphian, howe he might doe to winne fame and estimacion: the Nunne Pythias aunswered him he shoulde obtayne it, so that in his doinges he woulde rather followe the disposicion of his owne nature, then the opinion of the common people. Wherefore when he came to Rome, at the first he proceeded verie warely, and discreetely, and did vnwillinglie seeke for any office, and when he did, he was not greatlie esteemed: for they commonlie called him the Græcian, and scholler, which are two wordes, the which the artificers, (and suche base mechanicall people at Rome,) haue euer readie at their tongues ende. Nowe he beinge by nature ambicious of honour, and prickt forward also by the perswasion of his father and frendes: in the ende he beganne to pleade, and there-

A obteyned not the chiefeſt place by litle and litle, but ſo ſoone as he fell to practiſe, he was immediatly eſteemed aboue all the other Orators and pleaders in his time, and did excell them all. Yet it is reported notwithſtanding, that for his geſture and pronunciacion, hauing the ſelfe ſame defectes of nature at the beginning, which Demoſthenes had: to reforme them, he carefully ſtudied to counterfeate Roſcius, an excellent commediant, and AEſope alſo a player of tragedies. Of this AEſope men wryte, that he playing one day Atrius parte vpon a ſtage (who determined with him ſelfe how he might be reuenged of his brother Thyeſtes) a ſeruaunt by chaunce hauing occaſion to runne ſodainly by him, he forgetting him ſelfe, ſtriuing to ſhewe the vehement paſſion and furie of this king, gaue him ſuche a blowe on his head with the ſcepter in his hand, that he ſlue him dead in the place. B were of ſo great force to perſwade, by meanes of his grace and pronunciacion. For he mocking the Orators that thruſt out their heades, and cried in their Orations, was wont to ſay that they were like to lame men, who were driuen to ryde, bicauſe they coulde not goe a foote: euen ſo (ſayed he) they crie out, bicauſe they can not ſpeake. Truely pleaſaunt tawntes doe grace an Orator, and ſheweth a fine witte: but yet Cicero vſed them ſo commonly, that they were offenſiue vnto many, and brought him to be counted a malicious ſcoffer and ſpightfull man. He was choſen Treaſorer in the time of dearth, when there was great ſcarcetie of corne at Rome: and the prouince of Sicile fell to his lotte. At his firſt comming thither, the Sicilians miſliked him verie muche, bicauſe he compelled them to ſende corne vnto Rome: but after they had founde his diligence, iuſtice, and lenitie, they honored him aboue any Go-

C uernor that euer was ſent from Rome. Nowe there were diuers young gentlemen of Rome of noble houſes, who being accuſed for ſundrie faultes committed in warres againſt their honor, and martiall diſcipline, had bene ſent backe againe vnto the Prætor of Sicile: for whome Cicero pleaded, and did ſo excellently defende their cauſe, that they were pardoned euerie man. Thereuppon, thinking well of him ſelfe, when his time expired, he went to Rome, and by the way there happened a prety ieaſt vnto him. As he paſſed through the contrie of Campania, (otherwiſe called the lande of labor) he met by chaunce with one of the chiefeſt Romanes of all his frends. So falling in talke with him, he asked him what they ſayd of him at Rome, and what they thought of his doinges: imagining that all Rome had bene full of the glorie of his name and deedes. His frende asked him againe: and where haſt thou

D bene Cicero all this while, that we haue not ſeene thee at Rome? This killed his hart ſtraight, when he ſawe that the reporte of his name and doinges, entring into the citie of Rome as into an infinite ſea, was ſo ſodainely vanquiſhed away againe, without any other fame or ſpeach. But after that, when he looked into him ſelfe, and ſawe that in reaſon he tooke an infinite labor in hande to attaine to glorie, wherein he ſawe no certaine ende whereby to attaine vnto it: it cut of a great parte of the ambicion he had in his head. And yet the great pleaſure he tooke to heare his owne praiſe, and to be ouermuche geuen to deſire of honor and eſtimacion: thoſe two thinges continued with him euen to his dying day, and did eſtſoones make him ſwarue from iuſtice. Furthermore, when he beganne thorowely to practiſe in the affaires of the ſtate, he thought it an ill thing that artificers and craftes men ſhoulde haue ma-

Therefore he gaue him ſelfe to knowe, not onely mens names of qualitie, but the ſtreetes alſo they dwelt in, what parte of the citie ſoeuer it was: their goodly houſes in the contrie, the frendes they made of, and the neighbours whome they companied with. So that when he went abroade into Italie, whereſoeuer he became, Cicero coulde ſhewe and name his frendes houſes. He was not verie riche, and yet he had enough to ſerue his turne: the which made men muſe the more at him, and they loued him the better, bicauſe he tooke

F no fee nor gifte for his pleading, what cauſe ſoeuer he had in hande, but then ſpeciallie, when he defended a matter againſt Verres. This Verres had bene Prætor of Sicilia, and had committed many lewde partes there, for the which the Sicilians did accuſe him.

Ciceroes doings againſt Verres.

Cicero taking apon him to defende their cauſe, made Verres to be condemned, not by plea- A ding, but in manner without pleading, and in this ſorte. The Prætors being his Iudges, and fauoring Verres, had made ſo many reiornementes and delayes, that they had driuen it of to the laſte day of hearing. Cicero perceiuing then he ſhoulde not haue day light to ſpeake all that he had to ſay againſt him, and that thereby nothing ſhoulde be done and iudged: he roſe vp, and ſayed, that there needed no further plea in this matter, but onely brought foorth the witneſſes before the Iudges, and hauing cauſed their depoſicions to be taken, he prayed they woulde proceede to ſentence, according to their euidence geuen on that behalfe. Yet ſome doe reporte, that Cicero gaue many pleaſaunt tawntes and girdes, in pleading the accuſacion of the SICILIANS againſt Verres. The ROMANES doe call a bore, Ver-
res. There was one Cæcilius, the ſonne of a freed bondman, who was ſuſpected to holde with B the ſuperſticion of the IEWES. This Cæcilius woulde haue put by the SICILIANS from following the accuſacion of Verres, and woulde haue had the matter of his accuſacion only referred to him, for the proſecuting of it againſt him. Cicero skorning his ſute, ſayd vnto him: He ſpake it bicauſe the Iewes doe eate no ſwines fleſh. what hath a IEWE to doe with a ſwine? This Verres had a ſonne ſomewhat aboue twentie yeares of age, who (as the reporte went) had a verie ill name for his beawtie. And therefore when Verres one day thought to mocke Cicero, ſaying that he was too womanly: his children (ſayd he) are to be reproued of that ſecretly at home. In this accuſacion, Horten- ſius the Orator durſt not directly defende Verres: but touching the condemnacion of his fine, he was then contented to aunſwere for him, for he had a Sphinx of Yuory geuen him by Ver- res for his reward. Thereuppon Cicero gaue him a pretie nippe by the way: but Hortenſius C not vnderſtanding him, ſayd he coulde no skill of darke ſpeaches. Well, ſayd Cicero, yet haſt thou a ſphinx in thy houſe. In the ende Verres being condemned, and a fine ſette on his heade to the value of ſeuentie fiue Myriades, Cicero notwithſtandinge was ſuſpected to be bribed with money for agreeing to caſt him in ſo ſmall a ſumme. But yet when he came to Cicero choſen AEdilis. be Ædilis, the SICILIANS to ſhew them ſelues thankefull to him, both brought and ſent him many preſentes out of SICILE. Of all that he tooke nothing to his owne vſe, but onely beſtowed their liberalitie in bringing downe the priſes of vittells at ROME. He had a goodly houſe within the confines of the citie of ARPOS, a farme alſo by NAPLES, and an other a-Ciceroes riches. bout the citie of POMPEII: but all theſe were no great thinges. Afterwardes alſo he had the ioynter of his wife Terentia, which amounted to the ſumme of twelue Myriades, and be- D ſides all this, there came to him by inheritaunce, eleuen Myriades of their Denarij. Thereuppon he liued verie honeſtly and ſoberly, without exceſſe, with his familiar frendes that loued him, both GRÆCIANS and ROMANES, and woulde neuer goe to ſupper till after ſunne ſet, not ſo muche for any great buſineſſe he had, as for the weakeneſſe of his ſtomake. But o-therwiſe he was verie curious, and carefull of his perſon, and woulde be rubbed and noynt-ed, and he would vſe alſo to walke a certaine number of turnes by proporcion: and ſo exerci-ſing his bodie in that ſorte, he was neuer ſicke, and beſides was alwayes verie ſtrong and lu-ſtie of bodie, able to abide great paines and ſorowes which he fell into afterwardes. He gaue Ciceroes great curteſie and reſorte. his fathers chiefe manſion houſe to his brother, and went to dwell him ſelfe in the mount Palatine: bicauſe ſuche as came to waite vpon him to doe him honor, ſhoulde not take the E paines to goe ſo farre to ſee him. For, he had as many men dayly at his gate euerie morning, as either Craſſus had for his wealth, or Pompey for his eſtimacion among the ſouldiers both of them being at that time the chiefeſt men of ROME. Yea furthermore, Pompeys ſelfe came vnto Cicero, bicauſe his Orations ſtoode him to great purpoſe, for thincreaſe of his Cicero choſen Prætor. honor and authoritie. Nowe when Cicero came to make ſute to be Prætor (which is, to be as an ordinarie iudge) though he had many competitors, and fellowe ſuters with him, yet was he firſt choſen affore them all: and he did ſo honeſtly behaue him ſelfe in that office, that they did not ſo muche as once ſuſpect him of briberie or extorcion. And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that Licinius Macer (a man that of him ſelfe was of great power, and yet fauored and ſupported beſides by Craſſus) was accuſed before Cicero of theft and extor- F cion in his office: but he truſtinge muche to his ſuppoſed credit, and to the greate ſute and labour his frendes made for him, went home to his houſe before ſentence proceeded againſt

A againſt him (the Iudges being yet to geue their opinions) and there ſpeedely trimmed his beard, and put a newe gowne vppon his backe, as though he had bene ſure to haue bene quitte of his accuſacion, and then returned againe into the market place. But Craſſus went to meete him, and tolde him all the Iudges had condemned him. Licinius Macer tooke ſuche a griefe and conceite vpon it, that he went home to his houſe againe, layed him downe on his bedde, and neuer roſe after. This iudgement wanne Cicero greate fame, for they praiſed him exceedingly for the great paines he tooke, to ſee iuſtice duely executed. Another called alſo Vatinius, (a bedlem fellowe, and one that behaued him ſelfe verie vnreuerently to the Magiſtrates in his pleadinge, and beſides had a ſwollen necke) came verie arrogantly one day vnto Cicero being in his Prætoriall ſeate, and asked him a thing which Ci-

B cero woulde not graunte him there, but woulde thinke of it at better leaſure. Thereuppon Vatinius tolde him, that he would not be ſcrupulous to graunt that, if he were Prætor. Cicero turning to him, aunſwered him againe: no more haue I (ſayd he) ſuche a ſwollen necke as thou haſt. Towardes the ende of his office, two or three dayes before his time expired, there was one accuſed Manilius before him, that he alſo had robbed the common wealth. This Manilius was verie well beloued of the common people, who were perſwaded that he was put in ſute, not for any fault he had committed, but onely to deſpighe Pompey with, whoſe familiar frende he was. So he required certaine dayes to aunſwere the matter he was accuſed of: but Cicero woulde geue him no further reſpit, but to aunſwere it the next day. The people therewith were maruelouſly offended, bicauſe the other Prætors in ſuche like

C caſes were wont to geue tenne dayes reſpit to others. The next morninge when the Tribunes had brought him before the Iudges, and alſo accuſed him vnto them: he beſought Cicero to heare him pacientlie. Cicero made him aunſwere, that hauinge alwayes vſed as muche fauour and curteſie as he poſſiblie might by lawe, vnto thoſe that were accuſed, he thought he ſhoulde offer Manilius too greate wrong, if he ſhoulde not doe the like to him: wherefore, bicauſe he had but one day more to continewe Prætor in office, he had purpoſely geuen him that day to make his aunſwere before him. For he thought that to leaue his accuſacion to the hearing of an other Prætor, he coulde not haue bene thought a man that had borne him good will, and ment to pleaſure him. Theſe wordes did maruelouſlie chaunge the peoples opinion and affection towardes him, and euerie man ſpeaking well of

D him, they prayed him to defend Manilius cauſe. He willingly graunted them: and comming from the benche, ſtanding at the barre like an Orator to pleade for him, he made a notable Oration, and ſpake both boldly and ſharpely againſt the chiefe men of the citie, and thoſe ſpeciallie that did enuie Pompey. This notwithſtanding, when he came to ſue to be Conſul, he founde as great fauour amongeſt the Nobilitie, as he did with the communaltie. For they did further his ſute, for the common wealthes ſake, vpon this occaſion. The chaunge and alteracion of gouernment the which Sylla brought in, was thought ſtraunge at the firſt among the people: but nowe men by proceſſe of time being vſed to it, it was throughly eſtabliſhed, and no man miſliked it. At that time many men practiſed to ſubuert the gouern-

E ment, not for the benefit of the common wealth, but to ſerue their owne couetous mindes. For Pompey being then in the Eaſt partes, made warres with the kings of PONTVS and ARMENIA, and had not left ſufficient force at ROME to oppreſſe theſe ſeditious perſons, that ſought nothing but rebellion. Theſe men had made Lucius Catilina their Captaine: a deſperate man to attempt any great enterpriſe, ſuttle, and malicious of nature. He was accuſed before (beſides many other vile faultes) for deflowering of his owne daughter, and killinge his brother: and being affrayed to be put in ſute for it, he prayed Sylla to put his brother amongeſt the number of the outlawes (or proſcriptes) as if he had bene then aliue. Theſe wicked rebells hauinge choſen them ſuche a Captaine, were ſworne and bounde one to an other in this manner. They killed a man, and did eate of his fleſhe together, and had beſides corrupted the moſt parte of all the youth. For Catiline their Captaine ſuffered euerie man

F to take his pleaſure, as his youth was inclined vnto: as to banket, to followe harlottes, and gaue them money largelie to beſtowe in theſe vayne expences. Furthermore all THVSCAN beganne to riſe, and the moſt parte of GAVLE alſo, lying betwene the Alpes and ITALIE.

The conſpiracy of Catiline.

Catilines wickednes.

The citie of Rome it selfe was also in great daunger of rising, for the inequalitie of the goods of the inhabitauntes. For the noble men, and of greatest corage, had spent all their landes in playes and feasts, or in buildings and common workes, which they built at their owne charge, to currie fauour with the common people, that they might obtaine the chiefe offices: so that thereby they became verie poore, and their goodes were in the handes of meane men and wretches. Thus the state of Rome stoode in great hazard of vprore, the which any man might easely haue procured, that durst haue taken vppon him any change or alteracion of gouernment, there was then suche diuision among them in the state. Catiline notwithstanding, to prouide him of a strong bullwarke to prosecute his intent, came to sue to be Consul, hoping that he should be chosen with Caius Antonius, a man that of him selfe was apt neither to doe any great good, nor much hurt, and yet that could be a great strength and aide vnto him that woulde attempt any thing. Diuers noble and wise men foreseeing that, did procure Cicero to sue for the Consulshippe. The people accepted him, and reiected Catiline. Antonius and Cicero thereuppon were created Consuls, although that Cicero of all the surers for the Consulship was but only a Knightes sonne, and not the sonne of a Senator of Rome. Nowe, though the common people vnderstoode not the secret practise and meaning of Catiline: yet at the beginning of Ciceroes Consulshippe, there fell out great trouble and contencion in the common wealth. For they of the one side, whom Sylla had by his ordinaunces deposed from their dignities and offices in Rome (who were no small men, neither fewe in number) beganne to creepe into the peoples good will, alleaging many true and iust reasons against the tyrannicall power of Sylla: howebeit spoken in ill time, when it was out of time to make any chaunge or alteracion in the common wealth. The Tribunes on the other side preferred lawes and ordinaunces to further this deuise. They preferred the lawe to choose the Decemuiri, with soueraine power and authoritie through all Italie and Syria, and also through all the contries and prouinces which Pompey had newly conquered to the Empire of Rome: to sell, and release all the landes belonging to the state of Rome, to accuse any man whome they thought good, to banishe any man, to restore the Colonies with people, to take what money they woulde out of the treasurie, to leauie men of warre, and to keepe them in pay as long as they thought good. For this great and absolute power of the Decemuiri, there were many men of great accompt that fauored this law, but Antonius chiefly, being colleague and fellowe Consul with Cicero, for he had good hope to be chosen one of these ten Commissioners: and furthermore, it was thought that he was priuie vnto Catilines conspiracie, and that he misliked it not, bicause he was so muche in det. And this was it that the noble men most feared of all other thinges. Thereuppon Cicero, to prouide first to preuent this daunger, graunted him the prouince of the realme of Macedon: and the prouince of Gaule being offered vnto him selfe, he refused it. By this good turne, he wanne Antonius like a hiered player making him to promise him that he would assist & aide him for the benefit of the common wealth, and that he would say no more, then he shoulde will him. When he had brought him to this, and had wonne him to his minde: he then beganne to be the bolder, and more stowtly to resist them that were authors of this innouation and new lawes. Cicero therefore in open Senate, did one day sharply reproue, and inuey against this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes would haue established. But thereby he did so terrifie the authors thereof, that there was not one man durst speake against him. This notwithstanding, the Tribunes afterwardes attempted once againe to haue it to passe, & appointed the Consuls to appeare before the people. Howbeit Cicero being nothing abashed at it, he commaunded the Senate to follow him. So he did not only ouerthrow this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes did preferre: but furthermore they were vtterly discoraged and out of hope to bring any of their matters to passe they intended, he strooke them so dead with his eloquence. For Cicero onely of all men in Rome made the Romanes know, how muche eloquence doth grace and beawtifie that which is honest, and how inuincible right and iustice are, being eloquently set forth: and also how that a man that will be counted a wise Gouernor of a comman weale, should alwayes in his doinges rather preferre profit, than to seeke to currie fauor with the common people: yet so to vse his words, that the thing which is profitable, may not be also vnpleasant. And to proue his sweete and

A law preferred for the creacion and authority of the Decemuiri.

Cicero by his eloquence ouerthrew the law of the Decemuiri.

A & pleasant tongue, may be alleaged that which he did in the time of his Consulship, touching the placing of men at the Theater to see the pastimes. For before, the knights of Rome did sit mingled one with another amongst the common people, and tooke their place as they came. The first that made the difference betwene them, was * Marcus Otho, at that time Prætor: who made a law, by the which he appoynted seuerall seates for the knights, where they might from thenceforth see the pastimes. The people tooke this grieuously, as a thing done to discountenance them: insomuch that Otho comming afterwards into the Theater, all the common people fel a whistling at him, to shame him withal. The knights also in contrariwise made him roome amongst them, with great clapping of hands, in token of honor. Therewith the people fell a whistling lowder then before, and the knights in like manner to clapping of their handes, B and so grew to wordes one with another: that all the Theater was straight in vprore with it. Cicero vnderstanding it, went thither him selfe, & calling the people to the temple of the goddesse Bellona, he there so sharpely reproued them, and therewith so perswaded them, that returning presently to the Theater, they did then welcome and receiue Otho with clapping of their handes, and contended with the knights which of them should doe him greatest honor. But now againe, the rebells of Catilines conspiracie (who were pretily cooled at the first for the feare they stoode in) began to be lustie againe, and to gather together, boldely incoraging one another to broache their practise, before Pompey returned, who was sayd to be on the way towards Rome with his armye. But besides them, those souldiers that had serued before in the warres vnder Sylla, being dispersed vppe and downe Italy, (but specially the best souldiers a- C mong them dwelling in the good townes of Thvscan) did stirre vp Catiline to hasten the enterprise, perswading them selues that they should once againe haue goods enough at hand, to spoyle and ransacke at their pleasure. These souldiers hauing one Manlius to their Captaine, that had borne office in the field vnder Sylla, conspyred with Catilin, and came to Rome to assist him in his sute: who purposed once againe to demaund the Consulship, being determined at the election to kill Cicero, in the tumult and hurly burly. The goddes also did plainly shewe by earthquakes, lightning & thunder, and by vision of spirits that did appeare, the secret practise and conspiracie: besides also, there fell out manifest coniectures & proofes by men that came to reueale them, howbeit they had not power sufficient to encownter so noble a man, and of so great power as Catilin was. Cicero therefore deferring the day of election, called Catilin into D the Senate, and there did examine him of that which was reported of him. Catiline supposing there were many in the Senate that had good wills to rebell, and also bicause he would shewe him self ready vnto them that were of his conspiracie: he gaue Cicero a gentle aunswer, & said thus, What doe I offend, sayd he, if that beeing two bodies in this towne, the one leane and weake, and throughly rotten, and hath a head: and the other being great, strong, & of power, hauing no head, I doe giue it one? meaning vnder this darke aunswer, to signifie the people & Senate. This aunswer being made, Cicero was more affrayd then before, insomuch that he put on a brigantine for the safetie of his body, & was accõpanied with the chiefest men of Rome, and a great number of younge men besides, going with him from his house vnto the fielde of Mars, where the elections were made: & had of purpose left open his iacket lose at the chol- E ler, that his brigantyne he had on might be seene, thereby to let euery man that saw him, know the daunger he was in. Euery man misliked it when they saw it, and came about him to defend him, if any offered to assayle him. But it so came to passe, that by voyces of the people, Catilin was againe reiected from the Consulship, and Syllanus and Murena chosen Consuls. Shortly after this election, the souldiers of Thvscan being ioyned, which should haue come to Catilin, and the day appoynted being at hande to broache their enterprise: about midnight there came three of the chiefest men of Rome to Ciceroes house (Marcus Crassus, Marcus Marcellus, and Scipio Metellus) and knocking at his gate, called his porter, and bad him wake his maister presently, and tell him how they three were at the gate to speake with him, about a matter of importance. At night after supper, Crassus porter brought his maister a packet of letters, de- F liuered him by a straunger vnknowen, which were directed vnto diuers persons, amonge the which one of them had no name subscribed, but was onely directed vnto Crassus him self. The effect of his letter was, that there should be a great slaughter in Rome made by Catilin, and therefore he prayed him that he would depart out of Rome to saue him selfe. Crassus hauing A red his owne letter, would not open the rest, but went forthwith vnto Cicero, partly for feare of the daunger, and partly also to cleere him selfe of the suspition they had of him for the friendship that was betwixt him and Catiline. Cicero counselling with them what was to be done, the next morning assembled the Senate very earely, and carying the letters with him, he did deli-uer them according to their direction, and commaunded they should read them out alowde.

All these letters, & euery one of them particulerly, did bewray the conspiracie. Furthermore, Quintus Arrius, a man of authoritie, and that had bene Prætor, tolde openly the souldiers and men of warre that were leauied in Thvscan. And it was reported also, that Manlius was in the fielde with a great number of souldiers about the cities of Thvscan, gaping daily to heare newes of some chaunge at Rome. All these thinges being throughly considered, a decree pas- B sed by the Senate, that they should referre the care of the common wealth vnto the Consuls, to thend that with absolute authoritie they might (as well as they could) prouide for the safe-tie and preseruation thereof. Such manner of decree and authoritie, was not often seene concluded of in the Senate, but in time of present feare and daunger. Now Cicero hauing this absolute power, he referred all forreine matters to Quintus Metellus charge, and did him self take vppon him the care and gouernment of all ciuill affayres within Rome. On the day time when he went vp and downe the towne, he had such a trowpe of men after him, that when he came through the great market place, he almost filled it with his trayne that followed him. Thereuppon Catiline would no lenger delay time, but resolued to goe him selfe vnto Manlius where their armie lay. But before he departed, he had drawen into his confederacie one Martius, & C an other called Cethegus, whome he commaunded betimes in the morning to goe to Ciceroes house with short daggers to kil him, pretending to come to salute him, and to giue him a good morow. But there was a noble woman of Rome, called Fuluia, who went ouer night vnto Cice- Fuluia bewrayeth Catilines intent to kill Cicero. ro, and bad him beware of that Cethegus, who in deede came the next morning betimes vnto him: but being denied to be let in, he began to chafe and raile before the gate. This made him the more to be suspected. In thend Cicero comming out of his house, called the Senate to the temple of Iupiter Stator, (as much to say, a stayer) which standeth at the vpper end of the holy streete as they goe to the Mount Palatine. There was Catiline with others, as though he ment to cleere him selfe of the suspition that went of him: howbeit there was not a Senator that would sit downe by him, but they did all rise from the benche where Catiline had taken his D place. And further, when he began to speake, he could haue no audience for the great noyse they made against him. So at length Cicero rose, and commaunded him to auoid out of Rome: saying, that there must needes be a separacion of walles betweene them two, considering that Catiline departed Rome. the one vsed but words, and the other force of armes. Catiline thereuppon immediatly departing the citie with three hundred armed men, was no sooner out of the precinct of the walles, but he made his Sergeaunts cary axes and bundells of roddes before him, as if he had beene a Consul lawfully created, and did display his ensignes of warre, & so went in this order to seeke Manlius. When they were ioyned, he had not much lesse then twenty thowsand men together, with the which he went to practise the townes to rebell. Nowe open warre beeing thus proclaimed, Antonius, Ciceroes colleage and fellowe Consul, was sent against him to fight with E him. In the meane space, Cornelius Lentulus surnamed Sura (a man of a noble house, but of a wicked disposition, and that for his ill life was put of the Senate) assembled all the rest which were of Catilines conspiracie, and that remained behind him in Rome, and bad them be affraid of nothing. He was then Prætor the second time, as the manner is when any man comes to re-couer againe the dignitie of a Senator which he had lost. It is reported that this surname of C. Lentulus why called Sura. Sura was giuen him vpon this occasion. He being Treasorer in Syllaes Dictatorship, did fondly waste and consume a maruelous summe of money of the common treasure. Sylla being offended with him for it, and demaunding an accompt of him before the Senate: he careles ly and contemptuously stepped forth, saying he could make him no other accompt, but shewed him the calfe of his legge, as children doe, when they make a fault at tennys. And thereof it came F that euer after that they called him Sura, because Sura in Latin signifieth, the calfe of the legge.
Another time also being accused for a lewde part he had committed, he bribed some of the

Iudges

A Iudges with money, and being onely quit by two voyces more which he had in his fauor, he sayd he had loſt his money he had giuen to one of thoſe two Iudges, bicauſe it was enough for him to be cleered by one voice more. This man being of this diſpoſition, was firſt of all incenſed by Catiline, and laſtly marred by certaine wiſards & falſe prognoſticators that had mocked him with a vaine hope, ſinging verſes vnto him which they had fayned and deuiſed, and falſe prophecies alſo, which they bare him in hande they had taken out of Sybilles bookes of prophecie, which ſayd: that there ſhould raigne three Cornelij at Rome, of the which, two had already fulfilled the prophecie, Cinna and Sylla, and for the third, fortune layd it vpon him, and therefore bad him goe thorow withall, and not to dreame it out loſing oportunitie as Catiline had done. Now this Lentulus vndertooke no ſmall enterpriſe, but had an intent with him to kil B all the whole Senate, and as many other Citizens as they could murther, and to ſet fire of Rome, ſparing none but Pompeys ſonnes, whome they would reſerue for pledges, to make their peace afterwards with Pompey. For the rumor was very great and certein alſo, that he returned from very great warres and conqueſts which he had made in the Eaſt contryes. So they layed a plat to put their treaſon in execution, in one of the nights of Saturnes feaſtes. Further, they had brought flaxe and brimſtone, and a great number of armors and weapons into Cethegus houſe. Beſides all this prouiſion, they had appoynted a hundred men in an hundred partes of the citie, to the ende that fire being rayſed in many places at one tyme, it ſhould the ſooner ronne through the whole citie. Other men alſo were appoynted to ſtoppe the pypes and water conduits which brought water to Rome, and to kill thoſe alſo that came for water to C quench the fire. In all this ſturre, by chaunce there were two Ambaſſadors of the Allobroges, whoſe contry at that tyme did much miſlike of the Romanes, and were vnwilling to be ſubiect vnto them. Lentulus thought theſe men very fit inſtruments to cauſe all Gavle to rebell. Thereuppon practiſing with them, he wanne them to be of their conſpiracie, and gaue them letters directed to the counſell of their contrie, and in them did promiſe them freedom.
He ſent other letters alſo vnto Catilin, and perſwaded him to proclaime libertie to all bond-men, and to come with all the ſpeede he could to Rome: and ſent with them one Titus of the citie of Crotona, to cary theſe letters. But all their counſells and purpoſes (like fooles that neuer met together but at feaſtes, drincking droncke with light women) were eaſily found out by Cicero: who had a carefull eye vpon them, and very wiſely and diſcreetely ſawe thorow D them. For he had appoynted men out of the citie to ſpie their doings, which followed them to ſee what they intended. Furthermore he ſpake ſecretly with ſome he truſted, (the which others alſo tooke to be of the conſpiracie) and knewe by them that Lentulus and Cethegus had practiſed with the Ambaſſadors of the Allobroges, and drawen them into their conſpira-cie. At length he watched them one night ſo narrowly, that he tooke the Ambaſſadors, and Titus Crotonian with the letters he caried, by helpe of the Ambaſſadors of the Allobroges, which had ſecretly informed him of all before. The next morning by breake of day, Cicero aſſembled the Senate in the temple of Concorde, and there openly red the letters, and heard the euidence of the witneſſes. Further, there was one Iunius Syllanus a Senator that gaue in euidence, that ſome heard Cethegus ſay they ſhould kill three Conſuls, and foure Prætors.
E Piſo a Senator alſo, and that had bene Conſul, tolde in manner the ſelfe ſame tale. And Caius Sulpitius a Prætor, that was ſent into Cethegus houſe, reported that he had found great ſtore of darts, armor, daggers and ſwordes new made. Laſtly, the Senate hauing promiſed Titus Cro-tonian he ſhould haue no hurt, ſo he would tell what he knew of this conſpiracie: Lentulus thereby was conuinced, and driuen to giue vppe his office of Prætor before the Senate, and chaunging his purple gowne, to take another meete for his miſerable ſtate. This being done, Lentulus and his conſorts were committed to warde, to the Prætors houſes. Now growing towards euening, the people waiting about the place where the Senate was aſſembled, Cicero at length came out, and told them what they had done within. Thereuppon he was conueyed by all the people vnto a friendes houſe of his hard by: for that his owne houſe was occupied by F the Ladies of the citie, who were buſy ſolemnly celebrating a ſecret ſacrifice in the honor of the goddeſſe, called of the Romanes the good goddeſſe, and of the Græcians Gynæcia, to wit feminine: vnto her this yearely ſacrifice is done at the Conſuls houſe, by the wife or mother of the Conſul then being, the Veſtal Nunnes being preſent at it. Now Cicero being comen into his neighbours houſe, beganne to bethinke him what courſe he were beſt to take in this matter. For, to puniſh the offenders with ſeueritie, according to their deſerts, he was afraid to doe it: both bicauſe he was of a curteous nature, as alſo for that he would not ſeeme to be glad to haue occaſion to ſhew his abſolute power and authoritie, to puniſh (as he might) with rigour, Citizens that were of the nobleſt houſes of the citie, & that had beſides many friends. And contrariwiſe alſo, being remiſſe in ſo waightie a matter as this, he was affraid of the daunger that might enſue of their raſhnes, miſtruſting that if he ſhould puniſh them with leſſe then death, they would not amend for it, imagining they were well rid of their trouble, but would rather become more bold and deſperate then euer they were: adding moreouer the ſtyng and ſpight of a newe malice vnto their accuſtomed wickednes, beſides that he him ſelfe ſhould be thought a coward and tymerous man, whereas they had already not much better opinion of him. Cicero being perplexed thus with theſe doubts, there appeared a miracle to the Ladies, doing ſacrifice at home in his houſe. For the fire that was thought to be cleane out vpon the aulter where they had ſacrificed, there ſodainely roſe out of the imbers of the ryend or barkes which they had burnt, a great bright flame, which amaſed all the other Ladies. Howbeit the Veſtall Nũnes willed Terentia (Ciceroes wife) to go ſtraight vnto her husband, & to bid him not to be affraid to execute that boldly which he had conſidered of, for the benefit of the cõmon wealth: and that the goddeſſe had raiſed this great flame, to ſhewe him that he ſhould haue great honor by doing of it. Terentia, that was no timerous nor faint harted woman, but very ambitious, and furthermore had gotten more knowledge from her husband of the affayres of the ſtate, then otherwiſe ſhe had acquainted him with her houſewiuery in the houſe, as Cicero him ſelfe reporteth: ſhe went to make report thereof vnto him, and prayed him to doe execution of thoſe men. The like did Quintus Cicero his brother, and alſo Publius Nigidius, his friend and fellow ſtudent with him in Philoſophie, and whoſe counſell alſo Cicero followed much in the gouernment of the common wealth. The next morning, the matter being propounded to the arbitrement of the Senate, how theſe malefactors ſhould be puniſhed: Syllanus being asked his opinion firſt, ſaid that they ſhould be put in priſon, and from thence to ſuffer execution. Others likewiſe that followed him, were all of that minde, but Caius Cæſar, that afterwards came to be Dictator, and was then but a young man, and began to come forward, but yet ſuch a one, as by his behauior and the hope he had, tooke ſuch a courſe, that afterwards he brought the common wealth of Rome into an abſolute Monarchie. For at that time, Cicero had vehement ſuſpicions of Cæſar, but no apparant proofe to conuince him. And ſome ſay, that it was brought ſo neare, as he was almoſt conuicted, but yet ſaued him ſelfe. Other write to the contrary, that Cicero wittingly diſſembled, that he either heard or knew any ſignes which were told him againſt Cæſar, being affraid in deede of his friends and eſtimation. For it was a cleere caſe, that if they had accuſed Cæſar with the reſt, he vndoubtedly had ſooner ſaued all their liues, then he ſhould haue loſt his owne. Nowe when Cæſar came to deliuer his opinion touching the puniſhment of theſe priſoners: he ſtoode vp and ſayde, that he did not thinke it good to put them to death, but to confiſcate their goods: and as for their perſons, that they ſhould beſtow them in priſon, ſome in one place, ſome in another, in ſuch cities of Italy, as pleaſed Cicero beſt, vntill the warre of Catilin were ended. This ſentence being very mild, and the author thereof maruelous eloquent to make it good: Cicero him ſelf added thereunto a counterpeaſe, inclining vnto either of both the opinions, partly allowing the firſt, and partly alſo the opinion of Cæſar. His friends thinking that Cæſars opinion was the ſafeſt for Cicero, bicauſe thereby he ſhould deſerue leſſe blame for that he had not put the priſoners to death: they followed rather the ſecond. Whereuppon Syllanus alſo recanted that he had ſpoken, and expounded his opinion: ſaying, that when he ſpake they ſhould be put to death, he ment nothing ſo, but thought the laſt puniſhment a Senator of Rome could haue, was the priſon. But the firſt that contraried this opinion, was Catulus Luctatius, and after him Cato, who with vehement wordes enforced Cæſars ſuſpition, and furthermore filled all the Senate with wrath and corage: ſo that euen vpon the inſtant it was decreed by moſt voyces, that they ſhould ſuffer death. But Cæſar ſtept vp again, & ſpake againſt the confiſcation of their goods, miſliking that they ſhould reiect

A reiect the gentlest part of his opinion, and that contrariwise they should sticke vnto the sauerest onely: howbeit bicause the greatest number prenailed against him, he called the Tribunes to ayde him, to the ende they should withstand it: but they would giue no eare vnto him. Cicero thereupon yelding of him self, did remit the confiscation of their goods, and went with the Senate to fetche the prisoners: who were not all in one house; but euery Prætor had one of them. So he went first to take C. Lentulus, who was in the Mount Palatine, and brought him through the holy streete and the market place, accompanied with the chiefest men of the citie, who compassed him round about, and garded his person. The people seeing that, quaked and trembled for feare, passed by, and sayd neuer a word: and specially the younge men, who thought it had bene some solemne misterie for the health of their contry, that was so accom-

B panied with the chiefe Magistrate, and the noble men of the citie, with terror and feare. So when he had passed through the market place, and was come to the prison, he deliuered Lentulus into the handes of the hangman, and commaunded him to doe execution. Afterwardes also Cethegus, and then all the rest one after another, whome he brought to the prison him selfe, and caused them to be executed. Furthermore, seeing diuers of their accomplices in a rowpe together in the market place, who knewe nothing what he had done, and watched onely till night were come, supposing then to take away their companions by force from the place where they were, thinking they were yet aliue: he turned vnto them, and spake alowd, they liued. This is a phrase of speeche which the ROMANES vse sometyme, when they will finely conuey the hardnes of the speeche, to say he is dead. When night was comen, and that

C he was going homeward, as he came through the market place, the people did wayte vpon him no more with silence as before, but with great eryes of his praise, and clapping of handes in euery place he went, and called him Sauior, and second fownder of ROME. Besides all this, at euery mans dore there were lynckes and torches lighted, that it was as light in the streetes, as at noone dayes. The very women also did put lights out of the toppes of their houses to doe him honor, and also to see him so nobly brought home, with such a long trayne of the chiefest men of the citie, (of the which many of them had ended great warres for the which they had triumphed, and had obteyned many famous conquests to the Empire of ROME, both by sea and land) confessing betwene them selues one to another, that the ROMANES were greatly bound to many Captaines and generalls of armies in their time, for the wonderfull riches,

D spoyles, and increase of their power which they had wonne: howbeit that they were to thanke Cicero onely, for their health and preseruation, hauing saued them from so great and extreme a daunger. Not for that they thought it so wonderfull an acte to haue striken dead the enterprise of the conspirators, and also to haue punished the offenders by death: but bicause the conspiracie of Catilin being so great and daungerous an insurrection as euer was any, he had quenched it, and pluckt it vp by the roores, with so small hurt, and without vprore, trouble, or actuall sedition. For, the most part of them that were gathered together about Catiline, when they heard that Lentulus and all the rest were put to death, they presently forsooke him: and Catiline him selfe also fighting a battell with them he had about him, against Antonius the o-

E ther Consul with Cicero, he was slayne in the fielde, and all his armie defeated. This notwithstanding, there were many that spake ill of Cicero for this facte, and ment to make him repent it, hauing for their heades Cæsar, (who was already chosen Prætor for the yeare to come) Metellus and Bestia, who should also be chosen Tribunes. They, so soone as they were chosen Tribunes, would not once suffer Cicero to speake to the people, notwithstanding that he was yet in his office of Consul for certaine dayes. And furthermore, to let him that he should not speake vnto the people, they did set their benches vpon the pulpit for orations, which they call at ROME, Rostra: and would neuer suffer him to set foote in it, but onely to resigne his office, and that done, to come downe againe immediatly. He graunted thereunto, and went vp to the pulpit vpon that condition. So silence being made him, he made an othe, not like vnto other Consuls othes when they resigne their office in like manner, but straunge, and neuer mies were so offended with him, that they deuised to breede him some new sturre & trouble: & amongest others, they made a decree, that Pompey should be sent for with his army to bridle the tyranny of Cicero. Cato, (who at that time was also Tribune) did him great pleasure in the furtherance of the common wealth, opposing him selfe against all their practises, with the like authoritie and power that they had, being a Tribune and brother with them, and of better estimation then they. So that he did not onely easily breake all their deuises, but also in a goodly oration he made in a full assembly of the people, he so highly praised and extolled Ciceroes Consulship vnto them, and the thinges he did in his office: that they gaue him the greatest honors that euer were decreed or graunted vnto any man liuing. For by decree of the people he was called, father of the contry, as Cato him selfe had called him in his oration: the which name was neuer giuen to any man, but onely vnto him, & also he bare greater swaye in Rome at that time, then any man beside him. This notwithstanding, he made him selfe enuyed and misliked of many men, not for any ill acte he did, or ment to doe: but onely bicause he did too much boast of him selfe. For he neuer was in any assembly of people, Senate, or iudgement, but euery mans head was full still to heare the sound of Catulus and Lentulus brought in for sporte, and filling the bookes and workes he compiled besides full of his owne prayses: the which made his sweete and pleasant stile, tedious, and troublesom to those that heard them, as though this misfortune euer followed him to take away his excellent grace. But nowe, though he had this worme of ambition, and extreme couetous desire of honor in his head, yet did he not malice or enuy any others glory, but would very franckly praise excellent men, as well those that had bene before him, as those that were in his time. And this appeareth plainly in his writings. They haue written also certaine notable wordes he spake of some auncient men in olde time, as of Aristotle: that he was like a golden flowing riuer: and of Plato, that if Iupiter him selfe would speake, he would speake like him: and of Theophrastus, he was wont to call him his delight: & of Demosthenes orations, when one asked him on a time which of them he liked best: the longest saide he. There be diuers writers also, who to shewe that they were great followers of Demosthenes, doe followe Ciceroes saying in a certaine epistle he wrote vnto one of his friends, wherein he said that Demosthenes slept in some of his orations: but yet they forget to tel how highly he praised him in that place, and that he calleth the orations which he wrote against Antonius (in the which he tooke great paines, and studied more then all the rest) Philippians: to followe those which Demosthenes wrote against Philip king of Macedon. Furthermore, there was not a famous man in all his tyme, either in eloquence, or in learning, whose fame he hath not commended in writing, or otherwise in honorable speech of him. For he obteyned of Cæsar, when he had the Empire of Rome in his handes, that Cratippus the Peripateticke Philosopher was made Citizen of Rome. Further, he procured that by decree of the court of the Areopagites, he was intreated to remaine at Athens, to teach and instruct the youth there: for that he was a great honor & ornament vnto their city. There are extant also of Ciceroes epistles vnto Herodes, & others vnto his sonne, willing him to follow Cratippus in his studie and knowledge. He wrote an other letter also vnto Gorgias the Rethoritian, and forbad him his sonnes company: bicause he vnderstood he intised him to dronkennes, & to other great dishonestie. Of all his epistles he wrote in greeke, there is but that onely written in choller, and another which he wrote vnto Pelops Byzantine. And for that he wrote to Gorgias, he had great reason to be offended with him, and to tawnt him in his letter: bicause (as it seemed) he was a man of very lewde life and conuersation. But in contrary manner, writing as he did to Pelops, finding him selfe greued with him, for that he was negligent in procuring the Byzantines to ordeine some publike honors in his behalfe: that me thinkes proceeded of ouermuch ambition, the which in many things made him too much forget the part of an honest man, and onely bicause he would be commended for his eloquence. When he had on a time pleaded Munatius cause before the Iudges, who shortly after accused Sabinus a friend of his: it is reported that he was so angry with him, that he told him, what Munatius, hast thou forgotten that thou wert discharged the last day of thine accusation, not for thine innocency, but for a miste I cast before the Iudges eies, that made them they could not discerne the fault? Another tyme there was one Octauius, ſuppoſed to be * an AFRICAN borne. He when Cicero on a time pleaded a matter, ſaide that he heard him not: Cicero preſently aunſwered him againe, and yet haſt thou a hole bored through thine eare. Another time Metellus Nepos told him, that he had ouerthrowen moe men by his witnes, then he had ſaued by his eloquence. I graunt ſaid Cicero, for in deede I haue more faith, then eloquence in

D me. So was there alſo a younge man that was ſuſpected to haue poyſoned his father with a tarte, that boaſted he would reuile Cicero: I had rather haue that of thee, q. Cicero, then thy tarte. Publius Sextius alſo hauing a matter before the Iudges, enterteyned Cicero, with other of his Counſellers: but yet he would ſpeake all him ſelfe, and giue none of the Orators leaue to ſay any thing. In the ende, when they ſawe plainely that the Iudges would diſcharge him, being ready to giue ſentence: Cicero ſaide vnto him, beſturre thee hardily to day for to morrowe Sextius thou ſhalt be a priuate man. Another, one Publius Scotta, who would fayne haue bene thought a wiſe Lawyer, and yet had litle witte and vnderſtanding: Cicero appealed to him as a witnes in a matter, and being examined, he aunſwered he knewe nothing of

E it. Cicero replied to him againe: thou thinkeſt peraduenture they aske thee touching the law. Againe, Metellus Nepos, in a certaine diſputacion he had with Cicero, did many times repeate, who is thy father? Cicero aunſwered him againe: thy mother hath made this queſtion harder for thee to aunſwer. This Nepos mother was reported to be a light houſewife, and he as ſuttle witted and vnconſtant. For he being Tribune, left in a geere the exerciſe of his office, and went into SYRIA to Pompey, vpon no occaſion: and as fondly againe he returned thence, vpon a ſodaine. His Schoolemaiſter Philager alſo being dead, he buried him very honeſtly, and ſet a crowe of ſtone vpon the toppe of his tombe. Cicero finding it, tolde him thou haſt done very wiſely: for thy Maiſter hath taught thee rather to flie, then to ſpeake. Another time Appius Clodius pleading a matter, ſaide in his preamble that his friende had earneſtly requeſted him to employe all his knowledge, diligence, and faith vpon this matter. O

F goddes, ſaide Cicero, and haſt thou ſhewed thy ſelfe ſo harde hatted to thy friende, that thou haſt performed none of all theſe he requeſted thee? Nowe to vſe theſe fine tawnts and girds to his enemies, it was a parte of a good Orator: but ſo commonly to girde euery man to make the people laughe, that wanne him greate ill will of many, as ſhall appeare by ſome examples I will tell you. Marcus Aquinius had two ſonnes in lawe, who were both baniſhed: Cicero therefore called him Adraſtus. Lucius Cotta by chaunce alſo was Cenſor at that tyme, when Cicero ſued to be Conſul: and beeing there at the daye of the election, he was a thyrſt, and was driuen to drinke. But while he dranke, all his friendes ſtoode about him, and after he had dronke, he ſaide vnto them. It is well done of ye, ſayde he, to be affrayed leaſt the Cenſor ſhoulde be angry with me, bicauſe I drinke water: for it was reported the Cenſor loued wine well. Another tyme Cicero meeting one Voconius, with three fowle Daughters of his with him, he cryed out alowd:

It was thought in Rome that Marcus Gellius was not borne of free parents by father and mother, who reading certaine letters one daye in the Senate very lowde: Cicero ſayde vnto them that were about him, wonder not at it, q he, for this man hath beene a cryer in his dayes. Fauſtus, the ſonne of Sylla Dictator at Rome, which ſette vppe billes outlawing diuers Romanes, making it lawefull for any man to kill them without daunger where they founde them: this man after he had ſpent the moſte parte of his fathers goods, was ſo ſore in debt, that he was driuen to ſell his houſhold ſtuffe, by billes ſette vp on euery poſte. Cicero when he ſawe them, yea mary ſaide he, theſe billes pleaſe me better, then thoſe which his father ſette vppe. Theſe tawntes and common quippes without purpoſe, made diuers men to malice him. The great ill will that Clodius bare him, beganne vppon this occaſion. Clodius was of a noble houſe, a younge man, and very wilde and inſolent. He being in loue with Pompeia Cæſars wife, founde the meanes ſecretly to gette into Cæſars houſe, apparelled like a younge ſinging wenche, bicauſe on that daye the Ladyes of Rome did ſolemnly celebrate a ſecret ſacrifice in Cæſars houſe, which is not lawefull for men to be preſent at. So there was no man there but Clodius, who thought he ſhoulde not haue bene knowen, bicauſe he was but a younge man without any heare on his face, and that by this meanes he might come to Pompeia amongeſt the other women. He beeing gotten into this great houſe by night, not knowing the roomes and chambers in it: there was one of Cæſars mothers maydes of her chamber called Aurelia, who ſeeing him wandring vp and downe the houſe in this ſorte, asked him what he was, and how they called him. So being forced to aunſwer, he ſaide he ſought for Aura, one of Pompeias maides. The maide perceiued ſtraight it was no womans voice, and therewithal gaue a great ſhriche, and called the other women: the which did ſee the gates faſt ſhut, and then ſought euery corner vp and downe, ſo that at length they found him in the maides chamber, with whom he came in. His offence was ſtraight blowen abroad in the citie, whereuppon Cæſar put his wife away: and one of the Tribunes alſo accuſed Clodius, and burdened him that he had prophaned the holy ceremonies of the ſacrifices. Cicero at that time was yet his friend, beeing one that had very friendly done for him at all times, and had euer accompanied him to garde him, if any man would haue offered him iniurie in the buſie time of the conſpiracie of Catiline. Clodius ſtowtly denied the matter he was burdened with, and ſaide that he was not in Rome at that time, but farre from thence. Howbeit Cicero gaue euidence againſt him, and depoſed, that the ſelfe ſame daye he came home to his houſe vnto him, to ſpeake with him about certaine matters. This in deede was true, though it ſeemeth Cicero gaue not this euidence ſo muche for the truthes ſake, as to pleaſe his wife Terentia: for ſhe hated Clodius to the deathe, bicauſe of his ſiſter Clodia that would haue maried Cicero, and did ſecretly practiſe the mariage by one Tullius, who was Ciceroes very friende, and bicauſe he repayred very often to this Clodia that dwelt harde by Cicero, Terentia beganne to ſuſpect him. Terentia beeing a cruell woman, and wearing her husbandes breeches: allured Cicero to ſette vppon Clodius in his aduerſitie, and to witneſſe agaynſt him, as many other honeſt men of the citie alſo did: Some that he was periured, others that he committed a thowſande lewde partes, that he brybed the people with money, that he had intiſed and deflowred many women. Lucullus alſo brought forthe certayne Maydens which depoſed that Clodius had deflowred the youngeſt of his owne ſiſters, ſhe beeing in houſe with him, and maryed. And there went a greate rumor alſo, that he

A knewe his two other ſiſters, of the which the one was called * Terentia, and maried vnto king Martius: and the other Clodia, whome Metellus Celer had maried, and whom they commonly called Quadrantaria: bicauſe one of her Paramours ſent her a purſe ful of quadrynes (which are litle peeces of copper money) in ſtead of ſiluer. Clodius was ſlaundered more by her, then with any of the other two. Notwithſtanding, the people were very much offended with them, that gaue euidence againſt him, and accuſed him. The Iudges being affrayed of it, got a great number of armed men about them, at the day of his iudgemēt, for the ſafetie of their perſons: and in the tables where they wrote their ſentences, their letters for the moſt part were confuſedly ſet downe. This notwithſtanding, it was found that he was quit by the greateſt number: and it was reported alſo that ſome of them were cloſe fiſted. Catulus therefore meeting with Clodius quit and found not guilty.

B ſome of them going home, after they had giuen their ſentence, told them: ſurely ye had good reaſon to be well garded for your ſafetie, for you were affraid your money ſhould haue bene taken from you, which you tooke for bribes. And Cicero ſayd vnto Clodius, who reproued him that his witnes was not true he gaue againſt him: cleane contrary, quod Cicero, for fiue and twenty of the Iudges haue beleued me, beeing ſo many that haue condemned thee, and the thirty would not beleeue thee, for they would not quit thee before they had fingered money. Notwithſtanding, in this iudgement Cæſar neuer gaue euidence againſt Clodius: & ſaid moreouer, that he did not think his wife had committed any adultery, howbeit that he had put her away, bicauſe he would that Cæſars wife ſhould not only be clean from any diſhoneſty, but alſo void of all ſuſpition. Clodius being quit of this accuſation and trouble, & hauing alſo found meanes

C to be choſen Tribune: he beganne ſtraight to perſecute Cicero, chaunging all thinges, and ſtirring vp all manner of people againſt him. Firſt he wanne the good will of the common people by deuiſing of newe lawes which he preferred, for their benefit and commoditie: to both the Conſuls he graunted great and large prouinces: vnto Piſo, MACEDON, and to Gabinius, SYRIA. He made alſo many poore men free Citizens, and had alwayes about him a great number of ſlaues armed. At that preſent tyme there were three notable men in ROME, which caried all the ſwaye: Craſſus, that ſhewed him ſelfe an open enemie vnto Cicero: Pompey the other, made muche both of the one and the other: the third was Cæſar, who was prepared for his iorney into GAVLE with an armie. Cicero did leane vnto him, (though he knewe him no faſt friende of his, and that he miſtruſted him for matters paſt in Catilines conſpira-

Thereuppon Clodius perceiuing that by this meanes he got him out of the daunger of his office of Tribuneſhip for that yeare, he made fayer weather with him (as though he ment to reconcile him ſelfe vnto him) and tolde him that he had cauſe rather to thinke ill of Terentia, for that he had done againſt him, then of him ſelfe, and alwayes ſpake very curteouſly of him as occaſion fell out, and ſayde he did thinke nothing in him, nether had any malice to him, howbeit it did a litle grieue him, that being a friend, he was offered vnkindnes by his friend. Theſe ſweete wordes made Cicero no more affraied, ſo that he gaue vp his Lieuetenancie vnto Cæſar, and beganne againe to pleade as he did before. Cæſar tooke this in ſuch diſdaine, that he hardened Clodius the more againſt him, and beſides, made Pompey

E his enemie. And Cæſar him ſelfe alſo ſayd before all the people, that he thought Cicero had put Lentulus, Cethegus, and the reſt, vniuſtly to death, and contrary to lawe, without lawfull tryall and condemnation. And this was the fault for the which Cicero was openly accuſed. Thereuppon Cicero ſeeing him ſelfe accuſed for this facte, he chaunged his vſuall gowne he wore, and put on a mourning gowne: and ſo ſuffering his beard and heare of his head to growe without any coeming, he went in this humble manner, and ſued to the people. But Clodius was euer about him in euery place and ſtreete he went, hauing a ſight of raskalls and knaues with him that ſhamefully mocked him for that he had chaunged his gowne and countenance in that ſort, and oftentimes they caſt durt and ſtones at him, breaking his talke and requeſts he made vnto the people. This notwithſtanding, all the knights of ROME did in manner

F chaunge their gownes with him for companie, and of them there were commonly twenty thowſand younge gentlemen of noble houſe which followed him with their heare about their eares, & were ſuters to the people for him. Furthermore, the Senate aſſembled to decree that the people ſhould mourne in blacks, as in a common calamitie: But the Conſuls were A gainſt it. And Clodius on thother ſide was with a band of armed men about the Senate, ſo that many of the Senators ranne out of the Senat, crying, & tearing their clothes for ſorow. Howbeit theſe men ſeeing all that, were nothing the more moued with pity and ſhame: but either Cicero muſt needes abſent him ſelfe, or els determine to fight with Clodius. Then went Cicero to intreat Pompey to ayde him: But he abſented him ſelfe of purpoſe out of the citie, becauſe he would not be intreated, and laye at one of his houſes in the contry, neare vnto the citie of Alba. So he firſt of all ſent Piſo his ſonne in lawe vnto him to intreate him, and afterwardes Pompey would not ſee Cicero being accuſed. went him ſelfe in perſon to him. But Pompey beeing tolde that he was come, had not the harte to ſuffer him to come to him, to looke him in the face: for he had bene paſt all ſhame B to haue refuſed the requeſt of ſo worthy a man, who had before ſhewed him ſuche pleaſure, and alſo done and ſayde ſo many thinges in his fauor. Howbeit Pompey beeing the ſonne in lawe of Ceſar, did vnfortunately (at his requeſt) forſake him at his neede, vnto whome he was bownde for ſo many infinite pleaſures, as he had receyued of him afore: and therefore when he hearde ſaye he came to him, he went out at his backe gate and woulde not ſpeake with him. So Cicero ſeeing him ſelfe betrayed of him, and nowe hauing no other refuge to whome he might repayre vnto: he put him ſelfe into the handes of the two Conſuls. Of them two, Gabinius was euer cruell, and churliſhe vnto him. But Piſo on thother ſide ſpake alwayes very curteouſly vnto him, and prayed him to abſent him ſelfe for a tyme, and to giue place a litle to Clodius furie, and paciently to beare the chaunge of the tyme: For in ſo doing, he might come agayne another tyme to be the preſeruer of his contry, which was C nowe for his ſake in tumult and ſedition. Cicero vpon this aunſwer of the Conſul, conſulted with his friendes: amonge the which Lucullus gaue him aduiſe to tary, and ſayd that he ſhould be the ſtronger. But all the reſt were of contrary opinion, and would haue him to get him away with ſpeede: for the people would ſhortly wiſhe for him agayne, when they had once bene beaten with Clodius furie and folly. Cicero liked beſt to followe this counſell. Where-uppon hauing had a ſtatue of Minerua a long tyme in his houſe, the which he greatly reue-nerua, Protector of* Rome. So, his friends hauing giuen him ſafe conduct, he went out of Rome about midnight, and tooke his way through the contry of Lvke by lande, meaning to goe into Sicile. When it was knowen in Rome that he was fledde, Clodius did preſently ba- D niſhe him by decree of the people, and cauſed billes of inhibition to be ſette vppe, that no man ſhould ſecretly receiue him within fiue hundred myles compaſſe of Italy. Howbeit diuers men reuerencing Cicero, made no reckoning of that inhibition: but when they had vſed him with all manner of curteſie poſſible, they did conduct him beſides at his departure, Hipponium, alias Vibone: a city in Luke ſauing one citie onely in Lvke, called at that tyme Hipponivm, and nowe Vibone: where a Sicilian called Vibius, (vnto whome Cicero before had done many pleaſures, and ſpecially amonge others, had made him Maiſter of the workes in the yeare that he was Conſul) would not once receyue him into his houſe, but promiſed him he woulde appoynt him a place in the contry that he might goe vnto. And Caius Virgilius alſo, at that tyme Prætor and gouernor of Sicile, who before had ſhewed him ſelfe his very greate friende: wrote E then vnto him, that he ſhoulde not come neare vnto Sicile. This grieued him to the harte. Thereuppon he went directly vnto the citie of Brvndvsivm, and there imbarked to paſſe ouer the ſea vnto Dyrrachivm, and at the firſt had winde at will: but when he was in the mayne ſea, the winde turned, and brought him backe agayne to the place from whence he came. But after that, he hoyſed ſayle agayne, and the reporte went, that at his then

A then was looked for of one ſo well ſtudied and learned as he. And yet he oftentimes praied his friends, not to call him Orator, but rather Philoſopher: ſaying, that Philoſophie was his chiefeſt profeſſion, & that for his eloquence he did not vſe it, but as a neceſſary inſtrument to one that pleadeth in the common wealth. But glory, and opinion, hath great power to take mans reaſon from him, euen like a culler, from the minds of them that are common pleaders in matters of ſtate, and to make them feele the ſelfe ſame paſſions that common people doe, by dayly frequenting their companie: vnles they take great heede of them, and that they come to practiſe in the common wealth with this reſolute minde, to haue to doe with the like matters that the common people haue, but not to entangle them ſelues with the like paſſions and moodes, by the which their matters doe riſe. Nowe Clodius was not contented that he had ba-B niſhed Cicero out of Italy, but further he burnt all his houſes in the contry, and his houſe alſo in Rome ſtanding in the market place, of the which he built a temple of libertie, and cauſed his goods to be ſolde by the cryer: ſo that the cryer was occupied all daye long crying the goods to be ſold, and no man offered to buye any of them. The chiefeſt men of the citie beginning to be afrayd of theſe violent parts, and hauing the common people at his commaundement, whom he had made very bold and inſolent: he beganne to inuey againſt Pompey, and ſpake ill of his doings in the time of his warres, the which euery man els but him ſelf did commend. Pompey then was very angry with him ſelfe that he had ſo forſaken Cicero, and repented him of it, and by his friendes procured all the meanes he could to call him home againe from his baniſhment. Clodius was againſt it all he could. The Senate notwithſtanding with one full C conſent ordeyned, that nothing ſhould be eſtabliſhed for the common wealth, before Ciceroes baniſhment were firſt repealed. Lentulus was at that tyme Conſul, and there grewe ſuch an vprore and ſturre apon it, that ſome of the Tribunes were hurt in the market place, and Quintus Cicero (the brother of Cicero) was ſlayne and hidden vnder the deade bodies. Then the people beganne to chaunge their mindes. And Annius Milo, one of the Tribunes, was the firſt man that durſt venter vpon Clodius, and bringe him by force to be tryed before the Iudges. Pompey him ſelfe alſo hauing gotten a great number of men about him, aſwell of the citie of Rome as of other townes adioyning to it, beeing ſtrongly garded with them: he came out of his houſe, and compelled Clodius to get him out of the market place, and then called the people to giue their voyces, for the calling home agayne of Cicero. It is reported D that the people neuer paſſed thinge with ſo great good will, nor ſo wholy together, as the returne of Cicero. And the Senate for their partes alſo, in the behalfe of Cicero, ordeyned that the cities which had honored and receiued Cicero in his exile, ſhoulde be greatly commended: and that his houſes which Clodius had ouerthrowen and raſed, ſhould be reedified at the charge of the common wealth. So Cicero returned the ſixtenth moneth after his baniſhment, and the townes and cities he came by, ſhewed them ſelues ſo ioyfull of his returne, that all manner of men went to meete and honor him, with ſo great loue and affection, that Ciceroes reporte thereof afterwardes came in deede ſhort of the very truth as it was. For he ſayde, that Italy brought him into Rome vpon their ſhoulders. Inſomuch as Craſſus him ſelfe, who before his baniſhment was his enemie, went then with very good will vn-
E to him, and became his friende, ſaying: that he did it for the loue of his ſonne, who loued Cicero with all his hart. Nowe Cicero beeing returned, he found a tyme when Clodius was out of the citie, and went with a good companie of his friendes vnto the Capitoll, and there tooke away the tables, and brake them, in the which Clodius had written all his actes that he had paſſed and done in the tyme of his Tribuneſhip. Clodius would afterwardes haue accuſed Cicero for it: But Cicero aunſwered him, that he was not lawfully created Tribune, bicauſe he was of the Patricians, and therefore all that he had done in his Tribuneſhip was voyde, and of none effect. Therewith Cato was offended, and ſpake againſt him, not for that he liked any of Clodius doings: (but to the contrary, vtterly miſliked all that he did) but bicauſe he thought it out of all reaſon, that the Senate ſhoulde cancell all thoſe thinges F which he had done and paſſed in his Tribuneſhip, and ſpecially, bicauſe amongeſt the reſt that was there which he him ſelfe had done in the Ile of Cyprvs, and in the citie of Byzantivm. Hereuppon there grewe ſome ſtraungenes betwixt Cicero and Cato, the which notwithstanding brake not out to open enmitie: but onely to an abstinence of their wonted familiaritie, and accesse one to another. Shortly after, Milo slue Clodius. Milo beeing accused of murder, prayed Cicero to pleade his cause. The Senate fearing that this accusation of Milo, (who was a hardie man, and of qualitie besides) woulde moue some sedition and vprore in the citie: they gaue commission to Pompey to see iustice executed aswell in this cause, as in other offences, that the citie might be quiet, and iudgement also executed with safetie. Thereuppon Pompey the night before tooke the higheſt places of the market place, by his souldiers that were armed, whome he placed thereabout. Milo fearing that Cicero woulde bee affraied to see suche a number of harneſt men about him, beeing no vsuall matter, and that it might peraduenture hinder him to pleade his cause well: he prayed him he woulde come betymes in the morning in his litter into the market place, and there to staye the comming of the Iudges, till the place were full. For Cicero was not onely fearefull in warres, but timerous also in pleading. For in deede he neuer beganne to speake, but it was in feare: and when his eloquence was come to the beſt proofe and perfection, he neuer left his trembling and timerousnes. Insomuch that pleading a case for Mutius Murena (accused by Cato,) striuing to excell Hortensius, whose pleading was very well thought of: he tooke no rest all night, and what through watching, and the trouble of his minde he was not very well, so that he was not so well liked for his pleading, as Hortensius. So, going to defend Miloes cause, when he came out of his litter, and sawe Pompey set aloft as if he had beene in a campe, and the market place compassed about with armed men, glistering in euery corner: it so amated him, that he could scant facion him selfe to speake, all the partes of him did so quake and tremble, and his voyce could not come to him. But Milo on the other side stoode boldly by him him selfe, without any feare at all of the iudgement of his cause, nether did he let his heere growe, as other men accused did: nether did he weare any mourning gowne, the which was (as it seemed) one of the chiefeſt causes that condemned him. Yet many held opinion that this timerousnes of Cicero came rather of the goodwill he bare vnto his friends, then of any cowardly minde of him selfe. He was also chosen one of the Prieſtes of the Soothesayers, which they call Augures, in the roome of P. Crassus the younger, who was slayne in the Realme of Parthia. Afterwardes, the prouince of Cilicia being appoynted to him, with an armie of twelue thowsand footemen, and two thowsand fiue hundred horsemen, he tooke the sea to goe thither. So when he was arriued there, he brought Cappadocia agayne into the subiection and obedience of king Ariobarzanes according to his commission and commaundement giuen by the Senate: moreouer, both there and elsewhere he tooke as excellent good order as could be deuised, in reducing of thinges to quietnes, without warres. Furthermore, finding that the Cilicians were growen somewhat stowt and vnruly, by the ouerthrowe the Romanes had of the Parthians, and by reason of the rising and rebellion in Syria: he brought them vnto reason by gentle perswasions, and neuer receiued giftes that were sent him, no not from Kinges and Princes. Furthermore, he did disburden the prouinces of the feaſtes and banckets they were wont to make other gouernors before him. On the other side also, he woulde euer haue the company of good and learned men at his table, and would vse them well, without curiositie and excesse. He had neuer porter to his gate, nor was seene by any man in his bed: For he would alwayes rise at the breake of daye, and would walke or stande before his dore. He would curteously receiue all them that came to salute and visite him. Further they report of him, that he neuer caused man to be beaten with roddes, nor to teare his owne garments. In his anger he neuer reuiled any man, nether did dispightfully set fine vpon any mans heade. Finding many thinges also belonging to the common wealth, which priuate men had stollen and imbecelled to their owne vse: he restored them agayne vnto the cities, whereby they grewe very riche and wealthie: and yet did he saue their honor and credit that had taken them away, and did them no other hurte, but onely constrayned them to restore that which was the common wealthes. He made a litle warre also, and draue away the theeues that kept about the Mountayne Amanus, for the which exployte his souldiers called him Imperator, to saye, chiefe Captaine. About that tyme there was an Orator called Cæcilius, who wrote vnto him

A from Rome, to praye him to sende him some Leoperds, or Panthers out of Cilicia, bicause he woulde shewe the people some pastyme with them. Cicero boasting of his doinges, wrote to him agayne, that there were no more Leoperds in Cilicia, but that they were all fledde into Caria for anger, that seeing all thinges quiet in Cilicia, they had leasure now to hunte them. So when he returned towardes Rome, from the charge of his gouernment, he came by Rhodes: and stayed a few dayes at Athens, with great delight, to remember how pleasauntly he liued there before, at what time he studied there. Thither came to him the chiefest learned men of the citie, and his frendes also, with whom he was acquainted at his first being there. In fine, hauing receiued all the honorable enterteinment in Grece that could be: he returned vnto Rome, where at his arriuall he found great factions kindled, B the which men saw plainly would growe in the ende to ciuill warre. Thereuppon the Senate hauing decreed that he should enter in triumphe into the citie: he aunswered, that he would rather (all parties agreed) follow Cæsars coche in triumphe. So he trauelled verie earnestly betwene Pompey and Cæsar, eftsoones wryting vnto Cæsar, and also speaking vnto Pompey that was presen, seeking all the meanes he coulde, to take vp the quarrell and misliking betwext them two. But it was so impossible a matter, that there was no speeche of agreement woulde take place. So Pompey hearing that Cæsar was not farre from Rome, he durst no lenger abide in Rome, but fled with diuers of the greatest men in Rome. Cicero would not followe him when he fled, and therefore men thought he would take parte with Cæsar: but this is certaine, that he was in a maruelous perplexitie, and could not easely determine what way to take. Where-
C uppon he wrote in his Epistells: what way should I take? Pompey hath the iuster and honester cause of warre, but Cæsar can better execute, and prouide for him selfe and his frendes with better safetie: so that I haue meanes enow to flie, but none to whome I might repaire. In all this sturre, there was one of Cæsars frendes called Trebatius, which wrote a letter vnto Cicero, and told him that Cæsar wished him in any case to come to him, and to run with him the hope & fortune he vndertooke: but if he excused him selfe by his age, that then he should get him into Græce, and there to be quiet from them both. Cicero marueling that Cæsar wrote not to him him selfe, aunswered in anger, that he would doe nothing vnworthie of his actes all the dayes of his life thitherto: & to this effect he wrote in his letters. Now Cæsar being gone into Spayne, Cicero imbarked immediatly to go to Pompey. So when he came vnto him, euery man D was very glad of his comming, but Cato. Howbeit Cato secretly reproued him for comming vnto Pompey, saying: that for him selfe he had bene without all honestie at that time to haue forsaken that parte, the which he had alwayes taken and followed from the beginning of his first practise in the common wealth: but for him on thother side, that it had bene better for the safetie of his contrie, and chiefly for all his frendes, that he had bene a newter to both, and so to haue taken thinges as they had fallen out: and that he had no maner of reason nor instant cause to make him to become Cæsars enemie, and by comming thither to put him selfe into so great perill. These perswasions of Cato ouerthrewe all Ciceroes purpose and determination, besides that Pompey him selfe did not employe him in any matter of seruice or importance. But hereof him selfe was more in fault then Pompey, bicause he confessed openly that he did E repent him he was come thither. Furthermore, he scorned and disdained all Pompeys preparacions and counsells, the which in deede made him to be had in gealousie and suspicion. Also he would euer be fleering and gybing at those that tooke Pompeys parte, though he had no list him selfe to be merie. He would also goe vp and downe the campe very sad and heauy, but yet he woulde euer haue one geast or other to make men laugh, although they had as litle lust to be merie as he: and surely, it shall doe no hurte to call some of them to minde in this place. Domitius being verie desirous to preferre a gentleman to haue charge of men, to recommende him, he sayd he was an honest, wise, and sober man. Whereto Cicero presently answered. Why doest thou not kepe him then to bring vp thy children? An other time when they commended Theophanes Lesbian, (that was maister of all the artificers of the campe) F bicause he had notablie comforted the Rhodians when they had receiued a greate losse of their nauy: see, sayd Cicero, what a goodly thing it is to haue a Græcian, master of artificers in the campe? When both battells came to ioyne together, and that Cæsar had in manner all the aduauntage, & kept them as good as beſieged: Lentulus told him on a time, that he heard A ſay all Cæſars frendes were madde, and melancholy men. Why, ꝙ Cicero to him againe: doeſt thou ſay that they doe enuie Cæſar? An other called Martius, comming lately out of ITALIE, ſayd, that there ranne a rumor in ROME, that Pompey was beſieged. What, ꝙ Cicero to him againe: and diddeſt thou take ſhippe to come and ſee him thy ſelfe, bicauſe thou mighteſt beleue it, when thou haddeſt ſeene it? Pompey being ouerthrowen, one Nonius ſayed there was yet good hope left, bicauſe they had taken ſeuen Eagles within Pompeys campe. Thy perſwa-ſion were not ill, ꝙ Cicero, ſo we were to fight but with pyes or dawes. Labienus repoſed all his truſt in certaine Oracles, that Pompey of neceſſitie muſt haue the vpper hand. Yea ſayd Cicero, but for all this goodly ſtratageame of warre, we haue not longe ſince loſt our whole campe.

Cato gaue place to Cicero, and offered him the charge of the warr at Dyrrachium.

After the battell of Pharſalia, where Cicero was not by reaſon of his ſickeneſſe: Pompey being B fled, and Cato at that time at DYRRACHIVM, where he had gathered a great number of men of warre, & had alſo prepared a great nauie: he prayed Cicero to take charge of all this army, as it perteyned vnto him, hauing bene Conſul. Cicero did not only refuſe it, but alſo tolde them he would meddle no more with this warre. But this was enough to haue made him bene ſlaine: for the younger Pompey and his frendes called him traitor, and drewe their ſwordes vpon him to kill him, which they had done, had not Cato ſtepped betwene them and him, and yet had he muche a doe to ſaue him, and to conuey him ſafely out of the campe. When Cicero came to BRVNDVSIVM, he ſtayed there a certaine time for Cæſars comming, who came but ſlowly, by reaſon of his troubles he had in ASIA, as alſo in ÆGYPT. Howbeit newes being brought at length that Cæſar was arriued at TARENTVM, and that he came by lande vnto BRVNDVSI- C VM: Cicero departed thence to goe meete him, not miſtruſting that Cæſar woulde not pardon him, but rather being aſhamed to come to his enemie being a conqueror, before ſuch a number of men as he had about him. Yet he was not forced to doe or ſpeake any thing vnſeemely to his calling. For Cæſar ſeeing him comming towardes him farre before the reſt that came with him: he lighted from his horſe and imbraced him, and walked a great way a foote with him, ſtil talking with him only, and euer after he did him great honor and made much of him.
Inſomuche as Cicero hauing written a booke in praiſe of Cato: Cæſar on the other ſide wrote an other, and praiſed the eloquence and life of Cicero, matching it with the life of Pericles, and Theramenes. Ciceroes booke was intituled Cato, & Cæſars booke called Anticato, as much to ſay, as againſt Cato. They ſay further, that Quintus Ligarius being accuſed to haue bene in the field D againſt Cæſar, Cicero tooke vpon him to defend his cauſe: and that Cæſar ſayd vnto his frendes about him, what hurte is it for vs to heare Cicero ſpeake, whome we haue not heard of long time? For otherwiſe Ligarius (in my opinion) ſtandeth already a condemned man, for I know him to be a vile man, and mine enemie. But when Cicero had begonne his Oration, he moued

The force of Ciceroes eloquence, how it altered Cæſar.

Cæſar maruelouſly, he had ſo ſweete a grace, and ſuche force in his words: that it is reported Cæſar chaunged diuers colours, and ſhewed plainly by his countenance, that there was a mar-uelous alteracion in all the partes of him. For, in thend when the Orator came to touche the battell of Pharſalia, then was Cæſar ſo troubled, that his bodie ſhooke withall, and beſides, certaine bookes he had, fell out of his handes, and he was driuen againſt his will to ſet Liga- young men that came to heare him: by whoſe acceſſe vnto him (bicauſe they were the chiefeſt of the nobilitie in ROME) he came againe to beare as great ſway and authoritie in ROME, as e-uer he had done before. His ſtudie and endeuour was, to wryte matters of Philoſophie dialogue wiſe, and to tranſlate out of Græke into Latin, taking paynes to bring all the Græke wordes, which are proper vnto logicke and naturall cauſes, vnto Latin. For he was the firſt man by report that gaue Latin names vnto theſe Græke words, which are proper vnto Philoſophers, as, Φαντασία, he termed, Viſio. Κατάθεσις Aſſenſus. Ἐποχὴ, Aſſenſus cohibitio. Κατάληψις, Com- prehenſio. Τὸ ἄτομον Corpus indiuiduum. Τὸ ἁπλοῦς Corpus ſimplex. Τὸ κενὸν Vacuum, and many other ſuche like wordes. But though he were not the firſt, yet was it he that moſt did deuiſe and vſe F them, and turned ſome of them by tranſlation, others into proper termes: ſo that at length they came to be well taken, knowen, and vnderſtanded of euerie man. And for his readineſſe in

A in wryting of verſes, he would vſe them many times for his recreation: for it is reported, that whenſoeuer he tooke in hand to make any, he would diſpatch fiue hundred of them in a night. Nowe, all that time of his recreation and pleaſure, he woulde commonly be at ſome of his houſes in the contrie, which he had neere vnto TVSCVLVM, from whence he would wryte vnto his frends, that he led Laertes life: either ſpoken merily as his maner was, or elſe pricked forward with ambition, deſiring to returne againe to be a practiſer in the common wealth, being wearie with the preſent time and ſtate thereof. Howſoeuer it was, he came oftentimes to ROME, onely to ſee Ceſar to keepe him his frend, and would euer be the firſt man to confirme any honors decreed vnto him, and was alwayes ſtudious to vtter ſome newe matter to praiſe him and his doinges. As that was he ſayd touching the ſtatues of Pompey, the which being o-

B uerthrowen, Ceſar commaunded them to be ſet vp againe, and ſo they were. For Cicero ſayd, that by that curteſie in ſetting vp of Pompeys ſtatues againe, he did eſtabliſhe his owne. So, Cicero being determined to wryte all the ROMANE hiſtorie, and to mingle with them many of the GRECIANS doings, adding thereunto all the fables and deuiſes which they doe write and reporte: he was hindered of his purpoſe againſt his will, by many open and priuate troubles that came vpon him at once: whereof notwithſtanding he him ſelfe was cauſe of the moſt of them. For firſt of all, he did put away his wife Terentia, bicauſe ſhe had made but ſmall ac- Cicero did put away his wife Terentia.
compt of him in all the warres: ſo that he departed from ROME hauing no neceſſarie thing with him to enterteine him out of his contrie, and yet when he came backe againe into ITA-LIE, ſhe neuer ſhewed any ſparke of loue or good will towardes him. For ſhe neuer came to

C BRVNDVSIVM to him, where he remeyned a long time: and worſe then that, his daughter hauing the hart to take ſo long a iorney in hand to goe to him, ſhe neither gaue her company to conduct her, nor money or other furniture conuenient for her, but ſo handled the matter, that Cicero at his returne to ROME founde bare walles in his houſe and nothing in it, and yet greatly brought in det beſides. And theſe were the honeſteſt cauſes alleaged for their diuorſe. But beſides that Terentia denyed all theſe, Cicero him ſelfe gaue her a good occaſion to cleere her ſelfe, bicauſe he ſhortly after maried a young maiden, being fallen in fancie with her (as Cicero maried a young maiden.
Terentia ſayd) for her beawtie: or, as Tyro his ſeruaunt wrote, for her riches, to thende that with her goods he might pay his dets. For ſhe was very rich, & Cicero alſo was appointed her gardian, the being left ſole heire. Now, bicauſe he ought a maruelous ſumme of money, his

D parents and frends did counſell him to mary this young maiden, notwithſtanding he was too olde for her, bicauſe that with her goodes he might ſatisfie his creditors. But Antonius ſpeaking of this mariage of Cicero, in his aunſwers & Orations he made againſt the PHILIPPIANS: he doth reproue him for that he put away his wife, with whome he was growen olde, being merie with him by the way for that he had bene an idle man, and neuer went from the ſmoke of his chimney, nor had bene abroade in the warres in any ſeruice of his contrie or common wealth. Shortly after that he had maried his ſecond wife, his daughter dyed in labor of child, in Lentulus houſe, whoſe ſeconde wife ſhe was, being before maried vnto Piſo, who was her firſt husband. So the Philoſophers and learned men came of all ſides to comfort him: but he tooke her death ſo ſorowfully, that he put away his ſecond wife, bicauſe he thought ſhe did reioyce

E at the death of his daughter. And thus muche touching the ſtate and troubles of his houſe. Nowe touching the conſpiracie againſt Ceſar, he was not made priuie to it, although he was Cicero not made priuy to the conſpiracie againſt Ceſar.
one of Brutus greateſt frendes, and that it grieued him to ſee thinges in that ſtate they were brought vnto, and albeit alſo he wiſhed for the time paſt, as much as any other man did. But in deede the conſpirators were affrayed of his nature, that lacked hardineſſe: and of his age, the which oftentimes maketh the ſtowteſt and moſt hardieſt natures, faint harted & cowardly. Notwithſtanding, the conſpiracie being executed by Brutus and Caſſius, Ceſars frendes beinge gathered together, euerie man was affrayed that the citie woulde againe fall into ciuill warres. And Antonius alſo, who was Conſul at that time, did aſſemble the Senate, and made ſome ſpeache and mocion then to draw things againe vnto quietnes. But Cicero hauing vſed

F diuers perſwaſions fit for the time, in the end he moued the Senate to decree (following the example of the ATHENIANS) a generall obliuion of thinges done againſt Ceſar, and to aſſigne vnto Brutus and Caſſius ſome gouernmentes of prouinces. Howbeit nothing was concluded:

for the people of them ſelues were ſorie, when they ſawe Cæſar's bodie brought through the market place. And when Antonius alſo did ſhew them his gowne all bebloodied, cut, & thrust through with ſwordes: then they were like madde men for anger, and ſought vp and downe the market place if they coulde meete with any of them that had ſlaine him: and taking fire brandes in their handes, they ranne to their houſes to ſet them a fire. But the conſpirators hauing preuented this daunger, ſaued them ſelues: and fearing that if they taried at Rome, they ſhould haue many ſuch alaroms, they forſooke the citie. Then Antonius began to looke aloft, and became fearefull to all men, as though he meant to make him ſelfe king: but yet moſt of all vnto Cicero, aboue all others. For Antonius perceiuing that Cicero began againe to increaſe in credit and authoritie, and knowing that he was Brutus very frend, he did miſlike to ſee him come neere him, and beſides, there was at that time ſome gealouſie betwext them, for the diuerſitie and difference of their manners and diſpoſicions. Cicero being affrayed of this, was firſt of all in minde to go with Dolabella, to his prouince of Syria, as one of his Lieutenaunts. But they that were appointed to be Conſuls the next yeare following after Antonius, two noble citizens, & Ciceroes great frends, Hircius, & Panſa: they intreated him not to forſake them, vndertaking that they would plucke downe this ouergreat power of Antonius, ſo he would remaine with them. But Cicero, neither beleuing nor altogether miſtruſting them, forſooke Dolabella, and promiſed Hircius and Panſa, that he would ſpend the ſommer at Athens, and that he would returne againe to Rome ſo ſoone as they were entred into their Conſulſhip. With this determination Cicero tooke ſea alone, to goe into Græce. But as it chaunceth oftentimes, there was ſome let that kept him he could not ſaile, and newes came to him daily from Rome, as the manner is, that Antonius was wonderfully chaunged, and that nowe he did nothing any more without the authoritie & conſent of the Senate, & that there lacked no thing but his perſon, to make all things well. Then Cicero condemning his daſtardly feare, returned foorthwith to Rome, not being deceiued in his firſt hope. For there came ſuche a number of people out to meete him, that he coulde doe nothing all day long, but take them by the handes, and imbrace them: who to honor him, came to meete him at the gate of the citie, as alſo by the way to bring him to his houſe. The next morning Antonius aſſembled the Senate, and called for Cicero by name. Cicero refuſed to goe, and kept his bedde, fayning that he was werie with his iorney and paines he had taken the day before: but in deede, the cauſe why he went not, was, for feare and ſuſpicion of an ambuſhe that was layed for him by the way, if he had gone, as he was informed by one of his verie good frends. Antonius was maruelouſly offended that they did wrongfully accuſe him, for laying of any ambuſh for him: and therefore ſent ſouldiers to his houſe, and commaunded them to bring him by force, or elſe to ſette his houſe a fire. After that time, Cicero and he were alwayes at iarre, but yet coldly enough, one of them taking heede of an other: vntill that the young Cæſar returning from the citie of Apollonia, came as lawfull heire vnto Iulius Cæſar Dictator, and had contencion with Antonius for the ſumme of two thowſande fiue hundred Myriades, the which Antonius kept in his handes of his fathers goodes. Thereuppon, Philip who had maried the mother of this young Cæſar, and Marcellus, who had alſo maried his ſiſter, went with young Cæſar vnto Cicero, and there agreed together, that Cicero ſhould helpe young Cæſar with the fauour of his authoritie, and eloquence, as well towardes the Senate, as alſo to the people: and that Cæſar in recompence of his good will ſhould ſtande by Cicero, with his money and ſouldiers. For this young Cæſar, had many of his fathers old ſouldiers about him, that had ſerued vnder him. Now there was an other cauſe that made Cicero glad to imbrace the frendſhippe of this young Cæſar, and that was this. Whileſt Pompey and Iulius Cæſar were aliue, and in good caſe: Cicero dreamed one night that the Senators ſonnes were called into the Capitoll, bicauſe Iupiter had appointed to ſhew them him, that one day ſhould come to be Lord and king of Rome, and that the Romanes being deſirous to ſee who it ſhould be, ranne all vnto the temple: and that all the children likewiſe were waiting there in their goodly garded gownes of purple, vntill that ſodainly the dores of the temple were open, & then that al the children roſe one after an other, & went and paſſed by the image of Iupiter, who looked vpon them all, and ſent them diſcontented, ſauing this young Cæſar, vnto whom he put foorth his hand as he paſſed by, and ſayd:

Priuate grudge betwext Antonius and Cicero.

Cicero and Octauius Cæſar ioyned in frendſhip.

Ciceroes dreame of Octauius, the adopted ſonne of Iulius Cæſar.

My

A My Lordes of Rome, this childe is he that ſhall end all your ciuill warres, when he commeth to be Lord of Rome. Some ſay, that Cicero had this viſion in his dreame, and that he caried in good memory the looke of this child, howbeit that he knew him not: and that the next morning he went of purpoſe into the fielde of Mars, where theſe young boyes did exerciſe themſelues, who, when he came thither, had broken vp from playing, and were going home, and that amongeſt them he firſt ſaw him whom he had dreamed of, and knew him verie well, and muſing at him the more, asked him whoſe ſonne he was. The boy aunſwered, that he was the ſonne of one Octauius, (a man otherwiſe of no great calling) & of Accia, the ſiſter of Iulius Cæſar: who hauing no childe, made him his heire by his laſt will and teſtament, and left him all his landes and goodes. After that time, it is reported, that Cicero was verie glad to ſpeake to B him when he met with him, and that the boy alſo liked Ciceroes frendſhippe, and making of him: for by good happe the boy was borne the ſame yeare that Cicero was Conſul. And theſe be the reaſons alleaged, why Cicero did fauor this young Cæſar. But in truth, firſt of all the great malice he bare vnto Antonius, and ſecondly his nature that was ambitious of honor, were (in my opinion) the chiefeſt cauſes why he became young Cæſars frend: knowing that the force and power of his ſouldiers, would greatly ſtrengthen his authority and countenance in manedging the affaires of the ſtate, beſides that the young man coulde flatter him ſo well, that he called him father. But Brutus being offended with him for it, in his Epiſtells he wrote vnto Atticus, he ſharply reproueth Cicero, ſaying, that for feare of Antonius he flattered this young Cæſar: whereby it appeared, he did not ſo much ſeeke for the libertie of Rome, as he did pro- C cure him ſelfe a louing and gentle maiſter. This notwithſtanding, Brutus brought with him Ciceroes ſonne that ſtudied Philoſophie at Athens, and gaue him charge of men vnder him, and imployed him in great affaires, wherein he ſhewed him ſelfe verie forward, and valliant. Now Ciceroes authoritie and power grew againe to be ſo great in Rome, as euer it was before. For he did what he thought good, and ſo vexed Antonius, that he draue him out of the citie, and ſent the two Conſuls Hircius and Panſa againſt him, to fight with him: and cauſed the Senate alſo to decree, that young Cæſar ſhould haue ſergeaunts to carie roddes and axes before him, and all other furniture for a Prætor, as a man that fighteth for his contry. After that Antonius had loſt the battell, and that both the Conſuls were ſlaine, both the armies came vnto Cæſar. The Senate then being affraied of this young man, that had ſo great good fortune, they D practiſed by honors and gifts to call the armies from him, which he had about him, and ſo to miniſh the greatnes of his power: ſaying, that their contrie now ſtoode in no neede of force, nor feare of defence, ſith her enemie Antonius was fled and gone. Cæſar fearing this, ſent men ſecretly vnto Cicero, to pray him to procure that they two together might be choſen Conſuls, and that when they ſhould be in office, he ſhould doe and appoint what he thought good, hauing the young man at his commaundement, who deſired no more but the honor only of the name. Cæſar him ſelfe confeſſed afterwardes, that being affrayed he ſhould haue bene vtterly caſt away, to haue bene left alone: he finely ſerued his turne by Ciceroes ambition, hauing perſwaded him to require the Conſulſhip, through the helpe and aſſiſtance that he would geue him. But there was Cicero finely colted, as old as he was, by a young man, when he was con- E tented to ſue for the Conſulſhip in his behalfe, and to make the Senate agreable to it: wherefore his frendes preſently reproued him for it, and ſhortly after he perceiued he had vndone him ſelfe, and together alſo loſt the libertie of his contrie. For this young man Octauius Cæſar being growen to be verie great by his meanes and procurement: when he ſaw that he had the Conſulſhippe vpon him, he forſooke Cicero, and agreed with Antonius and Lepidus. Then ioyning his armie with theirs, he deuided the Empire of Rome with them, as if it had bene lands left in common betwene them: and beſides that, there was a bill made of two hundred men and vpwards, whom they had appointed to be ſlaine. But the greateſt difficultie and dif- ference that fell out betwene them, was about the outlawing of Cicero. For Antonius woulde hearken to no peace betwene them, vnleſſe Cicero were ſlaine firſt of all: Lepidus was alſo in F the ſame mind with Antonius: but Cæſar was againſt them both. Their meeting was by the citie of Bolonia, where they continued three dayes together, they three only ſecretly conſulting in a place enuironned about with a litle riuer. Some ſay that Cæſar ſtuck hard with Cicero the two firſt dayes, but at the third, that he yeelded and forſooke him. The exchaunge they a- A greed vpon betwene them, was this. Cæſar forſooke Cicero: Lepidus, his owne brother Paulus: and Antonius, Lucius Cæſar, his vncle by the mothers ſide. Such place tooke wrath in them, as they regarded no kinred nor blood, and to ſpeake more properly, they ſhewed that no brute or ſauage beaſt is ſo cruell as man, if with his licentiouſnes he haue liberty to execute his will.

While theſe matters were a brewing, Cicero was at a houſe of his in the contrie, by the city of THVSCVLVM, hauing at home with him alſo his brother Quintus Cicero. Newes being brought them thither of theſe proſcriptions or outlawries, appointing men to be ſlaine: they determined to goe to ASTYRA, a place by the ſea ſide where Cicero had an other houſe, there to take ſea, and from thence to goe into MACEDON vnto Brutus. For there ran a rumor that Brutus was verie ſtrong, and had a great power. So, they cauſed them ſelues to be conueyed thither B in two litters, both of them being ſo weake with ſorow and griefe, that they could not otherwiſe haue gone their wayes. As they were on their waye, both their litters going as neere to ech other as they could, they bewailed their miſerable eſtate: but Quintus chiefly, who tooke it moſt grieuouſly. For, remembring that he tooke no money with him when he came from his houſe, and that Cicero his brother alſo had verie litle for him ſelfe: he thought it beſt that Cicero ſhoulde holde on his iorney, whileſt he him ſelfe made an arrant home to fetche ſuche thinges as he lacked, and ſo to make haſt againe to ouertake his brother. They both thought it beſt ſo, and then tenderly imbracing one an other, the teares falling from their eyes, they ſeruaunts, vnto them that made ſearch for him: he was cruelly ſlaine, and his ſonne with him. C But Marcus Tullius Cicero being caried vnto ASTYRA, and there finding a ſhippe readie, imbarked immediatly, and ſayled alongeſt the coaſt vnto mount Circe, hauing a good gale of winde. There the mariners determining forthwith to make ſayle againe, he came a ſhore, either for feare of the ſea, or for that he had ſome hope that Cæſar had not altogether forſaken him: and therewithall returning towardes ROME by lande, he had gone about a hundred furlong thence. But then being at a ſtraight howe to reſolue, and ſodainly chaunging his minde: he woulde needes be caried backe againe to the ſea, where he continued all night maruelous ſorowfull, and full of thoughts. For one while he was in minde to goe ſecretly vnto Octauius Cæſars houſe, & to kill him ſelfe by the hearth of his chimney, to make the furies of hell to reuenge his blood: but being affraied to be intercepted by the way, & cruelly handled, he turned D from that determination. Then falling into other vnaduiſed determinations, being perplexed as he was, he put him ſelfe againe into his ſeruauntes handes, to be conueyed by ſea to an o-* Some doe read Caiete. ther place called * CAPITES. There he had a very proper pleaſaunt ſommer houſe, where the North winds, called Eteſiæ, doe geue a trimme freſh ayer in the ſommer ſeaſon. In that place alſo there is a litle temple dedicated vnto Apollo, not farre from the ſea ſide. From thence there came a great ſhole of crowes, making a maruelous noyſe, that came flying towardes Ciceroes A wonderous matter foreſhewed by crowes vnto Cicero. ſhippe, which rowed vpon the ſhore ſide. This ſhole of crowes came and lighted vpon the yard of their ſaile, ſome crying, and ſome pecking the cords with their bills: ſo that euery man iudged ſtraight, that this was a ſigne of ill lucke at hand. Cicero notwithſtanding this, came a ſhore, and went into his houſe, and layed him downe to ſee if he coulde ſleepe. But the moſt E parte of theſe crowes came and lighted vpon the chamber windowe where he lay, making a wonderfull great noyſe: and ſome of them got vnto Ciceroes bedde where he lay, the clothes being caſt ouer his head, and they neuer left him, till by litle and litle they had with their bills pluckt of the clothes that couered his face. His men ſeeing that, & ſaying to them ſelues that they were too vile beaſts, if they would tarie to ſee their maiſter ſlaine before their eyes, conſidering that brute beaſts had care to ſaue his life, ſeeing him ſo vnworthily intreated, and that they ſhould not doe the beſt they coulde to ſaue his life: partely by intreatie, and partely by force, they put him againe into his litter to carie him to the ſea. But in the meane time came Herennius, & Popilius, ſent to kill M. T. Cicero. the murderers appointed to kill him, Herennius a Centurion, and Popilius Læna, Tribune of the ſouldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thowſande men, whoſe cauſe Cicero had once pleaded before F the Iudges, when he was accuſed for the murther of his owne father) hauing ſouldiers attending vpon them. So Ciceroes gate being ſhut, they entred the houſe by force, and miſſing him, they

they asked them of the house what was become of him. They answered they could not tell. Howbeit there was a young boy in the house called Philologus, a slaue infranchised by Quintus Cicero, whom Tullius Cicero had brought vp in the latin tongue, and had taught him the liberall sciences: he told this Herennius, that his seruauntes caried him in a litter towards the sea, through darke narrowe lanes, shadowed with woode on either side. Popilius the Colonell taking some souldiers with him, ranne about on the outside of the lanes to meete him at his comming out of them: and Herennius on thother side entred the lanes. So Cicero hearing him comming, commaunded his men to set downe his litter, and taking his beard in his left hande, as his manner was, he stowtly looked the murderers in the faces, his head and beard being all white, and his face leane & wrinckled, for the extreame sorowes he had taken: diuers of them that were by, helde their handes before their eyes, whilest Herennius did cruelly murder him. So Cicero being three score and foure yeares of age, thrust his necke out of the litter, and had his head cut of by Antonius commaundement, and his hands also, which wrote the Orations (called the Philippians) against him. For so did Cicero call the Orations he made against him, for the malice he bare him: & do yet continue the same name vntill this present time. When these poore dismembred members were brought to Rome, Antonius by chaunce was busily occupied at that time about the election of certaine officers: who when he heard of them & saw them, he cried out alowde that now all his outlawries and proscriptions were executed: and thereuppon commaunded his head and his hands should straight be set vp ouer the pulpit for Orations, in the place called Rostra. This was a fearefull and horrible sight vnto the Romanes, who thought they saw not Ciceroes face, but an image of Antonius life and disposicion: who among so many wicked deedes as he committed, yet he did one act only that had some shew of goodnes, which was this. He deliuered Philologus into the handes of Pompeia, the wife of Quintus Cicero: and when she had him, besides other cruell tormentes she made him abide, she compelled him to cut his owne flesh of by little morsells, and to broyle them, and then to eate them. Some historiographers doe thus reporte it. But Tyro who was a slaue infranchised by Cicero, made no mencion of the treason of this Philologus. Howbeit I vnderstoode that Cæsar Augustus, long time after that, went one day to see one of his Nephewes, who had a booke in his hande of Ciceroes: and he fearing least his Vncle would be angrie to finde that booke in his handes, thought to hide it vnder his gowne. Cæsar saw it, and tooke it from him, and red the most parte of it standing, and then deliuered it to the young boy, and sayd vnto him: he was a wise man in deede, my childe, and loued his contrie well. After he had slaine Antonius, being Consul: he made Ciceroes sonne his colleague and fellow Consul with him, in whose time the Senate ordeyned, that the images of Antonius should be throwen downe, and depriued his memory of all other honors: adding further vnto his decree, that from thence foorth none of the house & familie of the Antonij should euer after beare the christen name of Marcus. So, Gods iustice made the extreame reuenge and punishment of Antonius, to fal into the house of Cicero.

THE COMPARISON OF Cicero with Demosthenes.

THis is as muche as we coulde gather by our knowledge touching the notable actes and deedes worthie of memorie, wrytten of Cicero and Demosthenes. Furthermore, leauing the comparison a side of the difference of their eloquence in their Orations: me thinkes I may say thus muche of them. That Demosthenes did whollie imploy all his wit and learning (naturall or artificiall) vnto the arte of Rethoricke, and that in force, and vertue of eloquence, he did excell all the Orators in his time: and for grauetie and magnificent style, all those also that onely wryte for shewe or ostentation: and for sharpnesse and arte, all the Sophisters and Maisters of Rethoricke. And that Cicero was a man generallie learned in all sciences, and that had studied diuers bookes, as appeareth plainely by the sundrie bookes of Philosophie of his owne making, written after the manner of the Academicke Philosophers. Furthermore, they may see in his Orations he wrote in certeine causes to serue him when he pleaded: that he sought occasions in his bytalke to shewe men that he was excellently well learned. Furthermore, by their phrases a man may discerne some sparke of their manners and condicions. For Demosthenes phrase hath no maner of finenesse, geastes, nor grace in it, but is altogether graue and harshe, and smelleth not of the lampe, as Pytheas sayd when he mocked him: but sheweth a great drinker of water, extreame paines, and therewith also a sharpe and sower nature. But Cicero oftentimes fell from pleasaunt rawntes, vnto plaine scurrilitie: and turning all his pleadinges of matters of importaunce, to sporte and laughter, hauing a grace in it, many times he did forget the comlynesse that became a man of his calling. As in his Oration for Cælius, where he sayeth, it is no maruell if in so greate aboundance of wealth and fineneſse he giue him selfe a litle to take his pleasure: and that it was a folly not to vse pleasures lawefull, and tollerable, sith the famousest Philosophers that euer were, did place the chiefe felicitie of man, to be in pleasure. And it is reported also, that Marcus Cato hauing accused Muræna, Cicero being Consul, defended his cause, and in his Oration pleasauntly girded all the sect of the Stoicke Philosophers for Catoes sake, for the straunge opinions they holde, which they call Paradoxes: insomuch as he made all the people and Iudges also fall a laughing a good. And Cato him selfe also smiling a litle, sayd vnto them that sate by him: what a laughing and mocking Consul haue we, my Lordes? but letting that passe, it seemeth that Cicero was of a pleasaunt and merie nature: for his face shewed euer greate life and mirth in it. Whereas in Demosthenes countenaunce on thother side, they might discerne a maruelous diligence & care, and a pensiue man, neuer weary with paine: insomuch that his enemies, (as he reporteth him selfe) called him a peruerse & froward man. Furthermore, in their writings

A is discerned, that the one speaketh modestly in his owne praise, so as no man can iustly be offended with him: and yet not alwayes, but when necessitie enforceth him for some matter of great importaunce, but otherwise verie discreete and modest to speake of him selfe. Citero in contrarie maner, vsing too often repeticion of one selfe thing in all his Orations, shewed an extreame ambition of glorie, when incessantly he cried out:

Demosthenes modest in praising of him selfe. Cicero too full of affectacion.

Let speare and shield geue place to gowne, And geue the tung the laurell Crowne.

Yea furthermore, he did not onely praise his owne actes and deedes, but the Orations also which he had wrytten or pleaded: as if he shoulde haue contended against Isocrates, or Anaximenes, a maister that taught Rethoricke, and not to goe about to reforme the people of B Rome:

Which were both fierce and stowt in armes,
And fit to worke their enemies harmes.

For, as it is requisite for a Gouernour of a common wealth to seeke authoritie by his eloquence: so, to couet the praise of his owne glorious tongue, or as it were to begge it, that sheweth a base minde. And therefore in this poynt we must confesse that Demosthenes is farre grauer, and of a nobler minde: who declared him selfe, that all his eloquence came onely but by practise, the which also required the fauor of his auditorie: and further, he thought them fooles and madde men (as in deede they be no lesse) that therefore woulde make any boast of them selues. In this they were both alike, that both of them had great credit and authoritie
C in their Orations to the people, and for obtayning that they would propound: Insomuche as Captaines, and they that had armies in their handes, stoode in neede of their eloquence. As Chares, Diopithes, and Leosthenes, they all were holpen of Demosthenes: and Pompey, and Octauius Cæsar the young man, of Cicero: as Cæsar him selfe confesseth in his Commentaries he wrote vnto Agrippa, and Mæcenas. But nothing sheweth a mans nature and condicion more, (as it is reported, and so is it true) then when one is in authoritie: for that bewrayeth his humor, and the affections of his minde, and layeth open also all his secret vices in him. Demosthenes coulde neuer deliuer any suche proofe of him selfe, bicause he neuer bare any office, nor was called forward. For he was not Generall of the armie, which he him selfe had prepared against king Philippe. Cicero on thother side being sent Treasorer into Sicile, and Pro-D consul into Cilicia and Cappadocia, in such a time as couetousnes raigned most: (insomuch that the Captaines & Gouernors whom they sent to gouerne their prouinces, thinking it villanie and dastardlinesse to robbe, did violently take thinges by force, at what time also to take bribes was reckoned no shame, but to handle it discreetly, he was the better thought of, and beloued for it) he shewed plainely that he regarded not money, and gaue foorth many proofes of his curtesie and goodnes. Furthermore, Cicero being created Consul by name, but Dictator in deede, hauing absolute power and authoritie ouer all thinges to suppresse the rebellion and conspirators of Catiline: he proued Platoes prophecie true, which was: That the cities are safe from daunger, when the chiefe Magistrates and Gouernors (by some good diuine fortune) doe gouerne with wisedom and iustice. Demosthenes was reproued for his cor-E ruption, and selling of his eloquence: bicause secretly he wrote one Oration for Phormio, and an other in the selfe same matter for Apollodorus, they being both aduersaries. Further, he was defamed also for receiuing money of the king of Persia, and therewithall condemned for the money which he had taken of Harpalus. And though some peraduenture woulde obiect, that the reporters thereof (which are many) doe lye: yet they can not possibly deny this, that Demosthenes had no power to refraine from looking of the presentes which diuers kinges did offer him, praying him to accept them in good parte for their sakes: neither was that the part of a man that did take vsurie by trafficke on the sea, the extreamest yet of all other. In contrarie maner (as we haue sayd before) it is certeine that Cicero being Treasorer, refused the gifts which the Sicilians offered him, there: and the presentes also which the king of the Cap-F padocians offred him whilest he was Proconsul in Cilicia, and those especially which his frendes pressed vpon him to take of them, being a great summe of money, when he went as a banished man out of Rome. Furthermore, the banishment of the one was infamous to him, Diuers causes of the banishment of Demosthenes and Cicero.

bicause by iudgement he was banished as a theefe. The banishment of the other was for as honorable an acte as euer he did, being banished for ridding his contrie of wicked men. And therefore of Demosthenes, there was no speeche after he was gone: but for Cicero, all the Senate chaunged their apparell into blacke, and determined that they would passe no decree by their authoritie, before Ciceroes banishment was reuoked by the people. In deede Cicero idlely passed his time of banishment, and did nothing all the while he was in MACEDON: and one of the chiefest acts that Demosthenes did, in all the time that he delt in the affaires of the common wealth, was in his banishment. For he went vnto euery city, and did assist the Ambassadors of the GRÆCIANS, and refused the Ambassadors of the MACEDONIANS. In the which he shewed him selfe a better citizen, then either Themistocles, or Alcibiades, in their like fortune and exile. So when he was called home, and returned, he fell againe to his old trade which he practised before, and was euer against Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS. Where Lælius in open Senate sharply tooke vp Cicero, for that he sate still and sayd nothing, when that Octauius Cæsar the young man made peticion against the law, that he might sue for the Consulshippe, and being so young, that he had neuer a heare on his face. And Brutus selfe also doth greatly reproue Cicero in his letters, for that he had maintained and nourished, a more grieuous and greater tyrannie, then that which they had put downe. And last of all, me thinketh the death of Cicero most pitiefull, to see an olde man caried vp and downe, (with tender loue of his seruauntes) seeking all the waies that might be to flie death, which did not long preuent his naturall course: and in the ende, olde as he was, to see his head so pitiefully cut of. Whereas Demosthenes, though he yeelded a litle, intreating him that came to take him: yet for that he had prepared the poyson long before, that he had kept it long, and also vsed it as he did, he can not but be maruelously commended for it. For sith the god Neptune denyed him the benefit of his sanctuarie, he betooke him to a greater, and that was death: whereby he saued him selfe out of the souldiers handes of the tyran, and also scorned the bloody crueltie of Antipater.

The difference betwext Demosthenes and Ciceroes death.

THE LIFE OF Demetrius.

A WHo firſt likened arts to our ſences, ſemeth to haue reſpected eſpecially that one property of them both, in receiuing obiects of contrary quality: for, in the vſe & end of their operacion, there is great difference. The ſenſes receiue indifferently, without diſcretion and iudgement, white and blacke, ſweete and ſower, ſoft and hard: for their office is only to admit their ſeuerall obiects, and to carie and referre the iudgement thereof to the common ſence. But artes being the perfection of reaſon, receiue and allow thoſe things onely which make for their operacion, regarding & eſchuing the contraries. Thone chiefly, and for vſe: thother by the way, and with intent to auoyde them. So Phiſicke dealeth with diſeaſes, B Muſicke with diſcordes, to thend to remoue them, and worke their contraries, and the great Ladies of all other artes. Temperaunce, iuſtice, and wiſdom, doe not only conſider honeſtie, vprightnes, and profit: but examine withall, the nature and effectes of lewdnes, corruption, and damage. And innocencie, which vaunteth her want of experience in vndue practiſes: men call ſimplicitie, and ignoraunce of thinges, that be neceſſarie and good to be knowen. And therefore the auncient LACEDÆMONIANS in their ſolemne feaſtes forced their ILOTES the bondmen, to ouercharge them ſelues with wine: and ſuche they ſhewed them vnto their youth, by the apparant beaſtlines of dronken men, to worke in them an abhorring of ſo lotheſome vice. Wherin, although I can not much praiſe them for humanity or wiſedom, that corrupt and ſpoile one man, by example of him, to correct and reclaime an other: yet (as I hope) C it ſhall not be reprehended in me, if amongeſt the reſt I put in one or two paier of ſuche, as liuing in great place & accompt, haue increaſed their fame with infamy. Which in truth, I doe not, to pleaſe & draw on the reader with variety of report: but as Iſmenias the THEBAN Muſitian ſhewed his ſchollers, both thoſe that ſtrake a cleane ſtroke, with, do ſo, & ſuch as bungled it, with, do not ſo: & Antigenidas thought men ſhould like better, & with greater deſire cõtend for skill, if they heard and diſcerned vntunable notes: ſo thinke I, we ſhall be the forwarder in reading & following the good, if we know the liues, and ſee the deformity of the wicked. This treaty conteineth the liues of Demetrius, ſurnamed the Fortgainer, & M. Antony the Triumuir, & great examples to confirme the ſaying of Plato: That from great minds, both great vertues & great vices do procede. They were both giuen ouer to women & wine, both valliat & liberal, both ſumptuous & high minded, fortune ſerued them both alike, not only in the courſe of their liues, in attẽpting great matters, somtimes with good, somtimes with ill succesſe, in getting & A loſing things of great conſequence, ouerthrowing both when they feared not, reſtoring both when they hoped not. But alſo in their ende there was no great difference, thone brought to his death by his mortal enemies, & the other, fortune not much vnlike. But now to our hiſtorie. Antigonus had two ſonnes by his wife Stratonice, the daughter of Corræus, the one of them he named Demetrius, and the other Philip, after his fathers name. Thus farre the moſt wryters doe agree: howbeit ſome holde opinion, that Demetrius was not the ſonne of Antigonus, but his Nephewe. But becauſe his father dyed leauing him a childe, and that his mother was ſtraight maried againe vnto Antigonus: thereuppon came the reporte that he was Antigonus ſonne. How ſoeuer it was, Philip, that was not much younger then Demetrius, dyed. Now for Demetrius, though he was a verie bigge man, he was nothing ſo high as his father, but yet ſo B paſſing and wonderfull fayer, that no painter could poſſibly draw his picture and counterfeat to his likenes. For they ſaw a ſweete countenance, mixed with a kinde of grauetie in his face, a feare with curteſie, and an incomparable Princely maieſtie accompanied with a liuely ſpirit and youth, and his wit and manners were ſuch, that they were both fearefull, and pleaſaunt vnto men that frequented him. For as he was moſt pleaſaunt in company hauing leaſure, and moſt geuen to banketing, pleaſaunt life, and more wantonly geuen to follow any luſt and plea-ſure, than any king that euer was: yet was he alwayes very carefull & diligent in diſpatching matters of importance. And therefore he maruelouſly commended, and alſo endeuoured to follow Dionyſius, (as much to ſay, as Bacchus) aboue all the other goddes, as he that had bene a wiſe and valliant Captaine in warre, and that in peace inuented and vſed all the pleaſure that C might be. He maruelouſly loued and reuerenced his father, and it ſeemeth that the dutieful-nes he ſhewed vnto his mother, was more to diſcharge the due obedience & dutie of a ſonne, A than otherwiſe to enterteine his father, for feare of his power, or hope to be his heire. And for proofe hereof we read, that one day as he came home from hunting, he went vnto his father Antigonus, geuing audience to certaine Ambaſſadors, and after he had done his duetie to him, and kiſſed him: he ſate downe by him euen as he came from hunting, hauing his dartes in his hande, which he caried out a hunting with him. Then Antigonus calling the Ambaſſadors alowde as they went their way, hauing receiued their aunſwere: my Lords, ſayd he, you ſhall carie home this reporte of my ſonne and me, be witneſſes I pray you, how we liue one with an other. As meaning to ſhewe thereby, that the agreement betwext the father and the D ſonne together, is a great ſafetie to the affaires of a king, as alſo a manifeſt proofe of his great-nes: ſo gealous is a king to haue a companion, beſides the hate and miſtruſt it ſhould breede.

So that the greateſt Prince and moſt auncienteſt of all the ſucceſſors of Alexander, boaſted that he ſtoode not in feare of his ſonne, but did ſuffer him to ſitte by him, hauing a dart in his hand. So was this houſe onely of all other the MACEDONIAN kinges, leaſt defiled with ſuche villanie, many ſucceſſions after: and to confeſſe a troth, in all Antigonus raſe there was not one, but Philip onely, that ſlue his owne ſonne. But we haue many examples of diuers other houſes of kinges, that haue put their ſonnes, wiues, and mothers to death: and for their brethren, it was an ordinarie thing with them to kill them, and neuer ſticke at it. For like as Geometricians would haue men graunt them certaine propoſicions which they ſuppoſe without E proofe: euen ſo was this holden for a generall rule, to kill their brethren, for the ſafetie of their eſtate. But further, to ſhewe you more plainly that Demetrius was of a noble and curteous nature, and that he dearely loued his frendes: we may alleage this example. Mithridates, the ſonne of Ariobarzanes, was his familiar frend and companion (for they were both in maner of an age) and he commonly followed Antigonus courte, and neuer practiſed any villanie or treaſon to him, neither was he thought ſuch a man: yet Antigonus did ſomewhat ſuſpect him, bicauſe of a dreame he had. He thought that being in a goodly great fielde, he ſowed of theſe ſcrapinges of gold, and that of that ſeede, firſt of all came vp goodly wheate which had eares of gold: howbeit that ſhortly after returning that way againe, he found nothing but the ſtraw, and the eares of the wheate cut of, and that he being angrie and verie ſorie for it, ſome tolde F him that Mithridates had cut of theſe golden eares of wheate, and had caried them with him into the realme of PONT. Antigonus being maruelouſly troubled with this dreame, after he had Demetrius curteſie.

Antigonus dreame.

A made his ſonne ſweare vnto him that he would make no man aliue priuy to that he would tell him: he told him all his dreame what he had dreamed, and therewith that he was determined to put this young man Mithridates to death. Demetrius was maruelous ſory for it, and therefore the next morning, this young noble Prince going as he was wont to paſſe the time away with Mithridates, he durſt not by word of mouth vtter that he knew, bicauſe of his othe: howbeit, taking him aſide from his other familiers, when they were both together by them ſelues, he wrote on the ground with the end of his dart, Mithridates loking on him: flie Mithridates. Mithridates found ſtraight what he ment, and fled the very ſame night into CAPPADOCIA, and ſhortly after it was his deſtinie to fulfill Antigonus dreame. For he conquered many goodly contries, and it was he onely that eſtabliſhed the houſe of the kingdom of PONT, the which B the ROMANES afterwardes ouerthewe, about the eight ſucceſſion. By theſe examples we may eaſily coniecture the good nature and curteſie of Demetrius. For like as the elements (according to Empedocles opinion) are euer at * ſtrife together, but ſpecially thoſe that are neareſt eache to other: euen ſo, though all the ſucceſſors of Alexander were at continuall warres together, yet was it ſooneſt kindled, and moſt cruell betwene them which bordered neareſt vnto eche other, and that by being neare neighbours, had alwaies occaſion of brawle together, as fell out at that time betwene Antigonus and Ptolomy. This Antigonus lay moſt commonly in the contry of PHRYGIA: who hauing intelligence that Ptolomy was gone into CYPRVS, and that he ouerranne all SYRIA, winning by force, or faier meanes, all the townes and cities ſubiect vnto them: he ſent his ſonne Demetrius thether, beeing at that time but two and twenty C yeares of age, and it was the firſt time that euer he tooke charge as generall to his father, in matters of great importance. But he being a young man, and that had no skill of warres, fighting a battell with an olde ſouldier (trained vp in the diſcipline of warres vnder Alexander the great, and that through him, and in his name, had fought many great battels) was ſoone ouerthrowen, and his armie put to flight, by the citie of GAZA. At which ouerthrow were ſlayne fiue thowſand men, and almoſt eight thowſand taken: and beſides, Demetrius loſt his tents & pauilions, his gold and ſiluer, and to be ſhort, all his whole cariage. But Ptolomy ſent him all his thinges againe, and his friends alſo that were taken after the battell, with great curteous wordes: that he would not fight with them for all thinges together, but onely for honor, and Empire. Demetrius receiuing them at his handes, beſought the gods that he might not long D liue a debter vnto Ptolomy for this great curteſie, but that he might quickly requite it with the like againe. Now Demetrius tooke not this ouerthrow like a young man, though it was his firſt ſouldierfare: but like an olde and wiſe Captaine, that had abidden many ouerthrowes, he vſed great diligence to gather men againe, to make new armors, and to keepe the cities & contries in his hands vnder obedience, and did traine and exerciſe his ſouldiers in armes, whonie he had gathered togither. Antigonus hauing newes of the ouerthowe of his ſonne Demetrius, ſaid no more, but that Ptolomy had ouercomen beardles men: and that afterwardes he ſhould fight with bearded men. But now, bicauſe he would not diſcorage his ſonne altogether, who craued leaue once againe to fight a battell with Ptolomy: he graunted him. So, ſhortly after came Cilles, Ptolomyes generall, with a great puyſant armie, to driue him altogether out of SY- E RIA. For they made no great accompt of Demetrius, bicauſe he had bene once ouerthrowen before. Howbeit Demetrius ſtale apon him, gaue him charge on the ſodaine, and made him ſo affraid, that he tooke both the campe, & the generall, with ſeuen thowſand priſoners beſides, and wanne a maruelous treaſure of money: which made him a glad man, not ſo much for the gaine he ſhould haue by it, as for the oportunitie he had thereby to come out of Ptolomyes det, nothing regarding the treaſure nor the honor he had gotten by this victorie, but onely the benefit of his requitall of Ptolomyes curteſie towardes him. But yet he did nothing of his owne head, before he had written to his father: and then receiuing full graunt and commiſſion from him to diſpoſe of all things as he thought good, he ſent backe Cilles vnto Ptolomy, and al his other friends beſides, with great and rich gifts which he bountifully beſtowed on them. F This misfortune and ouerthrow did vtterly put Ptolomy out of all SYRIA, and brought Antigonus alſo from the citie of CELENES, for the exceeding ioy he had of this victorie, as alſo for the great deſire he had to ſee his ſonne. After that, he ſent Demetrius into ARABIA, againſt a people called the NABATHÆIANS, to conquer them: but there he was in great daunger and distresse in the deserts for lacke of water, howbeit he neuer shewed any signe that he was afraid. Thereby he so astonied the barbarous people, that he had leysure enough to retyre with safetie, and with a great boory of a thowsand camells, which he brought away with him. About that time Seleucus, (whome Antigonus had driuen from BABYLON) returning thither againe, he came and conquered it without other ayde then of him selfe: and went with a great armie against the people and nations confining vpon the INDIANS, and the prouinces adioyning vnto mount Caucasus, to conquer them. Thereuppon Demetrius hoping to find MESOPOTAMIA without any gard or defence, sodainly passed ouer the riuer of Euphrates, & came vnlooked for vnto BABYLON, and there distressed the garrison of Seleucus, that kept one of the castells or citadells of the citie, being two of them: and then putting in seuen thowsand souldiers to keepe them, he commaunded the rest of his men to get what they could, & to bringe it away with them. After that, he marched towards the sea to returne home, leauing thereby the Realme and kingdom of Seleucus in better state and safetie, then it was when he inuaded it. For it appeared that he had taken all the contry from Seleucus, leauing him nothing in it, by spoiling and forraging all that was there. At his returne home, newes were brought him that Ptolomy lay at the seege of the citie of HALYCARNASSVS: whereuppon he drew thither with speede to make him raise the seege, and thereby saued the city from him. Now, bicause by this exployte they wanne great fame, both of them, (Antigonus and Demetrius) fell into a maruelous desire to set all GRÆCE at libertie, the which Ptolomy and Cassander kept in seruitude and bondage. Neuer king tooke in hande a more honorable nor iuster warre and enterprise, then that was. For, what power or riches he could gather together, in oppressing of the barbarous people: he bestowed it all in restoring the GRÆCIANS to their libertie, and onely to winne fame and honor by it. So, they being in consultacion what way to take, to bring their purpose and desire to passe, and hauing taken order to begin first at ATHENS: one of Antigonus chiefest friends about him, told him that he should take the citie, and place a good garrison there for them selues, if they could once winne it: for, said he, it will be a good bridge to passe further into all GRÆCE. Antigonus would not harken to that, but said, that the loue and good will of men was a surer bridge, & that the citie of ATHENS was as a beacon to all the land, the which would immediatly make his doings shine through the world, as a cresset light, vpon the toppe of a kepe or watche tower. Thus Demetrius hoysed sayle, hauing fiue thowsand siluer talents, and a fleete of two hundred and fiftie sayle, and sailed towardes the citie of ATHENS: in the which Demetrius PHALERIAN was gouernor in the behalfe of Cassander, & kept a great strong garrison there within the hauen and castell of MVNICHEA. He had an excellent good winde to further his iorney, so that with his good foresight and speede he made, he arriued in the hauen of PIRÆA, the fiue and twenty day of the moneth Thargelion, (now called Maye) before any man knew of his comming. Now when this fleete was within a kenning of the citie, and lesse, that they might easily see them from thence: euery man prepared him selfe to receiue them, taking them to be Ptolomyes shippes. But in fine, the Captaines and gouernors vnderstanding too late who they were, did what they could to helpe them selues: but they were all in hurly burly, as men compelled to fight out of order, to keepe their enemies from landing, and to repulse them, comming so sodainly vpon them. Demetrius hauing found the barre of the hauen open, launched in presently. Then being comen to the view of them all, & standing vpon the hatches of his galley, he made signes with his hand that he prayed silence. The tumult being pacified, he proclaymed alowd by one of his Heraulds, that his father had sent him in happy hower to deliuer the ATHENIANS from all their garrisons, and to restore them againe to their auncient libertie and freedom, to enioye their lawes and auncient gouernment of their forefathers. After the proclamacion made, all the common people straight threwe downe their weapons and targets at their feete, to clappe their handes with great showtes of ioy: praying him to land, and calling him alowde their Sauior, and benefactor. Now for them that were with Demetrius PHALERIAN, they all thought good to let the stronger in, although he performed not that he promised, and also sent Ambassadors vnto him to treate of peace. Demetrius receiued them very curteously, and sent with them for pledge, one of the dearest Demetrius Phalerian, gouernor of Athens for Cassander.

Demetrius restoreth the Athenians to their liberties

A friends his father had, Aristodemus Milesian. Furthermore, he was not careles of the health and safety of Demetrius Phalerian, who, by reason of the chaunge and alteracion of the gouernment of the common wealth at Athens, stoode more in feare of the people of Athens, than of his enemies. Therefore Demetrius regarding the fame and vertue of the man, caused him to be conueyed (according to his desire) vnto Thebes, with good and sufficient safe conduct. And for Demetrius him selfe, although he was very desirous to see the citie, he saide he would not come into it, before he had first restored it vnto her auncient libertie and freedom, and also driuen away the garrison thence: and thereuppon he cast trenches round about the castell of Munychia. In the meane season bicause he would not be idle, he hoysed sayle, and coasted towards the citie of Megara, within the which Cassander also kept a strong garrison.

Demetrius Antigonus, honoreth Demetrius Phalerius.

B Demetrius busily following these matters, was aduertised that Cratesipolis, surnamed Polyperchon, (who had bene Alexanders wife) a Lady of passing fame and beauty, and lay at that time in the citie of Patras, would be glad to see him: he leauing his armie within the territorie of the Megarians, tooke his iorney presently vnto her, with a few of his lightest armed men, and yet he stale from them, and made his tent to be set vp a good way from them, bicause this Ladie might not be seene when she came vnto him. Some of his enemies hauing present intelligence thereof, came and set vpon him before he knew it. Demetrius was so scared, that he had no further leysure, but to cast an ill fauored cloke about him, the first that came to hand, and disguising him selfe to flie for life, and scaped very hardly, that he was not shamefully taken of his enemies for his incontinencie. But though they missed him, they tooke his tent, and

C all his money in it. After that, the citie of Megara was taken and won from Cassanders men, where Demetrius souldiers would haue sacked all: howbeit the Athenians made humble intercession for them, that they might not be spoyled. Demetrius thereuppon, after he had driuen out Cassanders garrison, he restored it againe to her former libertie. In doing that, he called to mind the Philosopher Stilpo, a famous man in Megara, though he liued a quiet and contemplatiue life. He sent for him, and asked him if any of his men had taken any thing of his. Stilpo aunswered him, they had not: For, q he, I sawe no man that tooke my learning from me. This notwithstanding, all the slaues of the citie were in manner caried away. Another time, Demetrius making much of him, as he was going his way saide vnto him: well, Stilpo, I leaue you your citie free. It is true, O king, q he, for thou hast left vs neuer a slaue. Shortly af-

Stilpoes sayings vnto Demetrius.

D ter, he returned againe vnto Athens, and layde seege to the castell of Munichia, the which he tooke, and draue out the garrison, & afterwards rased it to the ground. After that, through the intreatie and earnest desire of the Athenians, who prayed him to come and refresh him selfe in their citie: he made his entry into it, and caused all the people to assemble, and then restored vnto them their auncient lawes and libertie of their contry, promising them besides, that he would procure his father to sende them a hundred and fiftye thowsand busshells of wheate, and as much woode and tymber as should serue to make them a hundred and fiftie gallies. Thus, the Athenians through Demetrius meanes, recouered the Democratia again, (to wit, their populer gouernment) fifteene yeares after they had lost it, and liued all the time betwene their losse and restitucion from the warre called Lamiacus warre, and the battell that Democratia populer gouernment.

E was fought by the citie of Cranon, in the state of Oligarchia, to wit, vnder the gouernment of a fewe gouernors in sight, but in truth a Monarchie or kingdome, bicause they were vnder the gouernment of one man Demetrius Phalerian, that had absolute authoritie ouer them. But by this meanes they made their sauior and preseruer of their contry, Demetrius (who seemed to haue obteined such honor and glory through his goodnes and liberalitie) hateful and odious to all men, for the ouergreat and vnmeasurable honors which they gaue him. For first of all, they called Antigonus and Demetrius kings, who before that time had alwayes refused the name, and the which, (among all other princely honors and prerogatiues graunted) they that had deuided betwene them the Empire of Philip and Alexander, durst neuer once presume to chalenge, nor to take vppon them. So vnto them only they gaue the style and names

Too much honors decreed to Demetrius by the Athenians.

F of the goddes sauiors, and tooke away their yearely Maior, whome they called Eponymos, bicause they did shew the yeares of olde time, by the names of them that had bene Maiors. Furthermore, in stead thereof they ordeyned in the counsell of the citie, that there should yearely be choſen one by voyces of the people, whom they ſhould name the Prieſt of their Sauiors, whoſe name they ſhould write and ſubſcribe in all publike graunts and couenants, to ſhewe the yeare: and beſides all this, that they ſhould cauſe their pictures to be drawen in the veyle or holy banner, in the which were ſet out the images of their goddes, the patrones and protectors of their citie. And furthermore they did conſecrate the place, where Demetrius firſt came out of his coche, and there did ſet vp an aulter, and called it Demetrius aulter comming out of his coche: and vnto their tribes they added two other, the ANTIGONIDES and the DEMETRIADES. Their great counſell at large which they created yearely of fiue hundred men, was then firſt of all brought into ſixe hundred, bicauſe euery tribe muſt needes furniſhe of them ſelues, fifty counſellers. But yet the ſtraungeſt acte, and moſt new found inuention of flattery, was that of Stratocles, (being the common flatterer and people pleaſer) who put forth this decree, by the which it was ordeined: that thoſe whome the common wealth ſhould ſend vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, ſhould in ſtead of Ambaſſadors be called Theori, as much to ſay, as miniſters of the ſacrifices. For ſo were they called, whome they ſent to DELPHES to Apollo Pytheas, or vnto ELIDE, to Iupiter Olympias, at the common and ſolemne feaſts of all GRÆCE, to doe the ordinary ſacrifices and oblations for the health and preſeruation of the cities. This Stratocles in all things els was a deſperate man, and one that had alwayes led a wicked and diſſolute life: & for his ſhameles boldnes, he ſeemed wholy to follow the ſteppes of Cleons foole hardines, and olde inſolencie, which (when he liued) he ſhewed vnto the people. He openly kept a harlot in his houſe called Phylacion. One day ſhe hauing bought for his ſupper, beaſtes heades and neckes commonly eaten, he ſayd vnto her: why, how now? thou haſt bought me acates which we toſſe like balls, that haue to doe in the common wealth. Another time when the armie of the ATHENIANS was ouerthrowen by ſea, by the Ile of AMORGOS: he would needes preuent the newes of this ouerthrowe, and came through the ſtreete of Ceranicus, crowned with garlands of flowers, as if the ATHENIANS had wonne the battell: and was alſo the author of a decree, whereby they did ſacrifice vnto the goddes, to giue them thankes for the victorie: and meate was giuen amongeſt euery tribe, in token of common ioy. But ſhortly after the Meſſengers arriued, which brought report of the ſhipwracke and ouerthrowe. The people were in an vprore withal, and ſent for Stratocles in a maruelous rage. But he with a face of braſſe came vnto them, and arrogantly defended the peoples ill will, and angrily told them: well, and what hurt haue I done you, if I haue made you mery theſe two dayes? Such was Stratocles impudencie and raſhnes. But, as the Poet Ariſtophanes ſayth:

The boldnes of Stratocles Athenian.

Stratocles cruell ſaying.

But vvhotter matters vvere that time in hand, Than fire that vvaſteth both by ſea and land.

For there was another that paſſed Stratocles in knauerie. Who procured a decree, that as often as Demetrius came into the citie of ATHENS, he ſhould be receiued with all ceremonies and like ſolemnitie, as they vſe in the feaſts of Ceres and Bacchus: and further that they ſhould giue vnto him that did excell all the reſt in ſumptuouſnes and riches, at ſuch time as Demetrius made his entry into the citie, ſo much money out of the common treaſure, as ſhould ſerue to make an image or other offring, which ſhould be conſecrated to the temples in memorie of his liberalitie. And laſt of all, they chaunged the name of the moneth Munichion (to wit the moneth of Ianuary) and called it Demetrion: and the laſt day of the moneth which they called before the new and old moone, they then called it the Demetriade: and the feaſtes of Bacchus alſo called then Dionyſia, they preſently named Demetria. But the goddes by diuers ſignes and tokens ſhewed plainly, that they were offended with theſe chaunges and alteracions. For the holy banner in the which (according to the order ſet downe) they had paynted the images of Antigonus, and Demetrius, with the pictures of Iupiter and Minerua: as they caried it a proceſſion through the ſtreete Ceranicus, it was torne a ſonder in the middeſt by a tempeſt of winde. And furthermore, about the aulters which were ſet vp in the honor of Demetrius and Antigonus, there grew a great deale of hemlocke, the which otherwiſe was vnpoſſible to growe there. On the feaſt day alſo of Bacchus, they were compelled to leaue the pompe or proceſſion for that daye, it was ſuch an extreame hard froſt out of all ſeaſon: and beſides, there fell ſuch a myll dewe and great froſt vpon it, that not onely their vines and oliues were killed filled with it, but also the most part of the wheate blades which were newly sprong vp. And therefore the Poet Philippides (an enemie of the aforesayd Stratocles) in one of his comedies writeth certaine verses against him to this effect.

The parrie for whose wickednes the veyle was rent in twayne, VVhich with the honor due to God did worship men most vayne.
Is he for whom our budding vines were blasted with the frost.
Those thinges and not our enemies haue vs so deerly cost.

This Philippides was very well beloued of king Lysimachus, insomuch that for his sake the king had done many pleasures to the common wealth of Athens. For he loued him so dearly, that as often as he saw him, or met with him at the beginning of any warre, or matter of great importance: he was of opinion that he brought him good lucke. For in deed he did not so much esteeme him for the excellencie of his arte, but he was much more to be beloued & esteemed, for his vertuous and honest condictions. He was no troublesom man, neither was he infected with the fineneſſe of court, as he shewed one day when the king made much of him, and giuing him good countenance said vnto him: what wilt thou haue me giue thee of my things Philippides? euen what it shall please thee, O king, so it be none of thy secrets. Thus much we thought good to speake of him in by talke, bicause an honest player of comedies should matche with a shameles and impudent Orator of the people. But yet there was another Democlides, of the village of Sphettus, that dreamed out a more straunger kind of honor, touching the consecration of their targets, which they dedicated to the temple of Apollo in Delphes, that is to say, that they should goe & aske the oracle of Demetrius. And I will shew you the very effect and forme of the law as it was set downe. In good howers the people ordeyle that he should be chosen one of the Citizens of Athens, which shall goe vnto our Sauior: and after that he hath done due sacrifice vnto him, he shal aske Demetrius our Sauior, after what sort the people shall with greatest holines and deuotion, without delay, make consecration of their holiest gifts and offerings: and according to the oracle it shall please him to giue them, the people shal duely execute it. Thus, laying vpon Demetrius al these foolish mockeries, who besides was no great wise man, they made him a very foole. Demetrius being at that time at leisure in Athens, he married a widow called Eurydice, which came of that noble and auncient house of Miltiades, and had bene married before vnto one Opheltas Prince of the Cyrenians, and that after his death returned againe to Athens. The Athenians were very glad of this marriage, and thought it the greatest honor that came to their citie, supposing he had done it for their sakes. Howbeit he was soone wonne to be married, for he had many wiues, but amongest them all, he loued Phila best, and gaue her most honor and preheminence aboue them all: partly for the respect of her father Antipater, and partly also for that she had bene first maried vnto Craterus, whome the Macedonians loued best when he liued, and most lamented after his death, aboue all the other successors of Alexander. His father I suppose made him to marry her by force, although in deede her yeares was not meete for him: for he was maruelous young, and she very olde. And when Demetrius seemed not to be contented withall, his father rowned him softly in the eare with this saying:

Refuze no vvoman neuer so old, VVhose mariage bringeth store of gold.

Wherein he alluded cunningly to these verses of Euripides.

Refuze not to become a thrall, VVhere lucre may inserue withall.

But so much did Demetrius honor his wife Phila, and all his other wiues he married, that he was not ashamed to keepe a number of Curtisans, and other mens wiues besides: so that he onely of all other kings in his time, was most detected with this vice of lecherie. While these things passed on in this sort, he was commaunded by his father, to fight with Ptolomy for the Realme of Cyprus. So there was no remedie but he must needes obey him, although otherwise he was very sory to leaue the warre he had begonne, to set the Grecians at libertie, the which had bene farre more honorable and famous. Howbeit, before he departed from Athens, he sent vnto Cleonides Ptolomyes generall, that kept the cities of Corinth and Sicy-one, to offer him money if he would sette those cities at libertie. But Cleonides would not deale withall that way. Thereuppon Demetrius straight way tooke sea, and sayled with all his armie towards Cyprvs, where at his first comming he ouercame Menelaus Ptolomyes brother. But shortly after, Ptolomy went thither in person with a great armie both by sea and land, and there passed betwixt them fierce threatnings and prowde words to eche other. For Ptolomy sent to Demetrius to bid him to depart if he were wise, before all his armie came together: which would tread him vnder their feete, and marche vpon his bellie, if he taried their comming. Demetrius on the other side sent him word, that he would doe him this fauor to let him escape, if he would sweare and promise vnto him to withdrawe his garisons which he had in the cities of Corinthe, and Sycione. So the expectacion of this battell made these two Princes not onely very pensiue to fight one with the other, but also all the other Lords, Princes, and kings: bicause the successe thereof was vncertaine, which of them two should prevaile. But euery man iudged this, that which of them obteyned the victorie, he should not only be Lord of the Realme of Cyprvs and Syria, but therewith also of greater power then all the rest. Ptolomy in person with fiftie sayle beganne to rowe against his enemie Demetrius, and commaunded his brother Menelaus that when he sawe them fast grappled in fight together, he should launche out of the hauen of Salamina, and giue charge vpon the rereward of Demetrius shippes, to breake their order, with the three score gallies he had in charge. Demetrius on the other side prepared tenne gallies against these three score, thinking them enowe to choke vp the hauen mouth being but narrowe, so that none of the gallies that were within could come out: and furthermore, he disperfed his armie by land vpon the foreland poynt which reacheth into the sea, and went him selfe into the maine sea with nyne score gallies, and gaue such a fierce charge vpon Ptolomy, that he valiantly made him flie. Who when he sawe his armie broken, fled as speedily as he could with eight gallies onely: for all the rest were either broken or suncke in fight, and those eight onely escaped, besides three score and tenne which were taken, and all their souldiers in them. And as for his cariage, his traine, his friends, his officers, and houshold seruaunts, his wiues, his gold and siluer, his armor, engines of batterie, and all such other warlike furniture and munition as was conueyed abourd his carects and great shippes riding at anker: of all these things nothing escaped Demetrius hands, but all was brought into his campe. Among those spoyles also was taken that famous Curtisan Lamia, who at the first had her name onely, for her passing playing vpon the flute: but after she fell to Curtisan trade, her countenance and credit increased the more. So that euen then when her beautie through yeares fell to decaye, and that she found Demetrius much younger then her selfe: yet she so wanne him with her sweete conuersation and good grace, that he onely liked her, and all the other women liked him. After this victorie by sea, Menelaus made no more resistance, but yeelded vp Salamina & his shippes vnto Demetrius, and put into his handes also twelue hundred horsemen, and twelue thowsand footemen well armed. This so famous & triumphant victorie was yet much more beautified, by Demetrius great bountie and goodnes which he shewed in giuing his enemies slaine in battell honorable funeralls, setting the prisoners at liberty without ransom paying, and giuing moreouer twelue hundred complet armors vnto the Athenians. After this, Demetrius sent Aristodemus Milesian vnto his father Antigonus, to tell him by word of mouth the newes of this victorie. Aristodemus was the greatest flatterer in all Antigonus Court, who deuised then, as it seemeth to me, to adde vnto this exployte the greatest flatterie possible. For when he had taken land after he was come out of the Ile of Cyprvs, he would in no wise haue the shippe he came in to come neare the shoare, but commaunded them to ride at anker, and no man so hardy to leaue the shippe: but he him selfe got into a litle boate, and went vnto Antigonus, who all this while was in maruelous feare and perplexitie for the successe of this battell, as men may easily iudge they are, which hope after so great incertainties. Now when worde was brought him that Aristodemus was comming to him all alone, then was he worse troubled than afore, insomuch that he could scant keepe within dores him selfe, but sent his seruaunts and friends one after another to meete Aristodemus, to aske him what newes, and to bring him worde presently againe how the world went. But not one of them could get any thing out of him, for he went on still fayer and softly with

Wherefore Antigonus hart being cold in his belly, he could ſtay no lenger, but would him ſelfe goe and meete with Ariſtodemus at the gate, who had a maruelous preaſſe of people following on him, beſides thoſe of the Court which ranne out to heare his aunſwer. At length when he came neare vnto Antigonus, holding out his right hand vnto him, he cryed out alowd, God ſaue thee, O king Antigonus: we haue ouercome king Ptolomy in battell by ſea, and haue wonne the Realme of CYPRVS, with ſixteene thowſand and eyght hundred priſoners. Then aunſwered Antigonus, and God ſaue thee to: Truely Ariſtodemus thou haſt kept vs in a trawnſe a good while, but to puniſhe thee for the payne thou haſt put vs to, thou ſhalt the later receiue the reward of thy good newes. Then was the firſt time that the people with a lowde voice called Antigonus and B Demetrius kings. Now for Antigonus, his friendes and familliers did at that preſent inſtant put on the royall band or diadeame vppon his heade: But for Demetrius, his father ſent it vnto him, and by his letters called him king. They alſo that were in ÆGYPT with Ptolomy, vnderſtanding that, did alſo call and ſalute him by the name of king: bicauſe it ſhoulde not ſeeme that for one ouerthrowe receiued, their hartes were deade. Thus this ambition by ielouſie & emulation, went from man to man to all Alexanders ſucceſſours. For Lyſimachus then alſo beganne to weare the diadeame, and likewiſe Seleucus, as often as he ſpake with the GRÆCIANS: for before that tyme, he delt in matters with the barbarous people as a king. But Caſſander, though others wrote them ſelues kinges, he onely ſubſcribed after his wonted manner. Now this was not onely an increaſe of a newe name, or chaunging of apparell, but it was ſuch an C honor, as it lyft vp their hartes, and made them ſtand vpon them ſelues: and beſides it ſo framed their manner of life and conuerſation with men, that they grewe more prowd and ſtately, then euer they were before: like vnto common players of tragedies, who apparelling them ſelues to playe their partes vpon the ſtage, doe chaunge their gate, their countenaunce, their voyce, their manner of ſitting at the table, and their talke alſo. So that afterwards they grew more cruell in commaunding their ſubiects, when they had once taken away the viſer and diſſimulation of their abſolute power, which before made them farre more lowly and gentle in many matters vnto them. And all this came through one vile flatterer, that brought ſuch a wonderfull chaunge in the worlde. Antigonus therefore puffed vp with the glory of the victorie of his ſonne Demetrius, for the conqueſt of CYPRVS: he determined forthwith to ſet D vpon Ptolomy. Him ſelfe led the armie by land, hauing his ſonne Demetrius ſtill rowing by the ſhore ſide with a great fleete of ſhippes. But one of his familliers called Medius, being aſleepe had a viſion one night that told him, what ſhould be the ende and ſucceſſe of this iorney. He thought he ſawe Antigonus ronne with all his armie who ſhould haue the vpper hande, and that at the firſt he ranne with great force and ſwiftnes: but that afterwardes his ſtrength and breath fayled him ſo much, that when he ſhould returne, he had ſcant any pouſe or breath, and with much adoe retyred agayne. And euen ſo it chaunced vnto him. For Antigonus by land, was eftſoones in great daunger: and Demetrius alſo by ſea was often in hazard to leaue the coaſt, and by ſtorme and weather to be caſt into places, where was nether hauen, creekes, nor harbarough for his ſhippes. And at length, hauing loſt a great number of his ſhippes, E he was driuen to returne without any attempt giuen. Nowe Antigonus was at that tyme litle leſſe then foure ſcore yeare olde, but yet his fatte and corpulent bodie was more comberſom to him then his yeares: therefore beeing growen vnmeete for warres, he vſed his ſonne in his place. Who for that he was fortunate, as alſo skilfull through the experience he had gotten, did wiſely gouerne the waightieſt matters. His father beſides did not paſſe for his youthfull partes, lauiſhe expences, and common dronkennes he gaue him ſelfe vnto. For in tyme of peace, he was giuen ouer to all thoſe vices: but in tyme of warre, he was as ſober and continent, as any man ſo borne by nature. And therefore it is reported, that Lamia beeing manifeſtly knowen to be Myſtreſſe ouer him, one daye when he was come from hunting, he came (as his manner was) to kiſſe his father: and that Antigonus ſmyling vpon him chamber, that he could not come to him. So I heard sayde Antigonus but was it of Thasos or Chios, that rewme? he spake it, bicause that in either of those two Ilands, there were excellent good wines. Another tyme Demetrius sent his father worde that he was not well. Thereuppon Antigonus went to see him, and comming thither, he mette a fayer younge boye at his doore. So he went vppe to his chamber, and sitting downe by his bedde side, he tooke him by the hande to feele his poulse. Demetrius tolde him that his feuer had left him but a litle before. I knowe it well, sayde Antigonus: for I mette the younge boye euen at the doore as I came in. So Antigonus did gently beare with his sonnes faultes, in respecte of his many other vertues he had. The voyce goeth that the Scythians, when they are disposed to drinke dronke together, doe diuers tymes twange the strynges of their bowes, as though that woulde serue to keepe the strength of their courage and hardines: which otherwise the pleasauntnes of the wine woulde take from them. But Demetrius gaue him selfe to one thinge at one selfe tyme. Sometyme to take his pleasure, sometyme to deale in matters of waight, and in all extreamitie he euer vsed but one of them, and woulde neuer myngle the one with the other: and yet this notwithstanding he was no lesse politike and circumspect to prepare all manner of munition for warres. For as he was a wise Captaine to leade an armie, so was he also very carefull to prouide all thinges meete for their furniture, and woulde rather haue too muche, then too litle. But aboue all, he exceeded in sumptuous building of shippes, and framing of all sortes of engines of batterie, and specially for the delight he tooke to inuent and deuise them. For he had an excellent naturall witte to deuise suche workes, as are made by witte and hande, and did not bestowe his witte and inuention in handie craftes, in trifeling toyes and bables: as many other kinges that haue giuen them selues to playe on flutes, others to paynte and drawe, and others also to Turners crafte. As AEropus kinge of Macedon, who delighted to make fine tables, and pretye lampes. And Attalus, surnamed Philometor (to saye, as louer of his mother) that woulde plante and sette Phisicall herbes, as Helleborum, Lingewort, or Beares foote: Hyoscynamum, Henbane, Cicuta, Hemlocke, Aconitum, Libardbaine or Woolfebaine, and Dorycinum: for the which we haue no Englishe worde: all these would he set him selfe with his owne handes in the gardeins of his pallaice, and also gather them in tyme of the yeare, to knowe the vertue and power of them. As Arsaces, the kinges of Parthia, that boasted they coulde them selues make their arrowe heades, and sharpen them. But the artificers workes which Demetrius practised, shewed that they came from a king. For his manner of workemanshippe had a certen greatnes in it, the which euen with the sutteltie and finenes of his workes, shewed the trymme handeling of the workeman: So that they appeared not onely worthye the vnderstanding and riches of a king, but also the forging and making by the handes of a great king. For his friendes did not onely wonder at their greatnes, but his very enemies also were delighted with the beautie of them. And this is more true, then meete to be spoken: the enemies could but maruell when they sawe his gallies rowing alongest the coaste, with fifteene or sixteene bankes of ores: and his engines of batterie which they called Elepolis (to saye, engines to take cities) were a spectacle of great admiration vnto those whome he beseeged, as the euents following did throughly witnesse. For Lysimachus who of all other kings did malice Demetrius most, comming to raise the seege from the citie of Soli in Cilicia, the which Demetrius beseeged: he sent vnto him to pray him to let him see his engines of batterie, and his gallies rowing vppon the sea. Demetrius graunting him, Lysimachus returned with wonderfull admiration. The Rhodians also hauing long time defended his seege, at the last made peace with him, and prayed him to leaue some one of his engines with them, for a perpetuall testimonie & remembrance both of his power, and also of their corage and valliantnes. The cause why Demetrius made warre with the Rhodians, was, bicause they were confederats with king Ptolomy, he brought against their walles the greatest engine he had, the foote whereof was like a tyle, more long then broade, and at the base on either side it was eyght and fortie cubits longe, and three score and sixe highe, rising still narrow euen to the very top: so that the ypper partes were narrower then the nether, & within it were many prety roomes and places conueied for souldiers. The forepart of it was open

A open towards the enemie, & euery roome or partition had windowes, out of the which they bestowed all kind of shot, bicause they were full of armed men, fighting with all sortes of weapons. But nowe, bicause it was so well framed and counterpeased, that it gaue no way, nor reeld of either side, which way sooner they remoued it, but that it stoode fast and vpright vpon her foundacion, making a terrible noyse and sownde: that made the worke as wonderfull to behold, as it was a maruelous pleasure for men to see it. In this warre were brought vnto Demetrius two notable armors weying fortie pownd a peece, and made by one Zoilus an armorer: who to shewe the hardnes and goodnes of the temper, suffered them to be proued and shot at at six score paces, with the engines of their batterie: and albeit the armors were shot at, and hit, yet were they neuer pearsed, and but onely a litle race or skreech seene, as it were of a bodkin or penknife, and had no more hurte. Demetrius alwayes ware one of them in these warres, and Alcimus Albanian the other, the strongest and valliantest man he had in all his hoast, and that onely caried a complete armour weying sixe score pownde, where all other souldiers ware none aboue three score. This Alcimus was slayne at Rhodes valliantly fighting by the Theater. In this seege the Rhodians did valliantly defende them selues, that Demetrius could doe no acte worthy memorie. This notwithstanding, although he saw he could not preuaile, but lose his tyme, yet was he the more obstinately bent against them, to be euen with them: bicause they had taken a shippe of his, in the which his wife Phila had sent vnto him certaine hangings of tapestrie, linnen, apparell, and letters, and bicause they had sent them all vnto Ptolomy, assoone as they had taken them. But therein they did not follow the honest curtesie of the Athenians: who hauing intercepted certaine letters of king Philips that made warre against them, they opened all the letters they caried, and red them, sauing onely his wife Olympias letters she sent him, the which they sent vnto king Philip sealed, as they were when they receiued them. Nowe though this part did inuerh grene and offend him, yet he could not finde in his hart to serue them in that sorte, when he might haue done it not longe after. For by chaunce at that tyme, Protogenes an excellent paynter, borne in the city of Cavnvs, did paynt them the draught of the citie of Ialysvs. Demetrius found this table in a house in the suburbes of the citie, being almost ended. The Rhodians thereupon sending a Herauld vnto him, to beseeche him to spare the defacing of so good a worke, he returned them aunswer, that he would rather suffer his fathers images to be burnt, then so excellent and passing a worke as that to be lost, and brought to nothing. For it is reported, that Protogenes was seuen yeares drawing of the same: and it is also sayde, that Apelles himselfe when he sawe it did so wonder at it, that his speeche sayled him, and he stoode mute a longe tyme, and at last sayde: surely there is a wonderfull peece of worke, and of great labor, yet they want those graces and ornaments whereby those that I paynt doe reache vnto heauen. This table afterwardes being brought to Rome, and hanged vp with others, was in the ende burnt by fire. Nowe as the Rhodians were desirous to be rid of this warre, and that Demetrius also was willing to take any honest occasion to doe in the Ambassadors of the Athenians came happely to serue both their desires, who made peace betweene them with these condicions. That the Rhodians shoulde be confederats with Antigonus and Demetrius, against all men, but Ptolomy onely. The Athenians sent for Demetrius, vpon Cassanders coming to laye seege to their citie. Whereuppon Demetrius immediatly hoysed sayle towards Athens, with three hundred and thirty gallies, and a great number of men of warre besides: so that he did not only driue Cassander out of the prouince of Attica, but followed him euen to the straight of Thermopyles, and there ouerthrew him in set battell, and recouered the citie of Heraclea, which willingly yelded vnto him, and sixe thowsand Macedonians that came vnto him to take his part. So in his returne backe, he set all the Grecians at liberte on this side the straight: he made league with the Boeotians, and tooke the citie of Cenchreis, and the castells of Phyle and Panactos, in the frontiers and confines of Attica, in the which Cassander had left garrisons to keepe the contry in subiection: and after he had driuen them out of the contry, he rendred the forts againe vnto the Athenians. Therefore though it seemed the Athenians had before bestowed to their vttermost power all kinds of honors that could be offered him, euery man striuing for life to preferre the same: yet they found out new deuises to flatter and please him. For they ordeyned that the place behind the temple of Minerua, called Parthenon (as who would say, the temple of the virgin) should be prepared for his house to lye in: and they sayd, that the goddesse Minerua did lodge him with her. But to say truely, he was too vnchast a ghest, to thinke that a mayden goddesse would be content he shoulde lye with her. And yet his father Antigonus perceiuing that they had lodged his sonne Philip on a time in a house, where there were three younge women, he sayde nothing to Philip him selfe, but before him he sent for the harbinger, and sayde vnto him: wilt thou not remoue my sonne out of this straight lodging, & prouide him of a better? And Demetrius, that should haue reuerenced the goddesse Minerua, though for no other respect, but bicause he called her his eldest sister, (for so he woulde she shoulde be called) he defiled all the castell where was the temple of these holy virgines, with horrible and abominable insolencies, both towards younge boyes of honest houses, as also vnto younge women of the citie. So that this place seemed to be most pure and holy, at such time as he laye with his common Curtisans; Chryses, Lamia, Demo, and Anteera. It shall not be greatly for the honor of the citie of Athens to tell particularly all the abhominable partes he committed there, But Democles vertue and honestie deserueth worthye and condigne remembrance. This Democles was a younge boye that had no heare on his face, of whose beautie Demetrius being informed by the surname he had, as commonly called through the citie, Democles the fayer: he sought diuers waies to intise him, both by fayer meanes, large promisses and giftes, and also with threates besides. But when he saw no man could bringe him to the bent of his bowe, and that the younge boye in the ende seeing him so importunate vpon him, came no more to the common places of exercise where other children vsed to recreate them selues, and that to auoide the common stooues, he went to wash him selfe in another secret stooue: Demetrius watching his time and hower of going thither, followed him, and got in to him being alone. The boy seing him selfe alone & that he could not resist Demetrius, tooke of the couer of the ketle or chawdron where the water was boyling, and leaping into it, drowned him selfe. Truely he was vnworthy of so lamentable an ende, but yet he shewed a noble hart, worthy of his beautie and contry. But he did not as another called Cleanetus, the sonne of Cleomedon, who brought letters from Demetrius directed to the people, whereby, through Demetrius intercession & request, his fathers fine of fifty talents in the which he was condemned (and for nonpayment remained prisoner) was clerely remitted and forgiuen. But by this acte, he not onely shamed and dishonored him self, but also troubled all the citie. For the people thereuppon released Cleomedon of his fine, but therewith they made a decree that no Citizen should thenceforth bring any moe letters from Demetrius. But afterwards, vnderstanding that Demetrius was maruelously offended with this decree; they did not onely reuoke their first decree, but they did also put some of them to death, which were the procurers and authors of the decree, and others also they banished. And further they made a lawe, that the people of Athens should account all religious to the gods, and iust vnto men, whatsoeuer it pleased Demetrius to order and appoynt. At that time there was one of the chiefest men of the citie, that saide Stratocles was a mad man to preferre such matters. In deede, o Demochares surnamed Laconian, he were a mad man if he were otherwise: and he spake it, bicause this Stratocles had many great pleasures at Demetrius hands for this flatterie. Howbeit Demochares being accused and condemned vpon these wordes, he was banished Athens. See after what sorte the Athenians vsed them selues, who seemed to be deliuered from the garrison they had before, and to be restored vnto their former libertie and freedom. From thence Demetrius went into Peloponnesvs, and neuer an enemie of his durst tary his comming, but all fled before him, and left him their castels & townes. Thus Demetrius wan vnto him selfe all the contry called Acte, and all Archadia, saiuing the citie of Mantinea: & for the summe of an hundred talents giuen amongest them, he deliuered the cities of Argos, Sicyone, and of Corinthe, from the garrisons that laye amongest them. About that tyme fell out the great feast of Iuno in Argos, called Heræa. Therefore Demetrius, to honor this feaste with the Græcians, married Deidamia (the Daughter of Æacides, king of the Molossians, and sister of Pyrrhus) and perswaded the Sicyonians to leaue their citie, and to come and builde in an other goodly place neare vnto it, where

A where they now doe dwell: and ſo with the place and ſituacion, he chaunged alſo the name of the citie. For in ſteade of SICYONE, he made it to be called DEMETRIADE. Then at a generall aſſembly of the ſtates of GRÆCE, which was kept in the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, called ISTHMOS: Demetrius was choſen Lieuetenant generall of all the GRÆCIANS, as Philip & Alexander, (both kings of MACEDON) had bene before him, vnto whom he did not only compare him ſelfe, but thought him ſelfe greater than they, bicauſe fortune ſmiled on him, and for that he had ſo good ſucceſſe in all his affayres. Whereas Alexander did neuer take away the title and name of king, from any other kings: nether did euer call him ſelfe king of kings, although he had giuen vnto diuers of them the name and power of a king. And in contrary manner alſo, Demetrius laughed them to ſcorne which called any other Princes, kings, but his

All the kings, but Lyſimachus, laughed at theſe toyes when they were reported to them: but Lyſimachus was very angry, & thought great skorne that Demetrius ſhould reckon him a gelding, for that it was an old cuſtom commõly to giue an Euenuke the charge of keeping the treaſure. So Lyſimachus of all other Princes did beare him moſt malice, and bicauſe he would finely tawnt him for that he euer kept Lamia his Curtiſan with him: vntil this preſent time, ſaid he, I neuer ſaw harlot play in a tragedy before. Demetrius aunſwered him againe, that his harlot was chaſter, then Penelope his wife. So Demetrius departing for that

C time out of PELOPONNESVS, tooke his iorney towards ATHENS, and wrote before to the ATHENIANS, that when he came thither he would be receiued into the fraternitie of the holy myſteries, and that he ment they ſhould ſhew him at one ſelfe time, all that was to be ſeene, euen from the leaſt to the higheſt ſecrets of their ceremonies, called Epoptices, bicauſe they made the brethren of the fraternitie ſee them long time after that they had bene firſt receiued into the leſſer ceremonies: the which was not lawfull then, neither was euer heard of before. For theſe ſmaller miſteries in olde time were celebrated in the month of Nouember, and the greater in the month of Auguſt: & beſide it was not lawfull to celebrate or vſe theſe ceremonies within the ſpace of a yeare one of thother. When theſe letters were openly red, no man durſt ſpeake againſt them, but Pythodorus the Prieſt, who caried the torche lighted when they

D ſhewed theſe miſteries. Howbeit his words preuailed not, for by the deuiſe of Stratocles it was enacted at an aſſembly of the citie, that the month of March in the which they were at that time, ſhould be called and reputed Nouember. And ſo, as they could beſt helpe it by their ordinaunces of the citie, they did receiue Demetrius into the fraternitie of the miſteries: & afterwards againe, this ſelfe month of March which they had tranſlated into Nouember, became ſodainly Auguſt: and in the ſelf ſame yeare was celebrated the other ceremonie of theſe great miſteries, whereby Demetrius was admitted to ſee the moſt ſtraighteſt and ſecreteſt ceremonies. Therefore Philippides the Poet inueying againſt the ſacriledge, and impietie of religion prophaned by Stratocles, made theſe verſes of him:

Philippides verſes againſt Stratocles the boaſter.

Into one mooneth his comming hither E Hath thruſt vp all the yeare togither.

And afterwards bicauſe Stratocles was the procurer that Demetrius was lodged in the temple of Minerua within the caſtell:

Of chaſte Mineruaze holy Church he makes a filthie ſtewues,
And in that Virgins very ſight his harlots doth abuſe.

But yet of all the inſolent parts done at that time in ATHENS, (although many were committed) none of all the reſt greued the ATHENIANS more, then this did: that Demetrius commaunded them they ſhould preſently furniſh him with two hundred & fifty talents. The taxation of this payment was very harde vnto them, both for the ſhortnes of the time appoynted them, as alſo for the impoſſibilitie of abating any part of it. When he had ſeene all this maſſe Demetrius prodigall gift of 250. talents to his Curtiſans to buy them ſope.

F of money laid on a heape before him, he commaunded it ſhould be giuen to Lamia, & among his other Curtiſans, to buy them ſope. The ſhame the ATHENIANS receiued by this gift, greued them more, than the loſſe of their money: & the words he ſpake to the great contempt of them and their citie, did more trouble them, then the payment they made. Some say notwithstanding, that Demetrius did not alone vse the ATHENIANS thus shamefully, but the THESSALIANS also in the same manner. But passing this ouer: Lamia of her selfe, & through her owne countenance, did get a great summe of money together of diuers persons for one supper she made vnto Demetrius, the preparation whereof was of such exceeding charge, that Lyceus borne in the Ile of SAMOS, did set downe the order thereof in writing. And therefore a certain Poet no lesse pleasantly, then truely, called this Lamia, Elepolis: to wete, an engine to take cities. And Democharcs also borne in the citie of SOLI, called Demetrius a fable, bicause he had Lamia euer with him: as in the fables which olde women tell litle children, there is euer lightly a Lamia, as much to say, as a witche, or sorceresse. So that the great credit & authoritie this Lamia had, and the loue which Demetrius bare her: did not onely cause his wiues suspect and enuy him, but made him hated also of all his friends & familliers. And therfore certen gentlemē whom Demetrius sent in ambassade vnto king Lysimachus, he talking familliarly with them, & passing the time away, shewed them great wounds of the clawes of a lyon vpon his armes and legges, telling them also how he was forced to fight with the lyon, when through king Alexanders fury he was shut vp in his denne with him: they smiling to heare him, told him that the king their maister had also certeine markes and bytings on his necke, of a vile beast called Lamia. And to say truely, it was a wonderfull thing, that marrying (as he did) his wife Phila so much against his will, bicause she was too olde for him: how he was so rauished with Lamia, and did so constantly loue her so long together, considering that she was also very old, & past the best. Therefore Demo, surnamed Mania, (as much to say, the mad woman) pleasantly answered Demetrius, asking her one night when Lamia had plaied on the flute all supper time, what she thought of Lamia? an old woman, O king, q. she. Another time when frute was serued in, after the bord was taken vp: doe you see said Demetrius, how many prety fine knackes Lamia sendeth me? My mother, aunswered Demo againe, will send you moe then these, if you please to lye with her. It is reported of this Lamia, that she ouerthrew Bocchoris iudgement in a matter. In ÆGYPT there was a young man that had a maruelous fancie vnto a famous Curtisan, called Thonis: who did aske him suche a great summe of money to lye with her, that it was vnpossible for him to giue it her. At length, this amorous youth beeing so deepe in loue with her, dreamed one night he laye with her, and enioyed her: so that for the pleasure he tooke by his conceyt and imagination, when he awaked, his earnest loue was satisfied. This Curtisan whome he had cast fancie to, hearing of his dreame, did put him in sute before the Iudges, to be payed her hyer for the pleasure the younge man had taken of her by imagination. Bocchoris hearing the summe of her complaynt, commaunded the younge man to bringe before him in some vessell, at a daye appoynted, as muche money as she did aske him to lye with her. Then he badde him tosse it too and froe in his hande before the Curtisan, that she shoulde but onely haue the shadowe and sight of it: for, q. he, imagination and opinion, is but a shadowe of truth. Lamia sayde this was no equall iudgement: for, sayth she, the shadowe onely, or the sight of the money, did not satisfie the couetousnes of the Curtisan, as the younge mans lust was quenched by his dreame. Thus enough spoken of Lamia. But now, the misfortunes and ieasts of him we presently write of: they do transport our historie, as from a comycall into a tragicall theater, that is to saye, from pleasaunt and light matter, into lamentable and bytter teares. For all the Princes and Kinges conspyred generally agaynst Antigonus, and ioyned all their force and armies together. Therefore Demetrius departed forthwith out of GRÆCE, and came to ioyne with his father, whose courage he founde more liuely and better giuen to this warre, then his yeares required: besides that Demetrius comming made him the bolder, and did lifte vppe his harte the more. And yet it seemes to me, that if Antigonus woulde but haue yeelded vppe a fewe trifling thinges, and that he coulde or woulde haue brydeled his ouer immoderate couetous desire to raigne: he had bothe kept for him selfe all the tyme of his life, and also lefte after his deathe vnto his sonne, the supreameſt dignitie and power, aboue all the other Kinges and succeſſors of Alexander. But he was so cruell, and rashe of nature, and as insolent and braue in his doinges, as in his wordes: that thereby he stirred vppe, and brought vppon him as his enemies, mies had three ſcore and foure thowſande footemen, and fiue hundred horſemen more then he, with foure hundred Elephants, and ſix ſcore cartes of warre. When the two armies were one neere vnto the other, me thinkes he had ſome imaginacion in his head that chaunged his hope, but not his corage. For in all other battells and conflictes, hauing commonly vſed to more, bicauſe that he neuer vſed before to imparte to any man the ſecrets of his counſell and determination, no not to his owne ſonne, but did all things of him ſelfe: and then commaunded that thing openly to be done, which he had ſecretly purpoſed. For proofe hereof it is ſaid, Demetrius being but a young man, asked him on a time when the campe ſhould remoue:

Alexander, I will goe to thine enemies that ſhall receiue me. And afterwardes, at the very day of the ouerthrow, when all their armie were ſet in battell ray: Antigonus comming out of his tent, had ſuch a great fall, that he fell flat on his face on the ground, and hurte him ſelfe verie ſorely. So when he was taken vp, then lifting vp his handes to heauen, he made his prayers vnto the goddes, that it would pleaſe them to graunt him victorie, or ſodaine death without great paine, before he ſhoulde ſee him ſelfe vanquiſhed, and his armie ouerthrowen. When D both battells came to ioyne, and that they fought hand to hand: Demetrius that had the moſt Demetrius vpon the firſt onſet, made Antiochus the ſonne of Seleucus, flie. Ouerraſhly chaſing the enemies, he loſt his victorie, and was ouercome.
parte of the horſemen with him, went and gaue charge vpon Antiochus the ſonne of Seleucus, and fought it out ſo valliantly on his ſide, that he ouerthrewe his enemies, and put them to flight. But too fondly following the chaſe of them that fledde, and out of time: he marred all, and was the occaſion of the loſſe of his victorie. For when he returned from the chaſe, he could not ioyne againe with their footemen, bicauſe the Elephants were betwene both. Then Seleucus perceiuing Antigonus battell was naked of horſemen, he did not preſently ſet vpon them, but turned at one ſide as though he woulde enuiron them behinde, and made them affrayed: yet making head as he would charge them, only to geue them leaſure to come on their ſide, as they did. For the moſt parte of Antigonus hoaſt did forſake him, and yeelded vnto his E enemies: & the reſt of them fled euery man. And when a great trowpe of men together went with great furie to geue charge on that ſide where Antigonus was: one of them that were about him, ſayd vnto him: your grace had neede take heede, for theſe men come to charge vs.
He aunſwered againe: but how ſhould they know me? And if they did, my ſonne Demetrius will come and helpe me. This was his laſt hope, and ſtill he looked euerie way if he could ſee his ſonne comming towards him: vntill at length he was ſlaine with arrowes, darts, & pikes. The death of king Antigonus.
For of all his frendes and ſouldiers there taried not one man by his bodie, but Thorax of the citie of LARISSA in THESSALIE. Now the battell hauing ſuche ſucceſſe as you haue heard, the Kings and Princes that had won ſo glorious a victorie, as if they had cut a great bodie into ſundrie peeces: they deuided Antigonus kingdome among them, and euerie man had his might be, with fiue thowſand footemen and foure thowſand horſemen, he got to the citie of

Ephesvs: where euerie man mistrusted, that being needie of money as he was, he would not spare the temple of Diana in Ephesvs, but would rifle all the gold and siluer in it. And in contrarie maner also, Demetrius being affrayed of his souldiers, least they would spoyle it against his will: he sodainly departed thence, and sayled towardes Græce, putting his greatest confidence & affiance in the Athenians, bicause he had left his wife Deidamia at Athens, with shippes and some money, supposing he could goe no whether with better safety in his aduersitie, then to Athens, of whose good wills he thought him selfe assured. Wherefore when Ambassadors of the Athenians came vnto him, and found him not farre from the Iles Cyclades, as he sailed with great speede towardes Attica, and that they had declared vnto him, he should forbeare to come vnto their citie, bicause the people had made an ordinance to suffer no moe kings to come into Athens, and that they had sent Deidamia his wife honorablie accompanied vnto the citie of Megara: then was Demetrius for verie anger & passion of minde, cleane out of countenaunce, although vntill that time he had paciently borne his aduersitie, and his hart had neuer failed him. But this nipped him to the harte, when he sawe (that contrarie to exspectacion) the Athenians had deceiued and failed him in his greatest neede, and that in his aduersitie he found their former frendshippe counterfeate, and altogether dissembled. Whereby most plainly appeareth, that the most vncerteine and deceiueable prose of peoples good wills and cities towardes Kings and Princes, are the immesurable and extreame honors they doe vnto them. For sith it is so, that the trueth and certainty of honor proceedeth from the good will of those that giue it: the feare which the common people commonly stand in of the power of kings, is sufficient cause for them to mistrust that the people doe it not with good will and from their harts, considering that for feare they doe the selfe same things, which they will also doe for loue. Therefore graue and wise Princes should not passe so much for the images and statues they set vp for them, or the tables or diuine honors they doe decree vnto them: as to regard their owne workes & deedes, and weying them truely, so to beleue and receiue their honors for true, or otherwise to reiect and mistrust them, as things done by compulsion. For commonly it is that which maketh the people to hate kings the more, when they doe accept these immesurable and extreame honors done vnto them, but those sortes chiefly hate them most, that against their wills are forced to doe them those honors. Demetrius seeing then how iniuriously the Athenians had vsed him, & at that time not knowing how to be reuenged of them: he modestly sent vnto them only to make his complaints, and to demaund his shippes, among the which was that galley of sixteene banckes of owers. The which when he had receiued, he hoysed saile immediatly towards the straight of Peloponnesvs, and there found all things to goe against him. For in euery place where he had left any garrison, the Captaines that had the charge of them, either yeelded them vp, or else reuolted, & kept them against him. Therfore leauing Pyrrhus his Lieutenaunt in Græce, he tooke sea againe, & sailed towards Cherronesvs, & there with the mischieues he did, & with the spoiles he got in king Lysimachus land, he payed his men, and enriched his army, the which began againe to increase, & to be dreadfull to his enemies. But now for Lysimachus, the other kings made no great accompt of him, neither did they sturre to geue him aide, bicause he was nothing inferior vnto Demetrius: and for that he was of greater power and possessions then them selues, they therefore were the more affrayed of him. Shortly after, Seleucus sent vnto Demetrius, to require his daughter Stratonice in mariage, notwithstanding that he had a sonne alreadie called Antiochus, by his wife Apama a Persian. Howbeit he thought that his affaires and greatnes of his estate and kingdom, was able enough to maintaine many successors after him. And furthermore, he considered with him selfe that he should haue neede of Demetrius allyance, bicause he saw Lysimachus him selfe matche with one of Ptolomyes daughters, & his sonne Agathocles with his other daughter. Demetrius seeing this good fortune offered him beyond all hope, presently tooke his daughter with him, & sailed with all his shippes directly towards Syria. In the which voyage he was constrained of necessitie to lande sometimes, and specially in Cilicia, the which Pliſtarchus the brother of Cassander kept at that time, being geuen him by the other kings for his parte and porcion of the spoyle of Antigonus, after he was ouerthrowen. This Pliſtarchus thinking that Demetrius landed not to refresh him

A himselfe, but to forrage and spoyle bicause he woulde complaine of Seleucus for the allyance he made with their common enemie, without the consent and priuitie of all the other Kings and Princes confederats, he went purposely vnto his brother Cassander. Demetrius hauing intelligence thereof, sodainly inuaded the land, and spoyled as farre as the citie of CYNDE, and caried away (which he had leauied) twelue hundred talentes, which he found yet left of his fathers treasure: and then with all the speede he could possible he returned to his shippes, and hoysed sayle. Shortly after, his wife Phila also came vnto him. So Seleucus receiued them all neere vnto the citie of ORONTVS, and there their meeting was Princely, without sorow or suspition one of the other. First of all Seleucus did feast Demetrius in his tent, in the middest of his campe: & afterwards Demetrius feasted him againe in his galley, with thirteene bankes of

Thus they passed many dayes together, feasting and reioycing eche with other, being vnarmed, and hauing no souldiers to waite vpon them: vntill at length Seleucus with his wife Stratonice departed, and tooke his way with great pompe towardes the citie of ANTIOCHE. Nowe for Demetrius, he kept the prouince of CILICIA, and sent his wife Phila vnto her brother Cassander, to aunswere the complaints and accusacions of Plistarchus against him. In the meane time Deidamia his wife departed out of GRACE to come vnto him: who after she had remained with him a few dayes, dyed of a sickenesse. Afterwardes Demetrius comming againe in fauor with Ptolomy, by Seleucus his sonne in lawes meanes, he maried his daughter Ptolemaide. Hitherunto Seleucus vsed Demetrius verie curteously: but afterwards he prayed him to deliuer him CILICIA againe, for a summe of money that he offered him: but Demetrius plainly

C denyed him. Then did Seleucus shew a cruell and tyrannicall couetousnesse: for in anger, and with fierce threats and countenaunce he asked him the cities of TYR, and SIDON. But therein me thinkes he lacked honestie and ciuility: as though he that had vnder his obedience and subiection all that which lay betwext the INDIANS, and the sea of SYRIA, was in suche neede and pouertie: that for two cities onely, he shoulde driue his father in law from him, who had fostered so hard & bitter chaunge. But thereby he rightly confirmed Platoes saying: that he that will be riche in deede, must endeuor him selfe not to increase his riches, but rather to diminish his couetousnes. For he shall neuer be but a begger, and needie, whose couetous desire hath no ende. This notwithstanding, Demetrius yeelded not for feare, but prouided to replenish the cities with good garisons to keepe them against him: saying, that though he had

D bene ouercome ten thowsande times more in battell, yet it should neuer sincke into his head that he shoulde be contented, and thinke him selfe happie to buy Seleucus allyance so deere. On thother side, being aduertised that one Lachares hauing spied oportunitie when the ATHENIANS were in ciuill warres one against the other, and that he had ouercomen them, and did tyrannically vsurpe the gouernment: he then perswaded him selfe that he might easely winne it againe, if he came thither vpon the sodaine. Thereuppon he crossed the seas with a great fleete of shippes, without any daunger: but he had such a great storme & tempest vpon the coast of ATTICA, that he lost the most parte of his shippes, and a great number of his men besides. But for him selfe he scaped, and began to make a litle warre with the ATHENIANS. Yet perceiuing that he did no good there, but lost his time: he sent some of his men to

E gather a number of shippes againe together, and he him selfe in the meane time went into PELOPONNESVS, to laye siege to the citie of MESSENA, where his person was in greate daunger. For fighting hard by the wall, he had such a blowe with a dart, that it hit him full in the mouth, and ranne through his cheeke. Notwithstanding this, after he was healed of that wound, he brought into his subiection againe, certaine townes that had rebelled against him. After that, he returned againe into ATTICA, and tooke the cities of ELEVSIN, and of RHAMNVS: and then spoyled all the contrie, & tooke a shippe fraight with corne, and hong vp the marchaunt that ought it, and the maister of the shippe that brought it. Thereby to terrifie all other marchauntes, that they shoulde be affrayed to bring any more corne thither, and so to famish the citie, by keeping them from all thinges necessarie for their sustenaunce: and so it

F happened. For a bushell of salt was sold at ATHENS for fortie siluer Drachmas, and the bushell of wheate for three hundred Drachmas. In this extreame necessitie, the ATHENIANS had but a short ioy for the hundred and fiftie gallies they saw neere vnto ÆGINA, the which

Ptolomy sent to aide them. For when the souldiers that were in them sawe that they brought vnto Demetrius a great number of shippes out of PELOPONNESVS, out of CYPRVS, & diuers other partes, which amounted in the whole to the number of three hundred saile: they weyed their anckers, and fled presently. Then Lachares forsooke the city, and secretly saued him selfe. Nowe the ATHENIANS, who before had commaunded vppon paine of death, that no man should make any motion to the counsell, to treate of any peace with Demetrius: they did then vpon Lachares flying, presently open the gates next vnto Demetrius campe, and sent Ambassadours vnto him, not looking for any grace or peace, but bicause necessitie draue them to it. During this so hard and straight siege, there fell out many wonderfull and straunge things: but among others, this one is of speciall note. It is reported that the father and the sonne sitting in their house, voide of all hope of life: there fell a dead ratte before them from the toppe of the house, and that the father and sonne fought who should haue it to eate. Moreouer, that at the selfe same siege the Philosopher Epicurus maintained him selfe and his schollers, by geuing them a proporcion of beanes euerie day, by the which they liued. Thus the citie of ATHENS being brought vnto this extremitie, Demetrius made his entrie into it, and gaue commandement to all the citizens, that they shoulde assemble euerie man within the Theater: where he made them to be compassed in with armed souldiers, and then placed all his gard armed about the stage. Afterwards he came downe him selfe into the Theater, through high galleries and entries by the which the common players vsed to come to play their partes in tragedies, insomuche as the ATHENIANS were then worse affrayed then before: howbeit Demetrius presently pacified their feare, as soone as he beganne to speake vnto them. For he did not facion his Oration with a hastie angrie voyce, neither did he vse any sharpe or bitter wordes: but onely after he had curteously told them their faults and discurtesie towards him, he sayd he forgaue them, and that he would be their frende againe: and furthermore, he caused tenne millions of bushells of wheate to be geuen vnto them, and stablished such Gouernors there, as the people misliked not of. Then Demoeles the Orator, seeing that the people gaue out great showtes of ioy in the praise of Demetrius, and that the Orators dayly contended in the pulpit for Orations, who should exceede other in preferring newe honors for Demetrius: he caused an order to be made, that the hauens of PIRÆVS and MVNYCHIA should be put into Demetrius handes, to vse at his pleasure. This being stablished by voyces of the people, Demetrius of his owne priuate authoritie did place a greate garrison within the forte called MVSÆVM, bicause the people should rebell no more against him, nor diuert him from his other enterprises. Thus when he had taken ATHENS, he went to set vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS. But Archidamus king of LACEDÆMON, came against him with a puisant armie, whom he discomfited in battell, and put to flight, by the citie of MANTINEA. After that he inuaded LACONIA with all his armie, and made an inrode to the citie of SPARTA, where he once againe ouerthrew the LACEDÆMONIANS in set battell, tooke fiue hundred of them prisoners, and slue two hundred: insomuch that euery man thought he might euen then goe to SPARTA without any daunger to take it, the which had neuer yet bene taken affore by any. But there was neuer king that had so often and sodaine chaunges of fortune as Demetrius, nor that in other affaires was euer so often litle, and then great: so sodainly downe, and vp againe: so weake, & straight so strong. And therefore it is reported, that in his great aduersities when fortune turned so contrarie against him, he was wont to crie out vppon fortune, that which AEschylus speaketh in a place:

Thou seemst to haue begotten me, of purpose for to showe Thy force in lifting of me vp, me downe againe to throwe.

Nowe againe when his affaires prospered so well, and that he was likely to recouer a great force and kingdome: newes were brought him, first that Lysimachus had taken all his townes from him, which he helde in ASIA: and on the other side, that Ptolomy had won from him all the realme of CYPRVS, the citie of SALAMINA onely excepted, in the which he kept his mother and children very straightly besieged. This notwithstanding, fortune played with him, as the wicked woman Archilochus speaketh of, who,

And in the other fire beſtowed.

For taking him away, and (as it were) the citie of SPARTA alſo out of his handes by theſe dreadfull newes, euen when he was certaine to haue won it: ſhe preſently offered him hopes of other great and new thinges, by this occaſion following. After the death of Caſſander, Philip who was the eldeſt of all his other ſonnes, and left his heire and ſucceſſor in the kingdome of MACEDON: he reigned no long time ouer the MACEDONIANS, but deceaſed ſoone after his father was dead. The two other brethren alſo fell at great variance, and warres together: ſo that the one called Antipater, ſlue his owne mother Theſſalonica: and the other being Alexander, called in to aide him Demetrius, and Pyrrhus, the one out of the realme of EPIRVS, and the other out of PELOPONNESVS. Pyrrhus came firſt before Demetrius, and kept a great parte of MACEDON for recompence of his paines, comming to aide him at his deſire: ſo that he became a dreadful neighbour vnto Alexander him ſelfe, that had ſent for him into his contrie. Furthermore, when he was aduertiſed that Demetrius did preſently vpon the receite of his letters, ſet forward with all his armie to come to aide him: the young Prince Alexander, was twiſe as muche more amazed and affrayed, for the great eſtate and eſtimacion of Demetrius. So he went to him notwithſtanding, and receiued him at a place called Deion, and there imbraced and welcomed him. But immediatly after, he told him that his affaires were nowe in ſo good ſtate, that praiſed be the goddes he ſhould not now neede his preſence to aide him. After theſe words the one began to miſtruſt the other. So it chaunced one day, that as Demetrius went to Alexanders lodging where the feaſt was prepared: there came one to him to tell him of an ambuſh that was layed for him, and how they had determined to kill him when he ſhould thinke to be merie at the banket. But Demetrius was nothing abaſhed at the newes, and only went a litle ſoftlier, not making ſuch haſt as he did before, and in the meane time ſent to commaunde his Captaines to arme their men, and to haue them in readines: and willed his gentlemen and all the reſt of his officers that were about him, (which were a greater number by many than thoſe of Alexanders ſide) euery man of them to go in with him into the hall, and to tarie there till he roſe from the table. By this meanes the men whome Alexander had appointed to aſſault him, they durſt not, being affrayed of the great traine he had brought with him. Furthermore, Demetrius faining that he was not well at eaſe at that time to make merie, he went immediatly out of the hall, and the next morning determined to depart, making him beleue that he had certaine newes brought him of great importaunce: and prayed Alexander to pardon him, that he could no lenger keepe him companie, for that he was driuen of neceſſitie to depart from him, and that an other time they woulde meete together, with better leaſure and libertie. Alexander was verie glad to ſee that Demetrius went his way out of MACEDON not offended, but of his owne good will: whereuppon he brought him into THESSALY, and when they were come to the citie of LARISSA, they began againe to feaſt one an other, to intrappe eche other: the which offered Demetrius occaſion to haue Alexander in his hand, as he would wiſh him ſelfe. For Alexander of purpoſe would not haue his gard about him, fearing leaſt thereby he ſhould teach Demetrius alſo to ſtand vpon his gard. Thus Alexander turned his practiſe for an other, vpon him ſelfe: for he was determined not to ſuffer Demetrius to ſcape his handes, if he once againe came within daunger. So Alexander being bidden to ſupper to Demetrius, he came accordingly. Demetrius riſing from the borde in the middeſt of ſupper, Alexander roſe alſo, being affrayed of that ſtraunge manner, and followed him foote by foote to the verie dore. Then Demetrius ſayd but to his warders at the gate, kill him that followeth me. With thoſe wordes he went out of the dores, and Alexander that followed him was ſlaine in the place, and certaine of his gentlemen with him which came to reſcue him: of the which, one of them as they killed him ſayd, that Demetrius had preuented them but one day. All that night, (as it is no other likely) was full of vprore and tumult. Howbeit, the next morning the MACEDONIANS being maruelouſly troubled & affrayed of Demetrius great power, when they ſaw that no man came to aſſaile them, but that Demetrius in contrarie maner ſent vnto them to tell them that he would ſpeake with them, and deliuer them reaſon for that he had done: then they all began to be bolde againe, and willingly gaue him audience. Nowe Demetrius needed not to vſe many wordes, nor to make any long Orations, to win them vnto him: for, bicause they hated Antipater as a horrible manqueller and murderer of his mother, and bicause they had no better man to preferre, they easely chose Demetrius king of MACEDON, and thereuppon brought him backe into MACEDON, to take possession of the kingdom. This chaunge was not misliked of the other MACEDONIANS that remained at home in their contrie, for that they yet remembred the traiterous and wicked fact of Cassander, against Alexander the great: for which cause they vtterly hated & detested all his issue & posteritie. And furthermore, if there were any sparke of remembrance in their harts, of the bounty & goodnes of their grandfather Antipater: Demetrius receiued the frute and benefit, for his wife Phylaes sake, by whom he had a sonne that should succeede him in the kingdom, and was a proper youth, in campe with his father. Demetrius hauing this great good happe and fortune comen vnto him, he receiued newes also that Ptolomy had not onely raised his siege from the citie of SALAMINA, where he kept his mother and children straightly besieged: but further, that he had done them great honor, and bestowed great giftes vpon them. On the other side also he was aduertised, that his daughter Stratonice, who had before bene maried vnto Seleucus, was now maried againe vnto Antiochus, the sonne of the sayd Seleucus, and how that she was crowned Queene of all the barbarous nations inhabiting in the high prouinces of ASIA: and that came to passe in this maner. It chaunced that this young Prince Antiochus (as loue ouercommeth all men) became in loue with his mother in law Stratonice, who alreadie had a sonne by Seleucus his father. She being young, & passing fayer, he was so rauished with her, that though he proued all the wayes possible to maister his furie and passion that way: yet he was still the weaker. So that in the end, condemning him selfe to death bicause he found his desire abhominable, his passion incurable, & his reason vtterly ouercome: he resolued to kill him selfe by litle and litle, with abstinence from meate and drinke, and made no other reckoning to remedie his griefe, faining to haue some secret inward disease in his body. Yet could he not so finely cloke it, but that Erasistratus the Phisitian easely found his griefe, that loue, not sicknes, was his infirmitie: howbeit it was hard for him to imagine with whom he was in loue. Erasistratus being earnestly bent to finde out the partie he loued, he sate by this young Prince all day long in his chamber, and when any fayer young boy or wife came to see him, he earnestly looked Antiochus in the face, & carefully obserued all the partes of the bodie, and outward mouings, which do commonly bewray the secret passions & affections of the mind. So hauing marked him diuers times, that when others came to see him, whatsoeuer they were, he still remeined in one selfe state, and that when Stratonice his mother in lawe came alone or in companie of her husband Seleucus to visite him, he commonly perceiued those signes in him, which Sappho wryteth to be in louers (to wit, that his words and speech did faile him, his colour became red, his eyes still rowled to and fro, and then a sodaine swet would take him, his pulse would beate fast and rise high, and in the end, that after the force and power of his hart had failed him, and shewed all these signes, he became like a man in an extasie & traunse, & white as a kearcher) he then gathering a true coniecture by these so manifest signes and declaracions, that it was only Stratonice whom this young Prince fansied, and the which he forced him selfe to keepe secret to the death: thought that to bewray it to the king it would offend him muche, but yet trusting to his great affection and fatherly loue he bare to his sonne, he ventred one day to tell him, that his sonnes sickneſſe was no other but loue, and withall, that his loue was impossible to be enioyed, and therefore that he must of necessitie dye, for it was incurable. Seleucus was cold at the harte to heare these newes: so he asked him, what, is he incurable? Yea, Sir, aunswered the Phisitian, bicause he is in loue with my wife. Then replied Seleucus againe, alas Erasistratus, I haue alwayes loued thee as one of my deareſt frendes, and wouldest thou not now doe me this pleasure, to lette my sonne marry thy wife, sith thou knoweſt it well that I haue no moe sonnes but he, and that I see he is but cast away, if thou helpe me not? But your grace would not doe it your selfe, sayd Erasistratus: if he were in loue with Stratonice. O, sayd Seleucus to him againe, that it were the wil of the gods, some god or man could turne his loue that way: for mine owne parte, I would not only leaue him the thing he loued, but I would geue my kingdom also to saue his life. Thē Erasistratus seeing that the king spake these words from his hart, and with abundance of teares: he tooke him by the right hand, and told him plainly, your grace needeth not Eraſiſtratus helpe in this. For being father, husbande, and king, your ſelfe alſo may onely be the Phiſitian, to cure your ſonnes diſeaſe. When Seleucus heard that, he called an aſſemblie of the people, and declared before them all that he was determined to crown his ſonne Antiochus king of the high prouinces of Asia, & Stratonice Queene, to marry them together: and that he was perſwaded that his ſonne, (who had alwayes ſhewed him ſelfe obedient to his fathers will) would not diſobey him in this mariage. And as for Stratonice, if ſhe miſliked this mariage, and would not conſent vnto it bicauſe it was no common matter: then he prayed that his frendes would perſwade her ſhe ſhould thinke all good & comely that ſhould pleaſe the king, and withall that concerned the general benefit of the realme and common wealth. Hereuppon Antiochus and Stratonice were married together. But now to returne againe to the hiſtory of Demetrius. Demetrius came by the kingdom of Macedon and Theſſalie, by this meanes as you haue heard, and did moreouer poſſeſſe the beſt parte of Peloponnesvs, and on this ſide the ſtraight, the cities of Megara, and Athens. Furthermore he led his armie againſt the Boeotians, who were at the firſt willing to make peace with him. But after that Cleonymus king of Sparta was come into the city of Thebes with his army, the Boeotians encouraged by the faire wordes and allurement of one Piſis, borne in the citie of Thespis, who at that time bare all the ſway & chiefe authoritie amongſt them: they gaue vp their treaty of peace they had begon with Demetrius & determined to make warre. Therupon Demetrius wēt to beſiege the citie of Thebes, & layed his engines of battery vnto it: inſomuch as Cleonymus for feare, ſtale ſecretly out of the citie. Thereuppon the Thebans being alſo affrayed, yeelded them ſelues vnto Demetrius mercie: who putting great garriſons into the cities, & hauing leauied a great ſumme of money of the prouince, left them Hieronymus the hiſtoriographer, his Lieutenant & Gouernor there. So it appeared that he vſed them very curteouſly, & did them many pleaſures, and ſpecially vnto Piſis. For when he had taken him priſoner, he did him no hurt, but receiued him very curteouſly, and vſed him well: and furthermore, he made him Polemarchus, (to wit, campe maiſter) in the city of Thespis. Shortly after theſe things were thus brought to paſſe, king Lyſimachus by chaunce was taken by an other barbarous Prince called Dromichetes. Thereupon, Demetrius, to take ſuch a noble occaſion offred him, went with a great army to inuade the contry of Thracia, ſuppoſing he ſhould find no man to withſtande him, but that he might conquer it at his pleaſure. Howbeit, ſo ſoone as Demetrius backe was turned, the Boeotians reuolted againe from him, & therwithall newes was brought him, that Lyſimachus was deliuered out of priſon. Then he returned backe with all ſpeede, maruelouſly offended with the Boeotians, whom he found already diſcomfited in battell, by his ſonne Antigonus, & went againe to lay ſiege to the citie of Thebes, being the chiefe city of al that prouince of Boeotia. But at that preſent time, Pyrrhus came & forraged all Theſſaly, and entred euen to the ſtraight of Thermopyles. Therefore Demetrius was conſtrained to leaue his ſonne to continewe the ſiege at Thebes, whileſt he him ſelfe went againſt Pyrrhus, who ſodainly returned againe into his realme. So Demetrius left ten thowſand footemen, and a thowſand horſemen in Theſſaly to defend the contry, & returned with the reſt of his army to win Thebes. Thereupon he brought his great engine of batterie called Elepolis, againſt the wall, as you haue heard before, the which was thruſt forward by litle & litle, with great labor, by reaſon of the weight and heauines of it: ſo that it could ſcant be driuen forward two furlongs in two months. But the Boeotians & the Thebans did valliantly defend them ſelues: and Demetrius of a malicious minde & deſire of reuenge, (more ofter then needefull, or to any purpoſe) compelled his men to go to the aſſault, & to hazard them ſelues: ſo that there were daily a great number of them ſlaine. Antigonus his ſonne perceiuing it: alas, ſaid he, why doe we thus ſuffer our men to be ſlaine and caſt away to no purpoſe? Wherefore Demetrius angrily aunſwered him againe: what needeſt thou to care? Is there any* corne to be diſtributed to thoſe that are dead? But notwithſtanding, bicauſe men ſhould not thinke he ſtill ment to put others in daunger, and durſt not venter him ſelfe: he fought with them, till at length he was ſhot through the necke with a ſharpe arrow head, that was ſhot at him from the wall. Wherewithall he fell very ſicke, but yet raiſed not his ſiege, nor remoued his campe, but tooke the citie of Thebes againe by aſſault: the which being not long before againe replenished with people, was in ten yeares space twise won and taken. Now he put the THEBANS in a maruelous feare, by his cruell threats he gaue them at his cõming into THEBES: so that they looked to haue receiued the extreamest punishment the vanquished could haue, through the iust wrath and anger of the conqueror. Howbeit after Demetrius had put thirtene of them to death, and banished some: he pardoned all the rest. About that time fell out the celebration of the feast called Pythia, in the honour of Apollo: and bicause the ÆTOLIANS kept all the high wayes to bring them vnto the city of DELPHES in the which of olde time they did vse to celebrate those sports aforesaid: he caused them to be kept & solemnised at ATHENS as in a place where this god in reason should be best honored & reuerenced, bicause he was patrone of the citie, and for that the ATHENIANS maintained that he was their progenitor. From thence he returned into MACEDON, & knowing that it was against his naure to liue idelly, & in peace, & seing on the other side also that the MACEDONIANS did him more seruice, & were more obedient to him in warres, & that in time of peace they grew seditious, full of vanity & quarrell: he went to make warre with the ÆTOLIANS, and after he had spoiled and destroyed their contry, he left Pantauchus his Lieutenant there, with a great part of his army. Demetrius him selfe went in the meane time with the rest of his army against Pyrrhus: and Pyrrhus also against him, but they missed of meeting ech with other. Whereupon Demetrius passed further vnto the realme of EPIRVS, the which he spoiled & forraged. Pyrrhus on the other side went on so farre that he met with Pantauchus, Demetrius Lieutenant, with whom he fought a battell, and came to the sword with him: so that he did both hurt him, and was also hurt by him. But in the end Pyrrhus had the vpper hand, he put Pantauchus to flight, & slue a great number of his men, & tooke fiue thowsand prisoners: the which was the chief ouerthrow of Demetrius. For Pyrrhus wan not the MACEDONIANS ill will so much for the mischieues & hurts he had done vnto them, as he got him selfe great fame & renowne with them, bicause him selfe alone had with his owne hands done all the noble exployts of warre in that iorney: for the which, he was afterwardes had in great estimacion among the MACEDONIANS. Nowe many of them began to say, that he was the only king of all others, in whom the liuely image of the hardines & valliantnes of Alexander the great was to be seene: & that all the rest, (but specially Demetrius) did but counterfeate his grauetie & Princely countenaunce, like players vpon a stage that would counterfeate his countenaunce & gesture. And to say truly, there was much finenes and curiosity about Demetrius, to make him a playing stocke in cõmon playes. For some say, that he did not only weare a great hat with his diadeame vpon his head, & was apparelled in purple gownes imbrodered with gold: but also that he did vse to weare certaine wollen shooes on his feete died in purple colour, not wouen, but facioned together like a felt, and gilt vpon it. And furthermore, he had long before caused a cloke to be made of a maruelous rich & sumptuous peece of worke. For vpon it was drawen the figure of the world, with starres and circles of heauen, the which was not throughly finished by the chaunge of his fortune. So, there was neuer king of MACEDON after him that durst weare it: albeit there were many prowde & arrogant kings that succeded him. Now the MACEDONIANS were not onely sory, and offended to see suche things, as they were not wont to be acquainted withall: but they much more misliked this curious maner of life, & specially bicause he was ill to come to, and worse to be spoken with. For he gaue no audience, or if he did, he was very rough, & would sharply take them vp that had to do with him. As, he kept the Ambassadors of the ATHENIANS two yeres, & would geue them no answere: & yet made as though he loued them better, then any other people of GRÆCE. Another time also he was offended, bicause the LACEDÆMONIANS had sent but one man only Ambassador vnto him, taking it that they had done it in despite of him. And so did the Ambassador of the LACEDÆMONIANS answere him very gallantly, after the LACONIAN maner. For when Demetrius asked him, how chaũceth it that the LACEDÆMONIANS do send but one man vnto me? No more but one, said he, O king, vnto one. On a time he came abroad more plainly & popularlike, then he was wont to do: whereby he put the people in good hope that they might the easelier speake with him, and that he would more curteously heare their complaints. Thereupon many came, and put vp their humble supplicacions and bills of peticion vnto him. He receiued them, & put them vp in the lappe of his cloke. The poore suters were glad of that, and waited

A waited vpon him at his heeles, hoping they ſhould quickely be diſpatched: but when he was vpon the bridge of the riuer of Axius, he opened his cloke, & caſt them all into the riuer. This went to the harts of the MACEDONIANS, who then thought they were no more gouerned by a king, but oppreſſed by a tyran: & it grieued thē ſo much more, bicauſe they did yet remember (either for that they had ſeene them ſelues, or otherwiſe heard their forefathers ſay) howe curteous king Philip was in all ſuch matters, and howe that one day as he paſſed through the ſtreete, a poore old woman pluckt him by the gowne, and eftſoones humbly beſought him to heare her, but he aunſwered her he was not then at leaſure. Whereuppon the poore woman plainly cried out to him, leaue then to be king. This word ſo nettled him, and he tooke ſuch a cōceit of it, that he returned preſently to his pallace, & ſetting all other matters a part, did no-

B thing elſe many dayes but gaue him ſelfe to heare all ſutes, & began with this poore olde woman. For truly nothing becommeth a Prince better, thē to miniſter iuſtice: for Mars (as Timotheus ſaith) ſignifieth force, & is a tyran: but iuſtice & law, according to Pindarus, is Queene of all the world. Moreouer, the wiſe Poet Homer ſaith not that Princes & Kings haue receiued the cuſtody of engines, & of munition, neither alſo ſtrong & mighty ſhips of Iupiter, to kepe them to deſtroy townes withall: but with them to maintaine law & iuſtice. And therefore he calleth not the cruell & bloody king, but the iuſt & merciful Prince, Iupiters frend & ſcholler. And Demetrius boaſted that he had a name and title contrarie vnto Iupiter, whom they called Polieus, or Poliouchos, ſignifying protector and preſeruer of cities: and that he was called Poliorcetes, a Fortgainer. Thus the ill was taken for the good, & vice preferred for vertue: bicauſe he could

C not diſcerne the truth from falſehod, which turned his iniuſtice to glory, & iniquity to honor. But now to returne where we left: Demetrius fell into a great & daungerous ſickenes in the citie of PELLA, during which time he almoſt loſt all MACEDON, by a ſodaine inuaſion Pyrrhus made, who in maner rode it all ouer, & came as farre as the city of EDESSA. Howbeit ſo ſone as he recouered health again, he eaſely draue him out, & afterwards made peace with him, bicauſe he would not fighting with him (whom he ſhould haue daily at his dores ſtil skirmiſhing ſomtime here, ſomtime there) loſe the oportunity, and weaken him ſelfe to bring that to paſſe which he had determined. For he had no ſmall matters in his head, but thought to recouer all the realmes his father had: & beſides, the preparacion he made was no leſſe ſufficiēt, then the purpoſe of ſuch an imagination required. For he had leauied & aſſembled an army of a hūdred

D thowſand footemen, lacking but two thowſand: and vnto them he had alſo well neere twelue thowſand horſemen, & had beſides gotten aboue fiue hundred ſhippes together, which were built part in the hauen of PRÆVS, part at CORINTH, part in the city of CHALCIS, and part about PELLA. He him ſelfe in perſon went through their workehouſes, & ſhewed the artificers how they ſhould make them, & did help to deuiſe them: ſo that euery man wondred not onely at his infinite preparacion, but at the greatnes & ſumptuouſnes of his works. For at that time there was no man liuing that euer ſaw a gally of fifteene or ſixteene banks of owers. But this is true, that afterwardes Ptolomy, ſurnamed Philopator, built a gally of forty bankes of owers, the

E which was two hundred foure ſcore cubits long, & from the keele in height to the top of the poope, eight & forty cubits: & to looke to the tackle & guide her, required foure hundred mariners, & foure thowſand water mē to row her, & beſides all that ſhe could yet cary aboue the hatches, wel nere three thowſand fighting men. Howbeit this gally neuer ſerued to other purpoſe but for ſhow, & was like to a houſe that neuer ſturred: & it was neuer remoued out of the place where it was built but with maruelous a do, & great daūger, more to make men wonder at it, then for any ſeruice or commodity it could be imployed vnto. But now, the beawty of Demetrius ſhippes did nothing hinder their ſwiftnes & goodnes for fight, neither did the hugenes of their building take away the vſe of them, but their ſwiftneſſe and nimblenes deſerued more commendacion, then their ſumptuouſnes & ſtatelines. Thus as this great power & preparacion was in hand, being ſuch as neuer king before (ſince the time of Alexander the great) had

F aſſembled a greater to inuade ASIA: theſe three kings, Ptolomy, Seleucus, and Lyſimachus, did all ioyne together againſt him. And afterwardes alſo, they ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Pyrrhus in the name of them all, to draw him to their ſide, alluring him to come into MACEDON, perſwading him not to repoſe any truſt in the peace Demetrius had made with him, to make accompt of it as a good & ſure place: for, they ſaid that Demetrius did not giue him pledge that he would neuer make warre with him, but rather firſt tooke oportunity him ſelf to make warre with whom he thought good. Pyrrhus conſidering ſo much, & finding their words true: there roſe a ſharpe & cruell warre on euery ſide againſt Demetrius, who tracted time, & ſtayed yet to begin. For at one ſelfe time, Ptolomy with a great fleete of ſhippes came downe into GRÆCE, and made all GRÆCE reuolt from him: & Lyſimachus alſo on THRACIAES ſide, & Pyrrhus vpon the borders of EPIRVS, confining with the realme of MACEDON, they entred with a great army, & ſpoiled and ſacked all as they went. Thereupon Demetrius leauing his ſonne Antigonus in GRÆCE, he returned with all poſſible ſpeede into MACEDON, to goe firſt againſt Lyſimachus. But as he was preparing to go againſt him, newes were brought him that Pyrrhus had already taken the citie of BERRHOEA. This newes being blowen abroad amongeſt the MACEDONIANS, all Demetrius doings were turned topſie turuey. For all his campe was ſtraight full of teares & complaints, & his men began openly to ſhew their anger againſt him, ſpeaking all the ill they could of him: ſo that they would tary no lenger, but euery one prayed leaue to depart, pretēding to looke to their buſines at home, but in truth to go & yeeld them ſelues vnto Lyſimachus. Wherefore Demetrius thought it beſt for him to get him as farre from Lyſimachus as he could, and to bend all his army againſt Pyrrhus: bicauſe the other was their contry man, & familiarly knowen among the moſt of them, for that they had ſerued together vnder Alexander the great, and that as he thought, the MACEDONIANS would not preferre Pyrrhus a ſtraūger, before him. But there his iudgement failed him. For as ſoone as Pyrrhus had pitched his campe hard by him, the MACEDONIANS that had euer loued valliantnes, & had of ancient time eſteemed him worthier to be king, that was the beſt ſouldier & vallianteſt in the field, and furthermore had heard the report of his great clemency & curteſy he had ſhewed to the priſoners he had taken: they hauing had good will of long time ſought but good occaſion to forſake Demetrius, & to yeeld them ſelues vnto Pyrrhus, or to any other prince whatſoeuer he were. Then they ſecretly began to ſteale away one after an other, by ſmal companies at the firſt: but afterwards there roſe ſuch a general tumult againſt him throughout all the campe, that ſome of thē were ſo deſperat to go into his tent to bid him flie, & ſaue himſelfe, bicauſe the MACEDONIANS were too weary with fighting for his curioſity. And yet Demetrius foūd theſe words more gentle, & modeſt, in reſpect of the vile & cruel words which others gaue him. So he went into his tent, & caſt a black cloke about his face, in ſtead of his rich & ſtately cloke he was wont to weare: not like vnto a king, but like a cōmon player when the play is done, & then ſecretly ſtale away. When this was knowē in the campe, many of his ſouldiers ran to his tent to rifle it, and euery man tooke ſuch hold of it to haue his part, that they tare it in peces, & drew their ſwords to fight for it. But Pyrrhus cōming in the middeſt of the tumult, pacified this ſturre, & preſently without blow giuen, wan al Demetrius campe: & afterwards he deuided the realme of MACEDON with Lyſimachus, in the which Demetrius had quietly raigned the ſpace of ſeuen yeres. Now Demetrius being thus miſerably ouerthrowen, & turned out of all his realme: he fled vnto the city of CASSANDRIA. There he found his wife Phila, who tooke it maruelous heauily, and could not abide to ſee him againe a priuate man, driuen out of his kingdom, & the moſt miſerable king that euer was of all other. Wherefore intending no more to follow vaine hope, & deteſting the fortune of her husband: ſhe being more conſtant in calamity then in proſperity, killed her ſelfe with poiſon ſhe tooke. Demetrius went from thence into GRÆCE, purpoſing to gather together the reſt of his ſhipwracks: and there aſſembled all his Captaines and frends that he had. So it ſeemeth to me, the cōpariſon Menelaus maketh of his fortune, in one of the tragedies of Sophocles, in theſe verſes:

Demetrius armie forſaketh him, and goeth to Pyrrhus.

Phila, Demetrius wife poyſoneth her ſelfe.

This comparison might I say much better be applied vnto Demetrius fortune, to his rising and falling, and to his ouerthrowe and reliefe againe. For when euery man thought his force and power vtterly ouerthrowen, then began he to rise againe by repaire of souldiers, which by litle and litle came vnto him, and straight reuiued him with good hope. This was the first time that he was euer seene meanely apparelled, like a priuate man vp and downe the country, without some shewe or tokens of a king. And there was one that seeing him in this estate at THEBES, pleasauntly applied these verses of Euripides vnto him:

Demetrius miserie from Princely happines.

Of god immortall, nowy becomme a mortall wyght: Ismenus bankes and Dirces streames he haunteth in our sight.

Nowe when he beganne to haue some hope againe, and was (as it were) entred into the great high way of kinges, and had gotten souldiers about him, which made a bodie and shewe of royall power: he restored the THEBANS their libertie and gouernment againe. But the ATHENIANS once more reuolted from him, and did reuoke the dignitie and Priesthoode of Diphilus, who had bene that yeare created Priest of the sauiours, in steade of the Gouernour, which they called in old time Eponymos, as we haue told you before: and made a lawe, that from thencefoorth the auncient and common Gouernors of their citie should be restored againe to their auncient manner: and they sent also into MACEDON vnto king Pyrrhus, rather to terrifie Demetrius (whome they sawe beginne to rise againe) then for any hope they had he woulde come and helpe them. Howebeit Demetrius came against them with great furie, and did straightly besiege the citie of ATHENS. Then the ATHENIANS sent Crates the Philosopher to him, a man of great estimacion and authoritie, who so handled him, partely by intreatie, and partely also through his wise persuasions and counsells he gaue him for his profit: that Demetrius presently raised his siege. Wherfore, after he had gathered together so many shippes as were left him, and had imbarked twelue thousande footemen, and a small number of horsemen: he presently tooke sea, and sailed towards ASIA, meaning to take the prouinces of CARIA and LYDIA from Lysimachus, and to make them torebell against him. There Eurydice, sister to his wife Phila, receiued him by the citie of MILETVM, hauing with her one of Ptolomyes daughters & hers, called Ptolemaide, the which had bene affore affianced to him by Seleucus meanes. So he maried Ptolemaide there, with the good will and consent of her mother Eurydice. After his mariage he presently went into the field againe, and did set forwardes to winne some cities, whereof many willingly receiued him, and others he tooke by force. Amongst them he tooke the city of SARDIS, whether came diuers Captaines vnto him of king Lysimachus, who yeelded them selues, and brought him a greate number of men, and muche money besides. But Demetrius receiuing aduertisement that Agathocles, Lysimachus sonne, followed him with a great armie: he went thence into PHRYGIA, making account, and also hoping, that if he coulde winne ARMENIA, he might easely make MEDIA rebell, and then that he woulde see if he coulde conquer the high prouinces of ASIA, where he might haue many places of refuge, if fortune turned against him. Agathocles followed him very neere, and yet skirmishing diuers times with him, Demetrius alway had the better: howebeit Agathocles did cut of his vittells from him euerie waye and kept him at suche a straight, that his men durst no more stray from the campe to forrage: wherefore, they susteyned greate want of vittells, and then beganne his men to be affrayed, and to mistrust that he would make them followe him into ARMENIA and MEDIA. The famine dayly increased more and more in his armie, and it chaunced besides, that missing his waye, and failing to gage the forde well as he passed ouer the riuer of Lycus, the furie and force of the riuer caried his men downe the streame, and drowned a greate number of them: and yet notwithstandinge these greate troubles, they mocked him besides. For one wrote at the entrie and comming in to his tent, the first verse of the tragedie of Oedipus COLONIAN, wrytten by Sophocles, chaunging onely some word.

Demetrius troubles in Asia.

Thou impe of old and blind Antigonus, To vvhat a point hast thou nowy caried vs?

Plague, by ill meate.

But in the end, the plague began also in the middest of this famine, (a common thing, and almost a matter of necessitie, it should so be) bicause that men being driuen to neede and necessitie, doe frame them selues to eate all that comes to hande: whereupon he was driuen to bring backe those few men that remained, hauing lost of all sortes (good and bad) not so fewe as eight thowsand fully told. When he came into the prouince of TARSVS, he commaunded his men in no case to meddle with any thing, bicause the contrie was subiect vnto king Seleucus, whom he would in no wise displease. But when he sawe it was impossible to stay his men being now brought to such extremitie and neede, & that Agathocles had bard vp the straights and passages of mount Taurus against him: he wrote a letter vnto Seleucus, first declaring his miserable state and hard fortune, and then presenting his humble petition and request vnto him, praying him to take pitie vpon his frend, whom spitefull fortune had throwen into such misserie and calamitie, that coulde not but moue his greateste enemies to haue compassion of him. These letters somewhat softened Seleucus hart, insomuche that he wrote to his Gouernors and Lieutenauntes of those partes, to furnish Demetrius person with all thinges needefull for a Princes house, and vittells sufficient to maintaine his men. But one Patrocles, a graue wise man accounted, and Seleucus faithfull frend also, came to tell him, that the charge to entertaine Demetrius souldiers, was not the greateste fault he made therin, & most to be accõpted of: but that he did not wisely looke into his affaires, to suffer Demetrius to remaine in his cõtry, considering that he had alway bene a more fierce and venturous Prince then any other, to enterprise any matters of great importaunce, and nowe he was brought to such dispaire and extremitie, that he had framed his men which were but ranke cowardes (contrarie to their nature) to be most desperat & hardie in greateste daungers. Seleucus being moued with these perswasions, presently tooke his iorney into CILICIA with a great armie. Demetrius being astonied with this sodaine chaunge, and dreading so great an armie, got him to the strongest places of mount Taurus. Then he sent vnto Seleucus, first of all to pray him to suffer him to conquer certaine barbarous people thereaboutes, who liued according to their owne lawes, and neuer had king: to thend that he might yet there with safetie end the rest of his life and exile, staying at length in some place where he might be safe. Secondly if that liked him not, then that it woulde yet please him to vittell his men for the winter time onely, in the same place where they were, and not to be so hard harted vnto him as to driue him thence, lacking all needefull thinges, and so to put him into the mouth of his most cruell and mortall enemies. But Seleucus mistrusting his demaundes, sent vnto him that he shoulde winter if he thought good, two monethes, but no more, in the contrie of CATAONIA, so he gaue him the chiefest of his frendes for ostages: howbeit in the meane time he stopped vp all the wayes & passages going from thence into SYRIA. Demetrius nowe seeing him selfe kept in of all sides, like a beast to be taken in the toyle: he was driuen to trust to his owne strength. Thereuppon he ouerranne the contry thereaboutes, and as often as it was his chaunce to haue any skirmish or conflict with Seleucus, he had euer the better of him: and sometime also when they draue the armed cartes with sithes against him, he ouercame them, and put the rest to flight. Then he draue them away that kept the toppe of the mountaines, and had barred the passages to kepe him that he should not goe into SYRIA, and so kept them him selfe. In fine, finding his mens hartes lift vp againe, and pretily encoraged: his hart also grewe so bigge, that he determined to fight a battell with Seleucus, and to set all at sixe and seuen. So that Seleucus was at a straight with him selfe, and wist not what to doe. For he had returned backe the ayde which Lysimachus sent vnto him, bicause he was affrayed of him, and mistrusted him. On thother side also he durst not fight with Demetrius alone, being affrayed to venter him selfe with a desperate man: and also mistrusting muche his vnconstant fortune, the which hauing brought him to great extremitie, raised him vp againe to great prosperitie. But in the meane space Demetrius fell into a great sickenesse, the which brought his bodie very weake and low, and had almost vtterly ouerthrowen his affaires. For his souldiers, some of them yeelded them selues to his enemies, and others stale away without leaue, and went where they listed. Afterwardes when he had hardly recouered his health, and within forty dayes space was pretily growen to strength againe: with those few souldiers that remained with him, he seemed to his enemies, that

A that he would goe and inuade CILICIA. But then ſodainly in the night without ſownding any trumpet, he remoued his campe, and went another way: and hauing paſſed ouer mount Amanus, he ſpoyled all the contry vnder it, as farre as the region of CYRRESTICA. But Seleucus followed him, and camped hard by him. Thereuppon Demetrius ſodainly armed his men, and went out by night to aſſault Seleucus, and to take him ſleping when he miſtruſted nothing. So that Seleucus knew nothing of his ſtealing on him but late enough, vntil that certaine traitors of Demetrius campe that fled before, went quickly to aduertiſe him finding him aſleepe, and brought him newes of the daunger he was in. Then Seleucus in a maſe and feare withall, got vp, and ſownded the alarom: and as he was putting on his hoſe and making him ready he cryed out, (ſpeaking to his friends and familliers about him) we haue now a cruell and daun-B gerous beaſt to deale with. Demetrius on the other ſide perceiuing by the great ſturre & noyſe he heard in the enemies campe, that his enterpriſe was diſcouered: he retyred againe with ſpeede, and the next morning by breake of day, Seleucus went and offred him battell. Demetrius prepared him ſelfe to ioyne with him, and hauing giuen one of his faithfull friendes the leading of one of the wings of his armie, him ſelfe led the other, and ouerthrew ſome of his enemies on his ſide. But Seleucus in the middeſt of the battell lighted from his horſe, and taking his helmet from his head, he tooke a target on his arme, and went to the firſt rankes of his armie, to make him ſelfe knowen vnto Demetrius men: perſwading them to yeeld them ſelues vnto him, and to acknowledge in the end, that he had ſo long time deferred to giue them battell, rather to ſaue them, then to ſpare Demetrius. Demetrius ſouldiers hearing him ſay ſo, they C did him humble reuerence, and acknowledging him for their king, they all yeelded vnto him. Demetrius hauing ſundry times before proued ſo many chaunges & ouerthrowes of fortune, thinking yet to ſcape this laſt alſo, & to paſſe it ouer: he fled vnto the gates Amanides, which are certaine ſtraights of the mount Amanus. There he founde certaine litle thicke groues, where he determined to ſtay all night with certaine gentlemen of his houſe, and a fewe other of his houſhold ſeruaunts & officers which had followed him: meaning, if he could poſſible, to take his way towards the citie of CAVNVS, to goe to that ſea coaſt, hoping to heare of his ſhippes there. But when it was tolde him he had no vittells nor prouiſion left onely to ſerue him that day: he began then to deuiſe ſome other way. At length, one of his familliar friends Soſigenes came vnto him, that had foure hundred peeces of golde about him in his girdell. So D hoping that with the ſame money he might flie to the ſea, they tooke their way by night directly, to the toppe of the mountaine. But when they perceiued that the enemies kept watch there, and that there were great ſtore of fires hard by them: they then diſpaired to paſſe any further, leaſt they ſhould be ſeene. So they returned to the ſelfe ſame place from whence they came, not all of them, for ſome of them fled: neither had they that remayned alſo any life in them as before. So, one among the reſt tooke vpon him, to ſay, that there was no other way to ſcape, but to put Demetrius into Seleucus hands. Demetrius therewithall drew out his ſword, and would haue ſlaine him ſelfe: but his friends about him would not ſuffer him, but perſwaded him to yeld him ſelfe vnto Seleucus. Thereuppon he ſent vnto Seleucus, to tell him that he yelded him ſelfe vnto him. Seleucus was ſo ioyfull of the newes, that he ſayd it was not Deme- E trius good fortune that ſaued him, but his owne: who beſides many other happy good turnes ſhe had done him, gaue him yet ſo honorable occaſion and good happe, as to make the world to knowe his clemencie & curteſie. Thereuppon immediatly he called for his officers of houſhold, and commaunded them to ſet vp his richeſt pauilion, and to prepare all thinges meete to receiue him honorably. There was one Appolonides a gentleman in Seleucus Court, who ſometime had bene very familliar with Demetrius: Him Seleucus ſent immediatly vnto Demetrius, to will him to be of good chere, and not to be affrayd to come to the king his Maiſter, for he ſhould find him his very good friend. So ſoone as the kings pleaſure was knowen, a few of his Courtiers went at the firſt to meete him: but afterwards, euery man ſtriued who ſhould goe meete him firſt, bicauſe they were all in hope that he ſhould preſently be much made of, F and growe in credit with Seleucus. But hereby they turned Seleucus pitie into enuie, and gaue occaſion alſo to Demetrius enemies and ſpitefull men, to turne the kings bountifull good nature from him. For they put into his head many doubts and daungers, ſaying, that certainly ſo soone as the souldiers sawe him, there would grow great sturre and chaunge in their campe. A And therefore, shortly after that Apollonides was come vnto Demetrius, being glad to bringe him these good newes, and as others also followed him one after another, bringing him some good words from Seleucus, and that Demetrius him self after so great an ouerthrow (although that before he thought it a shamefull part of him to haue yeelded his body into his enemies hands) chaunged his mind at that time, and began then to grow bold, & to haue good hope to recouer his state againe: behold, there came one of Seleucus Captaines called Pausanias, accompanied with a thowsand footemen & horsemen in all, who compassed in Demetrius with them, and made the rest depart that were come vnto him before, hauing charge giuen him not to bring him to the Court, but to conuey him into CHERRONESVS of SYRIA, whether he was brought, and euer after had a strong garrison about him to keepe him. But otherwise, Seleucus sent him Officers, money, and all things els meete for a Princes house: and his ordinary fare was so delicate, that he could wishe for no more then he had. And furthermore, he had places of libertie and pleasure appointed him, both to ride his horse in, and also pleasant walkes, and goodly arbors to walke or sit in, & fine parkes full of beasts where he might hunt. moreouer, the king suffered his owne household seruaunts that followed him when he fled, to remaine with him if they would. And furthermore, there daily came some one or other vnto him from Seleucus, to comfort him, and to put him in hope, that so soone as Antiochus & Stratonice were come, they would make some good agreement and peace betwene them. Demetrius remaining in this estate, wrote vnto his sonne Antigonus, and to his friends and Lieuetenants which he had at CORINTHE, & ATHENS, that they should giue no credit to any letters C written in his name, though his seale were to them: but that they should keepe the townes they had in charge for his sonne Antigonus, and all the rest of his forces, as if he him selfe were dead. When Antigonus heard the pitifull captiuitie of his father, he maruelous greeuously tooke his hard fortune, wearing blackes for sorrow, and wrote vnto all the other kings, but vnto Seleucus specially, beseeching him to take him as a pledge for his father, & that he was ready to yeld vp al that he kept, to haue his fathers libertie. The like request did many cities make vnto him, and in manner all Princes, but Lysimachus: who promised Seleucus a great summe of money to put Demetrius to death. But Seleucus, who of long time had no great fancie to Lysimachus, but rather vtterly despised him: did then thinke him the more cruell and barbarous, for this vile and wicked request he made vnto him. Wherefore he still delayed time, bicause D he would haue Demetrius deliuered by his sonne Antiochus and Stratonices meanes, for that Demetrius should be bownd to them for his deliuerie, and for euer should acknowledge it to them. Now for Demetrius, as he from the beginning paciently tooke his hard fortune, so did he daily more and more forget the miserie he was in. For first of al, he gaue him selfe to riding and hunting, as farre as the place gaue him libertie. Then by litle and litle he grew to be very grosse, and to giue ouer such pastimes, and therewithall he fell into dronkennes and dycing: so that in that sort he passed away the most part of his time, as it should seeme, either to auoid the greuous thoughts of his hard fortune, which came into his mind when he was sober: or els vnder culler of dronkennes and eating, to shadow the thoughts he had: or els finding in him selfe that it was that manner of life he had long desired, and that through his vaine am- E bition and follie till that time he could neuer attayne vnto, greatly turmoyling and troubling him selfe and others, supposing to find in warres, by sea & land, the felicitie and delight which he had found in ease and idlenes, when he nether thought of it, nor loked for it. For what better ende can euill and vnaduised kings and Princes looke for, of all their troubles, daungers, and warres? who in deede deceiue them selues greatly, not onely for that they followe their pleasure and delights as their chiefest felicitie, in steede of vertue and honest life: but also, bicause that in truth they can not be mery, and take their pleasure as they would. So, Demetrius after he had bene shut vp in CHERRONESVS three yeares together, by ease, grossenes, & dronkennes, fell sicke of a disease whereof he dyed, when he was foure and fiftye yeare old. Therefore was Seleucus greatly blamed, and he him selfe also did much repent him that he so suspected him as he did, and that he followed not Dromichetes curtesie, a barbarous man borne in THRACIA, who had so royally and curteously intreated Lysimachus, whom he had taken prisoner F

The death of Demetrius in Cherronesus.

A ner in the warres. But yet there was some tragicall pompe in the order of his funerall. For his sonne Antigonus vnderstãding that they brought him the ashes of his bodie, he tooke sea with all his shippes, and went to meete them, to receiue them in the Iles: and when he had receiued them, he set vp the funerall pot of golde (in the which were his embers) vppon the poope of his Admirall galley. So, all the cities and townes whereby they passed, or harbered, some of them did put garlands of flowers about the pot, others also sent a number of men thether in mourning apparell, to accompany and honor the conuoye, to the very solemnitie of his funeralls. In this sort sayled all the whole fleete towards the citie of CORINTHE, the pot being plainely seene farre of, standing on the toppe of the Admirall galley: all the place about it being hanged about with purple, and ouer it, the diademe or royall band, and about it also were B goodly younge men armed, which were as Pensioners to Demetrius. Furthermore, Xenophantus the famousest Musition in that time, being set hard by it, played a sweete and lamentable songe on the flute, wherewithall the ores keeping stroke and measure, the sownd did meete with a gallant grace, as in a conuoye where the mourners doe knocke their breastes, at the foote of euery verse. But that which most made the people of CORINTHE to weepe and lament, which ranne to the peere, and all alongest the shore side to see it: was Antigonus, whom they sawe all beblubbored with teares, apparrelled as a mourner in blackes. Nowe, after they had brought a wonderfull number of garlands and nosegayes, and cast them vppon the funerall pot, and had solemnized all the honors possible for the funeralls at CORINTHE: Antigonus caried away the pot to burye it in the citie of DEMETRIADE, the which bare the name of Demetrius that was deade, and was a newe citie, that had bene replenished with people, and C built of litle townes which are about IOLCOS. Demetrius left two children by his first wife Phila, to wete, Antigonus, and Stratonice: and two other sonnes, both of them named Demetrius, the one surnamed the leane, of a woman of ILLYRIA, and the other king of the CYRENIANS, of his wife Ptolemaide: and another by Deidamia called Alexander, who liued in ÆGYPT. And it is reported also, that he had another sonne called Corrhæbus, by his wife Eurydice, and that his posteritie raigned by succession from the father to the sonne, vntil the time of Perseus: who was the last king of MACEDON, whome the ROMANES ouercame by D Paulus AEmylius, & wanne all the Realme of MACEDON vnto the Empire of ROME. THE LIFE OF Marcus Antonius.

Antonius parentage.

ANTONIVS grandfather was that famous Orator whome Marius A ſlue, bicauſe he tooke Syllaes parte. His father was an other Antonius ſurnamed Cretan*, who was not ſo famous, nor bare any great ſway in the common wealth: howbeit otherwiſe he was an honeſt man, and of a very good nature, and ſpecially very liberall in giuing, as appeareth by an acte he did. He was not very wealthie, and therefore his wife would not let him vſe his liberalitie and francke nature. One day a friend of his comming to him to praye him to helpe him to ſome money, hauing great neede: Antonius by chaunce had no money to giue him, but he commaunded one of his men to bringe him ſome water in a ſiluer baſen, & after he had brought it him, he waſhed his beard as though he ment to haue ſhauen it, and B then found an arrant for his man to ſend him out, and gaue his friend the ſiluer baſen, and bad him get him money with that. Shortly after, there was a great ſturre in the houſe among the ſeruaunts, ſeeking out this ſiluer baſen. Inſomuch as Antonius ſeeing his wife maruelouſly offended for it, & that ſhe would examine all her ſeruaunts, one after another about it, to know what was become of it: at length he confeſſed he had giuen it away, & prayed her to be contented. His wife was Iulia, of the noble houſe and familie of Iulius Ceſar: who for her vertue & chaſtitie, was to be compared with the nobleſt Lady of her time. M. Antonius was brought vp vnder her, being married after her firſt husbands death, vnto Cornelius Lentulus, whom Cicero put to death with Cethegus, and others, for that he was of Catilines conſpiracie againſt the common wealth. And this ſeemeth to be the originall cauſe and beginning of the cruell and C mortall hate Antonius bare vnto Cicero. For Antonius ſelfe ſayth, that he would neuer giue him the body of his father in law to bury him, before his mother went firſt to intreat Cteeroes wife: the which vndoubtedly was a flat lye. For Cicero denied buriall to none of them, whom he executed by law. Now Antonius being a fayer younge man, and in the pryme of his youth: he fell acquainted with Curio, whoſe friendſhip and acquaintance (as it is reported) was a plague vnto him. For he was a diſſolute man, giuen ouer to all luſt and inſolencie, who to haue Antonius the better at his commaundement, trayned him on into great follies, and vaine expences

A vpon women, in rioting & banketing. So that in short time, he brought Antonius into a marueious great det, & too great for one of his yeres, to wete: of two hundred & fifty talents, for all which summe Curio was his suertie. His father hearing of it, did put his sonne from him, and forbad him his house. Then he fell in with Clodius, one of the desperatest and most wicked Tribunes at that time in ROME. Him he followed for a time in his desperate attempts, who bred great sturre and mischiefe in ROME: but at length he forsooke him, being weary of his rashnes and folly, or els for that he was affraid of them that were bent against Clodius. Thereupon he left ITALY, and went into GRECE, and there bestowed the most parte of his tyme, sometime in warres, and otherwhile in the studie of eloquence. He vsed a manner of phrase in his speeche, called Asiatik, which caried the best grace and estimation at that time, and B was much like to his manners and life: for it was full of ostentation, foolishe brauerie, and vaine ambition. After he had remayned there some tyme, Gabinius Proconsul going into SYRIA, perswaded him to goe with him. Antonius tolde him he would not goe as a priuate man: Wherefore Gabinius gaue him charge of his horsemen, and so tooke him with him. So first of all he sent him against Aristobulus, who had made the IEWES to rebell, & was the first man him selfe that got vp to the wall of a castell of his, and so draue Aristobulus out of all his holds: and with those few men he had with him, he ouercame al the IEWES in set battel, which were many against one, and put all of them almost to the sword, and furthermore, tooke Aristobulus him selfe prisoner with his sonne. Afterwards Ptolomy king of ÆGYPT, that had bene driuen out of his contry, went vnto Gabinius to intreate him to goe with his armie with him into C ÆGYPT, to put him againe into his kingdom: and promised him if he would goe with him, tenne thowsand talents. The most part of the Captaines thought it not best to goe thither, & Gabinius him selfe made it daintie to enter into this warre: although the couetousnes of these tenne thowsand talents stucke sorely with him. But Antonius that sought but for oportunitie and good occasion to attempt great enterprises, and that desired also to gratifie Ptolomyes request: he went about to perswade Gabinius to goe this voyage. Now they were more affrayd of the way they should goe, to come to the cite of PELVSIVM, then they feared any daunger of the warre besides: bicause they were to passe through deepe sandes & desert places, where was no freshe water to be had all the marisses thorough, which are called the marisses Serbonides, which the ÆGYPTIANS call the exhalations or fume, by the which the Gyant Typhon D breathed. But in truth it appeareth to be the ouerflowing of the red sea, which breaketh out vnder the ground in that place, where it is deuided in the narrowest place from the sea on this side. So Antonius was sent before into ÆGYPT with his horsemen, who did not onely winne that passage, but also tooke the citie of PELVSIVM, (which is a great citie) with all the souldiers in it: and thereby he cleared the way, and made it safe for all the rest of the armie, and the hope of the victorie also certaine for his Captaine. Nowe did the enemies them selues feele the frutes of Antonius curtesie, and the desire he had to winne honor. For when Ptolomy (after he had entred into the citie of PELVSIVM) for the malice he bare vnto the citie, would haue put all the ÆGYPTIANS in it to the sword: Antonius withstoode him, & by no meanes would suffer him to doe it. And in all other great battells and skirmishes which they fought, and E were many in number, Antonius did many noble actes of a valliant and wise Captaine: but specially in one battell, where he compassed in the enemies behind, giuing them the victorie that fought against them, whereby he afterwards had such honorable reward, as his valliantnes deserued. So was his great curtesie also much commended of all, the which he shewed vnto Archelaus. For hauing bene his very friend, he made warre with him against his will while he liued: but after his death he sought for his bodye, and gaue it honorable buriall. For those respects he wanne him selfe great fame of them of ALEXANDRIA, and he was also thought a worthy man of all the souldiers in the ROMANES campe. But besides all this, he had a noble presence, and shewed a countenaunce of one of a noble house: he had a goodly thicke heard, a broad forehead, crooke nosed, and there appeared such a manly looke in his countenaunce, F as is commonly seene in Hercules pictures, stamped or grauen in metuell. Now it had bene a speeche of old time, that the familie of the Antonij were discended from one Anton, the sonne of Hercules, whereof the familie tooke name. This opinion did Antonius seeke to confirme in all his doings: not onely resembling him in the likenes of his bodye, as we haue sayd before, but also in the wearing of his garments. For when he would openly shewe him selfe abroad before many people, he would alwayes weare his cassocke gyrt downe lowe vpon his hippes, with a great sword hanging by his side, and vpon that, some ill fauored cloke. Furthermore, things that seeme intollerable in other men, as to boast commonly, to ieast with one or other, to drinke like a good fellow with euery body, to sit with the souldiers when they dine, and to eate and drinke with them souldierlike: it is incredible what wonderfull loue it wanne him amongest them. And furthermore, being giuen to loue: that made him the more desired, and by that meanes he brought many to loue him. For he would further euery mans loue, and also would not be angry that men should merily tell him of those he loued. But besides all this, that which most procured his rising and aduauncement, was his liberalitie, who gaue all to the souldiers, and kept nothing for him selfe: and when he was growen to great credit, then was his authoritie and power also very great, the which notwithstanding him selfe did ouerthrowe, by a thowsand other faults he had. In this place I will shewe you one example onely of his wonderful liberalitie. He commaunded one day his coferer that kept his money, to giue a friend of his 25. Myriades: which the Romanes call in their tongue, Decies. His coferer marueling at it, and being angry withall in his minde, brought him all this money in a heape together, to shewe him what a maruelous masse of money it was. Antonius seeing it as he went by, asked what it was: his coferer aunswered him, it was the money he willed him to giue vnto his friend. Then Antonius perceiuing the spight of his man, I thought, sayd he, that Decies had bene a greater summe of money then it is, for this is but a trifle: and therefore he gaue his friend as much more another tyme, but that was afterwardes. Nowe the Romanes mainteyning two factions at Rome at that tyme, one against the other, of the which, they that tooke part with the Senate, did ioyne with Pompey being then in Rome: and the contrary side taking part with the people, sent for Cæsar to ayde them, who made warres in Gavle. Then Curio Antonius friend, that had chaunged his garments, and at that tyme tooke parte with Cæsar, whose enemie he had bene before: he wanne Antonius, and so handled the matter, partly through the great credit and swaye he bare amongest the people, by reason of his eloquent tongue: and partly also by his exceeding expence of money he made which Cæsar gaue him: that Antonius was chosen Tribune, and afterwards made Augure. But this was a great helpe and furtheraunce to Cæsars practises. For so soone as Antonius became Tribune he did oppose him selfe against those thinges which the Consul Marcellus preferred: (who ordeyned that certaine legions which had bene already leauied and billed, should be giuen vnto Cneus Pompey, with further commission and authoritie to leauye others vnto them) and set downe an order, that the souldiers which were already leauied and assembled, should be sent into Syria, for a newe supplie vnto Marcus Bibulus, who made warre at that tyme against the Parthians. And furthermore, prohibition that Pompey should leauy no more men, and also that the souldiers should not obey him. Secondly, where Pompeys friends and followers would not suffer Cæsars letters to be receiued, and openly red in the Senate: Antonius hauing power and warrant by his person, through the holines of his tribuneship, did read them openly, and made diuers men chaunge their mindes: for it appeared to them that Cæsar by his letters required no vnreasonable matters. At length, when they preferred two matters of consideracion vnto the Senate, whether they thought good that Pompey, or Cæsar, should leaue their armie: there were few of the Senators that thought it meete Pompey should leaue his armie, but they all in manner commaunded Cæsar to doe it. Then Antonius rising vp, asked whether they thought it good that Pompey and Cæsar both, should leaue their armies. Thereunto all the Senators ioyntly together gaue their whole consent, and with a great crye commending Antonius, they prayed him to referre it to the iudgement of the Senate. But the Consuls would not allowe of that. Therefore Cæsars friendes preferred other reasonable demaunds and requests againe, but Cato spake against them: and Lentulus, one of the Consuls draue Antonius by force out of the Senate, who at his going out made greuous curses against him. After that, he tooke a slaues gowne, and speedily fled to Cæsar, with Quintus Cassius, in a hyered coch. When they came to Cæsar, they cryed out with open mouth, that all went hand ouer

A ouer head at ROME: for the Tribunes of the people might not speake their mindes, and were driuen away in great daunger of their liues, as many as stoode with lawe and iustice. Hereupon Cæsar incontinently went into ITALY with his army, which made Cicero say in his Philippides: that as Hellen was cause of the warre of TROY, so was Antonius the author of the ciuill warres, which in deede was a starke lye. For Cæsar was not so fickle headed, nor so easily caried away with anger, that he would so sodainly haue gone and made warre with his contry, vpon the sight onely of Antonius and Cassius, being fled vnto him in miserable apparell, and in a hyered coche: had he not long before determined it with him selfe. But sith in deed Cæsar looked of long time but for some culler, this came as he wished, and gaue him iust occasion of warre. But to say truely, nothing els moued him to make warre with all the world as he did, but one

Cicero reproued for lying.

B selfe cause, which first procured Alexander and Cyrus also before him: to wit, an insatiable desire to raigne, with a senseles couetousnes to be the best man in the world, the which he could not come vnto, before he had first put downe Pompey, and vtterly ouerthrowen him. Now, after that Cæsar had gotten ROME at his commaundement, & had driuen Pompey out of ITALY, he purposed first to goe into SPAYNE, against the legions Pompey had there: and in the meane time to make prouision for shippes and marine preparacion, to follow Pompey. In his absence, he left Lepidus that was Prætor, gouernor of ROME: and Antonius that was Tribune, he gaue him charge of all the souldiers, and of ITALY. Then was Antonius straight marueilously commended and beloued of the souldiers, bicause he commonly exercised him self among them, and would oftentimes eate and drinke with them, and also be liberall vnto them, according to Alexander, Cyrus, & Cæsar all contended to raigne.

C his abilitie. But then in contrary manner, he purchased diuers other mens euill willes, bicause that through negligence he would not doe them iustice that were iniuried, & dealt very churlishly with them that had any sute vnto him: and besides all this, he had an ill name to intise mens wiues. To conclude, Cæsars friends that gouerned vnder him, were cause why they hated Cæsars gouernment (which in deede in respect of him selfe was no lesse then a tyrannie) by reason of the great insolencies & outragious parts that were committed: amongst whom Antonius, that was of greatest power, and that also committed greatest faultes, deserued most blame. But Cæsar notwithstanding, when he returned from the warres of SPAYNE, made no reckoning of the complaints that were put vp against him: but contrarily, bicause he found him a hardy man, & a valliant Captaine, he employed him in his chiefest affayres, and was no

So he passed ouer the IONIAN sea vnto BRVNDVSIVM, being but slenderly accompanied: & sent vnto Antonius, & Gabinius, that they should vnbarke their men as soone as they could, and passe them ouer into MACEDON. Gabinius was affrayd to take the sea, bicause it was very roughe, and in the winter time: & therefore fetched a great compasse about by land. But Antonius fearing some daunger might come vnto Cæsar, bicause he was compassed in with a great number of enemies: first of all he draue away Libo, who roade at ancker with a great armie, before the hauen of BRVNDVSIVM. For he manned out such a number of pynnasies, barks, and other small boates about euery one of his gallies, that he draue him thence. After that, he imbarked into shippes twenty thowsand footemen, and eyght hundred horsemen, and with this armie he hoysed sayle. When the enemies sawe him,

E they made out to followe him: but the sea rose so highe, that the billowes put backe their gallies that they could not come neare him, and so he scaped that daunger. But withall he fell vppon the rockes with his whole fleete, where the sea wrought very highe: so that he was out of all hope to saue him selfe. Yet by good fortune, sodainely the winde turned South-west, and blewe from the gulffe, driuing the waues of the riuer into the mayne sea. Thus Antonius loosing from the lande, and sayling with safetie at his pleasure, soone after he sawe all the coastes full of shippewracks. For the force and boysterousnes of the winde, did cast away the gallies that followed him: of the which, many of them were broken and splitted, and diuers also cast away, and Antonius tooke a great number of them prisoners, with a great summe of money also. Besides all these, he tooke the citie of LYSSVS, and brought Cæsar a great Trebellius & Aſinius diſſwaded from it al they could poſſible. So by good hap it chaunced that by this meanes, he got the il will of the cōmon people, & on the other ſide, the noble men (as time in hearing of fooliſh playes, or in marrying theſe plaiers, tomblers, ieaſters, & ſuch ſort of people. As for proſe hereof it is reported, that at Hippias mariage, one of his ieaſters, he drank wine ſo luſtely all night, that the next morning when he came to pleade before the people aſalſo very much, to ſee that when he went into the contry, he caried with him a great number of cubbords ful of ſiluer & gold plate, openly in the face of the world, as it had ben the pompe or ſhewe of ſome triumphe: & that eftſoones in the middeſt of his iorney he would ſet vp his hales and tents hard by ſome greene groue or pleaſaunt riuer, and there his Cookes ſhould prepare him a ſumptuous dinner. And furthermore, Lyons were harneſed in traſes to drawe his carts: and beſides alſo, in honeſt mens houſes in the cities where he came, he would haue common harlots, cuttiſans, & theſe tumbling gillots lodged. Now it greued men much, to ſee that Cæsar ſhould be out of ITALY following of his enemies, to end this great warre, with ſuch great perill and daunger: and that others in the meane time abuſing his name and authoritie, F ſhould commit ſuch inſolent and outragious parts vnto their Citizens. This me thinkes was the cauſe that made the conſpiracie againſt Cæsar increaſe more and more, and layed the reynes of the brydle vppon the ſouldiers neckes, whereby they durſt boldlier commit many extorſions,

A extorsions, cruelties and robberies. And therefore Cæsar after his returne pardoned Dolabella, & being created Consul the third time, he tooke not Antonius, but chose Lepidus, his colleague and fellow Consul. Afterwards when Pompeys house was put to open sale, Antonius bought it but when they asked him money for it, he made it very straung, and was offended with them, and writeth him selfe that he would not goe with Cæsar into the warres of Africk, bicause he was not well recompenced for the seruice he had done him before. Yet Cæsar did somewhat bridle his madnes and insolencie, not suffering him to passe his faulte so lightly away, making as though he sawe them not. And therefore he left his dissolute manner of life, and married Fuluia that was Clodius widowe, a woman not so basely minded to spend her time in spinning and housewiuery, and was not contented to master her husband at home, but would B also rule him in his office abroad, and commaund him, that commaunded legions and great armies: so that Cleopatra was to giue Fuluia thankes for that she had taught Antonius this obedience to women, that learned so well to be at their commaundement. Nowe, bicause Fuluia was somewhat sower, and crooked of condition, Antonius deuised to make her pleasaunter, & somewhat better disposed: and therefore he would playe her many prety youthfull partes to make her mery. As he did once, when Cæsar returned the last time of all Conqueror out of Spayne, euery man went out to meete him: and so did Antonius with the rest. But on the sodeine there ranne a rumor through Italy, that Cæsar was dead, and that his enemies came againe with a great armie. Thereuppon he returned with speede to Rome, and tooke one of his mens gownes, and so apparelled came home to his house in a darke night, saying that he C had brought Fuluia letters from Antonius. So he was let in, and brought to her mustled as he was, for being knowen: but she taking the matter heauily, asked him if Antonius were well. Antonius gaue her the letters, and sayd neuer a word. So when she had opened the letters, and beganne to read them: Antonius ramped of her necke, and kissed her. We haue told you this tale for examples sake onely, and so could we also tell you of many such like as these. Nowe when Cæsar was returned from his last warre in Spayne, all the chiefest nobilitie of the citie road many dayes iorney from Rome to meete him, where Cæsar made maruelous much of Antonius, aboue all the men that came vnto him. For he alwayes tooke him into his coche with him, through out all Italy: and behind him, Brutus Albinus, and Octauius, the sonne of his Nece, who afterwards was called Cæsar, and became Emperor of Rome long time after. D So Cæsar being afterwards chosen Consul the fift time, he immediatly chose Antonius his colleague and companion: and desired by deposing him selfe of his Consulship, to make Dolabella Consul in his roome, and had already moued it to the Senate. But Antonius did stowtly withstand it, and openly reuiled Dolabella in the Senate: and Dolabella also spared him as litle. Thereuppon Cæsar being ashamed of the matter, he let it alone. Another time also when Cæsar attempted againe to substitute Dolabella Consul in his place, Antonius cryed out, that the signes of the birdes were against it: so that at length Cæsar was compelled to giue him place, and to let Dolabella alone, who was maruelously offended with him. Now in truth, Cæsar made no great reckoning of either of them both. For it is reported that Cæsar aunswered one that did accuse Antonius and Dolabella vnto him for some matter of conspiracie: tushe said he, they E be not those fat fellowes and fine comed men that I feare, but I mistrust rather these pale and leane men, meaning by Brutus and Cassius, who afterwards conspired his death, and slue him. Antonius vnwares afterwards, gaue Cæsars enemies iust occasion and culler to doe as they did: as you shall heare. The Romanes by chaunce celebrated the feast called Lupercalia, & Cæsar being apparelled in his triumphing robe, was set in the Tribune where they vse to make their orations to the people, and from thence did behold the sport of the runners. The manner of this running was this. On that day there are many young men of noble house, and those specially that be chiefe Officers for that yeare: who running naked vp & downe the citie annointed with the oyle of olyue, for pleasure do strike them they meete in their way, with white leather thongs they haue in their hands. Antonius being one amonge the rest that was to ronne, F leauing the auncient ceremonies & old customes of that solemnitie: he ranne to the Tribune where Cæsar was set, and caried a laurell crowne in his hand, hauing a royall band or diademe wreathed about it, which in old time was the auncient marke and token of a king. When he was come to Cæsar, he made his fellow ronners with him lift him vp, & ſo he did put this laurell crowne vpon his head, ſignifying thereby that he had deſerued to be king. But Cæsar making as though he refuſed it, turned away his heade. The people were ſo reioyced at it, that they all clapped their hands for ioy. Antonius againe did put it on his head: Cæsar againe refuſed it, and thus they were ſtriuing of and on a great while together. As oft as Antonius did put this laurell crowne vnto him, a fewe of his followers reioyced at it: & as oft alſo as Cæsar refuſed it, all the people together clapped their hands. And this was a wonderfull thing, that they ſuffered all things ſubiects ſhould doe by commaundement of their kings: & yet they could not abide the name of a king, deteſting it as the vtter deſtructiō of their liberty. Cæsar in a rage roſe out of his ſeate, and plucking downe the choller of his gowne from his necke, he ſhewed it naked, bidding any man ſtrike of his head that would. This laurel crowne was afterwards put vpō the head of one of Cæsars ſtatues or images, the which one of the Tribunes pluckt of. The people liked his doing therein ſo well, that they wayted on him home to his houſe, with great clapping of hands. Howbeit Cæsar did turne thē out of their offices for it. This was a good incoragemēt for Brutus & Caſſius to conſpire his death, who fel into a cōſort with their truſtieſt friends, to execute their enterpriſe: but yet ſtood doubtful whether they ſhould make Antonius priuy to it or not. Al the reſt liked of it, ſauing Trebonius only. He told them, that when they rode to meete Cæsar at his returne out of SPAYNE, Antonius & he alwaies keping company, & lying together by the way, he felt his mind a farre of: but Antonius finding his meaning, would harken no more vnto it, & yet notwithſtanding neuer made Cæsar acquainted with this talke, but had faithfully kept it to him ſelf. After that they cōſulted whether they ſhould kil Antonius with Cæsar. But Brutus would in no wiſe conſent to it, ſaying: that ventring on ſuch an enterpriſe as that, for the maintenāce of law & iuſtice, it ought to be elere from all villanie. Yet they fearing Antonius power, & the authoritie of his office, appointed certain of the cōſpiracy, that when Cæsar were gone into the Senate, and while others ſhould execute their enterpriſe, they ſhould keepe Antonius in a talke out of the Senate houſe. Euen as they had deuiſed theſe matters, ſo were they executed: and Cæsar was ſlaine in the middeſt of the Senate. Antonius being put in a feare withall, caſt a ſlaues gowne vpon him, and hid him ſelfe. But afterwards when it was told him that the murtherers ſlue no man els, and that they went onely into the Capitoll: he ſent his ſonne vnto them for a pledge, & bad them boldly come downe vpon his word. The ſelfe ſame day he did bid Caſſius to ſupper, and Lepidus alſo bad Brutus. The next morning the Senate was aſſembled, & Antonius him ſelfe preferred a lawe that all things paſt ſhould be forgotten, and that they ſhould appoint prouinces, vnto Caſſius and Brutus: the which the Senate confirmed, and further ordeyned, that they ſhould cancell none of Cæsars lawes. Thus went Antonius out of the Senate more prayſed, and better eſteemed, then euer man was: bicauſe it ſeemed to euery man that he had cut of all occaſion of ciuill warres, and that he had ſhewed him ſelfe a maruelous wiſe gouernor of the common wealth, for the appeaſing of theſe matters of ſo great waight & importance. But nowe, the opinion he conceiued of him ſelfe after he had a litle felt the good will of the people towards him, hoping thereby to make him ſelfe the chiefeſt man if he might ouercome Brutus: did eaſily make him alter his firſt mind. And therefore when Cæsars body was brought to the place where it ſhould be buried, he made a funeral oration in cōmendacion of Cæsar, according to the auncient cuſtom of praiſing noble men at their funerals. When he ſaw that the people were very glad and deſirous alſo to heare Cæsar ſpoken of, & his praiſes vttered: he mingled his oration with lamentable wordes, and by amplifying of matters did greatly moue their harts and affections vnto pitie & compaſſion. In fine to conclude his oration, he vnfolded before the whole aſſembly the bloudy garments of the dead, thruſt through in many places with their ſwords, & called the malefactors, cruell & curſed murtherers. With theſe words he put the people into ſuch a fury, that they preſently toke Cæsars body, & burnt it in the market place, with ſuch tables & fourmes as they could get together. Then whē the fire was kindled, they toke firebrands, & ran to the murtherers houſes to ſet thē afire, & to make thē come out to fight. Brutus therfore & his accomplices, for ſafety of their perſons were driuē to fly the city. Then came all Cæsars friends vnto Antonius, & ſpecially his wife Calpurnia putting her truſt in him, ſhe brought the moſte part of her money into his

A his houſe, which amounted to the ſumme of foure thowſand talents, & furthermore brought him al Cæſars bokes & writings, in the which were his memorials of al that he had done & ordeyned. Antonius did daily mingle with them ſuch as he thought good, and by that meanes he created newe officers, made newe Senators, called home ſome that were baniſhed, and deliuered thoſe that were priſoners: and then he ſayde that all thoſe thinges were ſo appoynted and ordeyned by Cæſar. Therefore the ROMANES mocking them that were ſo moued, they called them CHARONITES: bicauſe that when they were ouercome, they had no other helpe but to ſaye, that thus they were found in Cæſars memorialls, who had ſayled in Charons boate, and was departed. Thus Antonius ruled abſolutely alſo in all other matters, bicauſe he was Conſul, and Caius one of his brethren Prætor, and Lucius the other, Tribune. Now thinges re-

B mayning in this ſtate at ROME, Octauius Cæſar the younger came to ROME, who was the ſonne of Iulius Cæſars Nece, as you haue heard before, and was left his lawefull heire by will, remayning at the tyme of the death of his great Vncle that was ſlayne, in the citie of APOLLONIA. This young man at his firſt arriuall went to ſalute Antonius, as one of his late dead father Cæſars friendes, who by his laſt will and teſtament had made him his heire: and withall, he was preſently in hande with him for money and other thinges which were left of truſt in his handes, bicauſe Cæſar had by will bequeathed vnto the people of ROME, three ſcore and fifteene ſiluer Drachmas to be giuen to euery man, the which he as heire ſtoode charged withall. Antonius at the firſt made no reckoning of him, bicauſe he was very younge: and ſayde he lacked witte, and good friendes to aduiſe him, if he looked to take ſuch a charge in

But when Antonius ſaw that he could not ſhake him of with thoſe wordes, and that he was ſtill in hande with him for his fathers goods, but ſpecially for the ready money: then he ſpake and did what he could againſt him. And firſt of all, it was he that did keepe him from being Tribune of the people: and alſo when Octauius Cæſar beganne to meddle with the dedicating of the chayer of gold, which was prepared by the Senate to honor Cæſar with: he threatned to ſend him to priſon, and moreouer deſiſted not to put the people in an vprore. This young Cæſar ſeeing his doings, went vnto Cicero and others, which were Antonius enemies, and by them crept into fauor with the Senate: and he him ſelf ſought the peoples good will euery manner of way, gathering together the olde ſouldiers of

But the very ſame night Antonius had a ſtraunge dreame, who thought that lightning fell vpon him, & burnt his right hand. Shortly after word was brought him, that Cæſar lay in waite to kil him. Cæſar cleered him ſelfe vnto him, and told him there was no ſuch matter: but he could not make Antonius beleue the contrary. Whereuppon they became further enemies then euer they were: inſomuch that both of them made friends of either ſide to gather together all the old ſouldiers through ITALY, that were diſperſed in diuers townes: & made them large promiſes, & ſought alſo to winne the legions of their ſide, which were already in armes. Cicero on the other ſide being at that time the chiefeſt man of authoritie & eſtimation in the citie, he ſtirred vp al mē againſt Antonius: ſo that in the end he made the Senate pronoūce him an enemy to his contry, & appoin-

Theſe two Conſuls together with Cæſar, who alſo had an armye, went againſt Antonius that beſeeged the citie of MODENA, and there ouerthrew him in battell: but both the Conſuls were ſlaine there. Antonius flying vpon this ouerthrowe, fell into great miſerie all atonce: but the chiefeſt want of all other, & that pinched him moſt, was famine. Howbeit he was of ſuch a ſtrong nature, that by pacience he would ouercome any aduerſitie, and the heauier fortune lay vpon him, the more conſtant ſhewed he him ſelfe. example to the ſouldiers, to ſee Antonius that was brought vp in all fineues and ſuperfluitie, ſo eaſily to drinke puddle water, and to eate wild frutes and rootes: and moreouer it is reported, that euen as they paſſed the Alpes, they did eate the barcks of trees, and ſuch beaſts, as neuer man taſted of their fleſh before. Now their intent was to ioyne with the legions that were on the other ſide of the Mountaines, vnder Lepidus charge: whō Antonius tooke to be his friend, bicauſe he had holpen him to many things at Cæſars hand, through his meanes. When he was come to the place where Lepidus was, he camped hard by him: and when he ſaw that no man came to him to put him in any hope, he determined to venter him ſelfe, and to goe vnto Lepidus. Since the ouerthrow he had at MODENA, he ſuffred his beard to grow at length and neuer clypt it, that it was maruelous long, and the heare of his heade alſo without koming: and beſides all this, he went in a mourning gowne, and after this ſort came hard to the trenches of Lepidus campe. Then he beganne to ſpeake vnto the ſouldiers, and many of them their hartes yerned for pitie to ſee him ſo poorely arrayed, and ſome alſo through his wordes beganne to pitie him: inſomuch that Lepidus beganne to be affrayd, and therefore commaunded all the trompetts to ſownd together to ſtoppe the ſouldiers eares, that they ſhould not harken to Antonius. This notwithſtanding, the ſouldiers tooke the more pitie of him, & ſpake ſecretly with him by Clodius & Lælius meanes, whom they ſent vnto him diſguiſed in womens apparel, & gaue him counſel that he ſhould not be affraid to enter into their campe, for there were a great number of ſouldiers that would receiue him, and kill Lepidus, if he would ſay the word. Antonius would not ſuffer them to hurt him, but the next morning he went with his army to wade a ford, at a litle riuer that ranne betweene them: and him ſelfe was the foremoſt man that tooke the riuer to get ouer, ſeeing a number of Lepidus campe that gaue him their handes, plucked vp the ſtakes, and layed flat the bancke of their trenche to let him in to their campe. When he was come into their campe, and that he had all the army at his commaundement: he vſed Lepidus very curteouſly, imbraced him, and called him father: and though in deede Antonius did all, and ruled the whole army, yet he alway gaue Lepidus the name and honor of the Captaine. Munatius Plancus, lying alſo in campe hard by with an armye: vnderſtanding the report of Antonius curteſie, he alſo came and ioined with him. Thus Antonius being a foote againe, and growen of great power, repaſſed ouer the Alpes, leading into ITALY with him ſeuenteene legions, and tenne thowſand horſemen, beſides ſix legions he left in garriſon amonge the GAVLES, vnder the charge of one Varius, a companion of his that would drinke luſtely with him, and therefore in mockery was ſurnamed Cotylon: to wit, a bibber. So Octauius Cæſar would not leane to Cicero, when he ſaw that his whole trauail and endeuor was onely to reſtore the common wealth to her former libertie. Therefore he ſent certaine of his friends to Antonius, to make them friends againe: and thereuppon all three met together, (to wete, Cæſar, Antonius, & Lepidus) in an Iland enuyroned round about with a litle riuer, & there remayned three dayes together. Now as touching all other matters, they were eaſily agreed, & did deuide all the Empire of ROME betwene them, as if it had bene their owne inheritance. But yet they could hardly agree whom they would put to death: for euery one of them would kill their enemies, and ſaue their kinſmen and friends. Yet at length, giuing place to their gredy deſire to be reuenged of their enemies, they ſpurned all reuerence of bloud, and holines of friendſhip at their feete. For Cæſar left Cicero to Antonius will, Antonius alſo forſooke Lucius Cæſar, who was his Vncle by his mother: and both of them together ſuffred Lepidus to kill his owne brother Paulus. Yet ſome writers affirme, that Cæſar & Antonius requeſted Paulus might be ſlain, & that Lepidus was contēted with it. In my opinion there was neuer a more horrible, vnnatural, & crueller chaunge then this was. For thus chaunging murther for murther, they did aſwel kill thoſe whom they did forſake & leaue vnto others, as thoſe alſo which others left vnto them to kil: but ſo much more was their wickednes & cruelty great vnto their friends, for that they put them to death being innocents, & hauing no cauſe to hate them. After this plat was agreed vpon betwene thē: the ſouldiers that were thereabouts, would haue this friendſhip & league betwixt them cōfirmed by mariage, & that Cæſar ſhould mary Claudia, the daughter of Fuluia, & Antonius wife. This mariage alſo being agreed vpon, they condēned three hūdred of the chiefeſt citizens of ROME, to be put to death by proſcriptiō. And Antonius alſo cōmaū-

A ded thē to whō he had geuen cōmiſſion to kil Cicero, that they ſhould ſtrik of his head & right hand, with the which he had written the inuectiue Orations (called Philippides) againſt Antonius. So whē the murtherers brought him Ciceroes head & hand cut of, he beheld them a long time with great ioy, & laughed hartily, & that oftentimes for the great ioy he felt. Then when he had taken his pleaſure of the ſight of them, he cauſed them to be ſet vp in an open place, ouer the pulpit for Orations (where when he was aliue, he had often ſpoken to the people) as if he had done the dead man hurt, and not bleamiſhed his owne fortune, ſhewing him ſelfe (to his great ſhame and infamie) a cruell man, and vnworthie the office and authoritie he bare. His vncle Lucius Cæſar alſo, as they ſought for him to kill him, and followed him hard, fledde vnto his ſiſter. The murtherers comming thither, forcing to breake into her chamber, ſhe B ſtoode at her chamber dore with her armes abroade, crying out ſtill: you ſhall not kill Lucius Cæſar, before you firſt kill me, that bare your Captaine in my wombe. By this meanes ſhe ſaued her brothers life. Now the gouernment of theſe Triumuiri grewe odious and hatefull to the ROMANES, for diuers reſpects: but they moſt blamed Antonius, bicauſe he being elder then Cæſar, and of more power and force then Lepidus, gaue him ſelfe againe to his former riot and exceſſe, when he left to deale in the affaires of the common wealth. But ſetting aſide the ill name he had for his inſolencie, he was yet much more hated in reſpect of the houſe he dwelt in, the which was the houſe of Pompey the great: a man as famous for his temperaunce, modeſtie, and ciuill life, as for his three triumphes. For it grieued them to ſee the gates commonly ſhut againſt the Captaines, Magiſtrates of the citie, and alſo Ambaſſadors of ſtraunge na- C tions, which were ſometimes thruſt from the gate with violence: and that the houſe within was full of tomblers, anticke dauncers, iuglers, players, ieaſters, and dronkards, quaffing and goſeling, and that on them he ſpent and beſtowed the moſt parte of his money he got by all kind of poſſible extorcions, briberie and policie. For they did not onely ſell by the crier, the goods of thoſe whom they had outlawed, and appointed to murther, ſlaunderouſly deceiued the poore widowes and young orphanes, & alſo raiſed all kind of impoſts, ſubſidies, and taxes: but vnderſtanding alſo that the holy veſtall Nunnes had certaine goods & money put in their cuſtodie to keepe, both of mens in the citie, and thoſe alſo that were abroade: they went thither, and tooke them away by force. Octauius Cæſar perceiuing that no money woulde ſerue Antonius turne, he prayed that they might deuide the money betwene them, and ſo did they D alſo deuide the armie, for them both to goe into MACEDON to make warre againſt Brutus and Caſſius: and in the meane time they left the gouernment of the citie of ROME vnto Lepidus. When they had paſſed ouer the ſeas, and that they beganne to make warre, they being both camped by their enemies, to wit, Antonius againſt Caſſius, and Cæſar againſt Brutus: Cæſar did no great matter, but Antonius had alway the vpper hand, and did all. For at the firſt battell Cæſar was ouerthrowen by Brutus, and loſt his campe, and verie hardly ſaued him ſelfe by flying from them that followed him. Howebeit he writeth him ſelfe in his Commentaries, that he fled before the charge was geuen, bicauſe of a dreame one of his frends had. Antonius on the other ſide ouerthrewe Caſſius in battell, though ſome write that he was not there him ſelfe at the battell, but that he came after the ouerthrowe, whileſt his men had the enemies in chaſe. E So Caſſius at his earneſt requeſt was ſlaine by a faithfull ſeruaunt of his owne called Pindarus, whom he had infranchiſed: bicauſe he knewe not in time that Brutus had ouercomen Cæſar. Shortly after they fought an other battell againe, in the which Brutus was ouerthrowen, who afterwardes alſo ſlue him ſelfe. Thus Antonius had the chiefeſt glorie of all this victorie, ſpecially bicauſe Cæſar was ſicke at that time. Antonius hauing found Brutus body after this battel, blaming him muche for the murther of his brother Caius, whom he had put to death in MACEDON for reuenge of Ciceroes cruell death, and yet laying the fault more in Hortenſius then in him: he made Hortenſius to be ſlaine on his brothers tumbe. Furthermore, he caſt his coate armor (which was wonderfull rich and ſumptuous) vpon Brutus bodie, and gaue commaundement to one of his ſlaues infranchiſed, to defray the charge of his buriall. But afterwards, F Antonius hearing that his infranchiſed bondman had not burnt his coate armor with his bodie, bicauſe it was verie riche, and worth a great ſumme of money, and that he had alſo kept backe much of the ready money appointed for his funerall & tombe: he alſo put him to death.

After that Cæſar was conueied to Rome, and it was thought he would not liue long, nor ſcape the ſickenes he had. Antonius on thother ſide went towardes the Eaſt prouinces and regions, to leauie money: and firſt of all he went into Græce, and caried an infinite number of ſouldiers with him. Now, bicauſe euerie ſouldier was promiſed fiue thowſande ſiluer Drachmas, he was driuen of neceſſitie to impoſe extreame tallages and taxacions. At his firſt comming into Græce, he was not hard nor bitter vnto the Græcians, but gaue him ſelfe onely to heare wiſe men diſpute, to ſee playes, and alſo to note the ceremonies & ſacrifices of Græce, miniſtring iuſtice to euerie man, and it pleaſed him maruelouſly to heare them call him Philellen, (as much to ſay, a louer of the Græcians) and ſpecially the Athenians, to whom he did many great pleaſures. Wherefore the Megarians, to excede the Athenians, thinking to ſhew Antonius a goodly ſight: they prayed him to come & ſee their Senate houſe, & counſell hall. Antonius went thither to ſee it: ſo when he had ſeene it at his pleaſure, they asked him, my Lord, how like you our hall? Me thinkes (q. he) it is litle, old, and ready to fall downe. Furthermore, he tooke meaſure of the temple of Apollo Pythias, and promiſed the Senate to finiſh it. But when he was once come into Asia, hauing left Lucius Cenſorinus Gouernor in Græce, and that he had felt the riches and pleaſures of the Eaſt partes, and that Princes, great Lordes and Kinges, came to waite at his gate for his comming out, and that Queenes and Princeſſes to excell one an other, gaue him verie riche preſentes, and came to ſee him, curiouſly ſetting forth them ſelues, and vſing all art that might be to ſhewe their beawtie, to win his fauor the more: (Cæſar in the meane ſpace turmoyling his wits and bodie in ciuill warres at home, Antonius liuing merily & quietly abroad) he eaſely fell againe to his old licētious life. For ſtraight one Anaxenor a player of the citherne, Xoutus a player of the flutes, Metrodorus a tombler, and ſuch a rabble of minſtrells & fit miniſters for the pleaſures of Asia, (who in finenes & flattery paſſed all the other plagues he brought with him out of Italie) all theſe flocked in his court, & bare the whole ſway: & after that, all went awry. For euery one gaue them ſelues to riot and exceſſe, when they ſaw he delighted in it: and all Asia was like to the citie Sophocles ſpeaketh of in one of his tragedies:

For in the citie of Ephesvs, women attyred as they goe in the feaſtes and ſacrifice of Bacchus, came out to meete him with ſuch ſolemnities & ceremonies, as are then vſed: with men and children diſguiſed like Fawnes and Satyres. Moreouer, the citie was full of Iuey, & darts wreathed about with Iuey, pſalterions, flutes and howboyes, and in their ſonges they called him Bacchus, father of mirth, curteous, and gentle: and ſo was he vnto ſome, but to the moſt parte of men, cruell, and extreame. For he robbed noble men and gentle men of their goods, to geue it vnto vile flatterers: who oftentimes begged mens goods liuing, as though they had bene dead, and would enter their houſes by force. As he gaue a citizens houſe of Magnesia vnto a cooke, bicauſe (as it is reported) he dreſſed him a fine ſupper. In the ende he doubled the taxacion, and impoſed a ſeconde vpon Asia. But then Hybræas the Orator ſent from the eſtates of Asia, to tell him the ſtate of their contrie, boldly ſayd vnto him: if thou wilt haue power to lay two tributes in one yere vpon vs, thou ſhouldeſt alſo haue power to geue vs two ſommers, two autumnes, and two harueſts. This was gallantly and pleaſauntly ſpoken vnto Antonius by the Orator, and it pleaſed him well to heare it: but afterwardes amplifying his ſpeache, he ſpake more boldly, and to better purpoſe. Asia hath payed the two hundred thowſand talents. If all this money be not come to thy cofers, then aske accompt of them that leauied it: but if thou haue receiued it, and nothing be left of it, then are we vtterly vndone. Hybræas words nettled Antonius roundly. For he vnderſtoode not many of the thefts and robberies his officers committed by his authoritie, in his treaſure and affaires: not ſo muche bicauſe he was careleſſe, as for that he ouerſimply truſted his men in all things. For he was a plaine man, without ſuttletie, and therefore ouerlate founde out the fowle faultes they committed againſt him: but when he heard of them, he was muche offended, and would plainly confeſſe it vnto them whome his officers had done iniurie vnto, by countenaunce of his authoritie. He had a noble minde, as well to puniſh offendors, as to reward well doers: and yet

A he did exceede more in geuing, then in puniſhing. Now for his outragious manner of railing he commonly vſed, mocking and flouting of euerie man: that was remedied by it ſelfe. For a man might as boldly exchaunge a mocke with him, & he was as well cõtented to be mocked, as to mock others. But yet it oftentimes marred all. For he thought that thoſe which told him ſo plainly, & truly in mirth: would neuer flatter him in good earneſt, in any matter of weight. But thus he was eaſely abuſed by the praiſes they gaue him, not finding howe theſe flatterers mingled their flatterie, vnder this familiar and plaine manner of ſpeach vnto him, as a fine deuiſe to make difference of meates with ſharpe and tart ſauce, & alſo to kepe him by this franke ieaſting & bourding with him at the table, that their common flatterie ſhould not be troubleſome vnto him, as men do eaſely miſlike to haue too muche of one thing: and that they han-B dled him finely thereby, when they would geue him place in any matter of waight, and follow his counſell, that it might not appeare to him they did it ſo muche to pleaſe him, but bicauſe they were ignoraunt, and vnderſtoode not ſo muche as he did. Antonius being thus inclined, the laſt and extreameſt miſchiefe of all other (to wit, the loue of Cleopatra) lighted on him, who did waken and ſtirre vp many vices yet hidden in him, and were neuer ſeene to any: and if any ſparke of goodneſſe or hope of riſing were left him, Cleopatra quenched it ſtraight, and made it worſe then before. The manner how he fell in loue with her was this. Antonius going to make warre with the PARTHIANS, ſent to commaunde Cleopatra to appeare perſonally be-
C fore him, when he came into CILICIA, to aunſwere vnto ſuche accuſacions as were layed againſt her, being this: that ſhe had aided Caſſius and Brutus in their warre againſt him. The meſſenger ſent vnto Cleopatra to make this ſummons vnto her, was called Dellius: who when he had throughly conſidered her beawtie, the excellent grace and ſweeteneſſe of her tongue, he nothing miſtruſted that Antonius would doe any hurte to ſo noble a Ladie, but rather aſſured him ſelfe, that within few dayes ſhe ſhould be in great fauor with him. Thereupon he did her great honor, and perſwaded her to come into CILICIA, as honorably furniſhed as ſhe could poſſible, and bad her not to be affrayed at all of Antonius, for he was a more curteous Lord, then any that ſhe had euer ſeene. Cleopatra on thother ſide beleuing Dellius wordes, and geſſing by the former acceſſe and credit ſhe had with Iulius Cæſar, and Cneus Pompey (the ſonne of Pompey the great) only for her beawtie: ſhe began to haue good hope that ſhe might more eaſely win Antonius. For Cæſar and Pompey knew her when ſhe was but a young thing, & knew D not then what the worlde ment: but nowe ſhe went to Antonius at the age when a womans beawtie is at the prime, and ſhe alſo of beſt iudgement. So, ſhe furniſhed her ſelfe with a world of gifts, ſtore of gold and ſiluer, and of riches and other ſumptuous ornaments, as is credible enough ſhe might bring from ſo great a houſe, and from ſo wealthie and rich a realme as ÆGYPT was. But yet ſhe caried nothing with her wherein ſhe truſted more then in her ſelfe, and in the charmes and inchauntment of her paſſing beawtie and grace. Therefore when ſhe was ſent vnto by diuers letters, both from Antonius him ſelfe, and alſo from his frendes, ſhe made ſo light of it, and mocked Antonius ſo much, that ſhe diſdained to ſet forward otherwiſe, but E to take her barge in the riuer of Cydnus, the poope whereof was of gold, the ſailes of purple, and the owers of ſiluer, which kept ſtroke in rowing after the ſounde of the muſicke of flutes, howboyes, citherns, violls, and ſuch other inſtrumeuts as they played vpon in the barge. And now for the perſon of her ſelfe: ſhe was layed vnder a pauillion of cloth of gold of tiſſue, apparelled and attired like the goddeſſe Venus, commonly drawen in picture: and hard by her, on either hand of her, pretie faire boyes apparelled as painters doe ſet forth god Cupide, with litle fannes in their hands, with the which they fanned wind vpon her. Her Ladies and gentlewomen alſo, the faireſt of them were apparelled like the nymphes Nereides (which are the mermaides of the waters) and like the Graces, ſome ſtearing the helme, others tending the tackle and ropes of the barge, out of the which there came a wonderfull paſſing ſweete fauor of perfumes, that perfumed the wharfes ſide, peſtered with innumerable multitudes of peo-
F ple. Some of them followed the barge all alongeſt the riuers ſide: others alſo ranne out of the citie to ſee her comming in. So that in thend, there ranne ſuch multitudes of people one after an other to ſee her, that Antonius was left poſt alone in the market place, in his Imperiall ſeate to geue audience: and there went a rumor in the peoples mouthes, that the goddeſſe Venus was come to play with the god Bacchus, for the generall good of all Asia. When Cleopatra landed, Antonius sent to inuite her to supper to him. But she sent him word againe, he should doe better rather to come and suppe with her. Antonius therefore to shew him selfe curteous vnto her at her arriuall, was contented to obey her, & went to supper to her: where he found such passing sumptuous fare, that no tongue can expresse it. But amongest all other thinges, he most wondered at the infinite number of lightes and torches hanged on the toppe of the house, geuing light in euerie place, so artificially set and ordered by deuises, some round, some square: that it was the rarest thing to behold that eye could discerne, or that euer bookes could mencion. The next night, Antonius feasting her, contended to passe her in magnificence and finenes: but she ouercame him in both. So that he him selfe began to skorne the grosse seruice of his house, in respect of Cleopatraes sumptuousnes and fineneſſe. And when Cleopatra found Antonius ieasts and slents to be but grosse, and souldier like, in plaine manner: she gaue it him finely, and without feare taunted him throughly. Now her beawtie (as it is reported) was not so passing, as vnmatchable of other women, nor yet suche, as vpon present viewe did enamor men with her: but so sweete was her companie and conuersacion, that a man could not possiblie but be taken. And besides her beawtie, the good grace she had to talke and discourse, her curteous nature that tempered her words & dedes, was a spurre that pricked to the quick. Furthermore, besides all these, her voyce and words were maruelous pleasant: for her tongue was an instrument of musicke to diuers sports and pastimes, the which she easely turned to any language that pleased her. She spake vnto few barbarous people by interpreter, but made them aunswere her selfe, or at the least the most parte of them: as the Æthiopians, the Arabians, the Troglodytes, the Hebrues, the Syrians, the Medes, and the Parthians, and to many others also, whose languages she had learned. Whereas diuers of her progenitors, the kings of Ægypt, could scarce learne the Ægyptian tongue only, and many of them forgot to speake the Macedonian. Nowe, Antonius was so rauished with the loue of Cleopatra, that though his wife Fuluia had great warres, and much a doe with Cæsar for his affaires, and that the armie of the Parthians, (the which the kings Lieutenauntes had geuen to the onely leading of Labienus) was now assembled in Mesopotamia readie to inuade Syria: yet, as though all this had nothing touched him, he yeelded him selfe to goe with Cleopatra into Alexandria, where he spent and lost in childish sports, (as a man might say) and idle pastimes, the most pretious thing a man can spende, as Antiphon sayth: and that is, time. For they made an order betwene them, which they called Amimetobion (as much to say, no life comparable and matcheable with it) one feasting ech other by turnes, and in cost, exceeding all measure and reason. And for proofe hereof, I haue heard my grandfather Lampryas report, that one Philotas a Phisition, borne in the citie of Amphissa, told him that he was at that present time in Alexandria, and studied Phisicke: and that hauing acquaintance with one of Antonius cookes, he tooke him with him to Antonius house, (being a young man desirous to see things) to shew him the wonderfull sumptuous charge and preparation of one only supper. When he was in the kitchin, and saw a world of diuersities of meates, and amongst others, eight wilde boares rosted whole: he began to wonder at it, and sayd, sure you haue a great number of ghests to supper. The cooke fell a laughing, and answered him, no (quoth he) not many ghestes, nor aboue twelue in all: but yet all that is boyled or roasted must be serued in whole, or else it would be marred straight. For Antonius peraduenture will suppe presently, or it may be a pretie while hence, or likely enough he will deferre it longer, for that he hath dronke well to day, or else hath had some other great matters in hand: and therefore we doe not dresse one supper only, but many suppers, bicause we are vncerteine of the houre he will suppe in. Philotas the Phisition tolde my grandfather this tale, and sayd moreouer, that it was his chaunce shortly after to serue the eldest sonne of the sayd Antonius, whome he had by his wife Fuluia: and that he sate commonly at his table with his other frendes, when he did not dine nor suppe with his father. It chaunced one day there came a Phisition that was so full of words, that he made euery man wearie of him at the bord: but Philotas to stoppe his mouth, put out a suttle proposition to him. It is good in some sorte to let a man drinke colde water that hath an agew: euerie man that hath an agew hath it in some sorte, ergo it is good for a man Philotas, Phisition to the younger Antonius.

Philotas subtil proposition.

A man that hath an agew to drinke cold water. The Phisition was so grauelled and amated withall, that he had not a word more to say. Young Antonius burst out in such a laughing at him, and was so glad of it, that he sayd vnto him: Philotas, take all that, I geue it thee: shewing him his cubbord full of plate, with great pots of gold and siluer. Philotas thanked him, and told him he thought himselfe greatly bound to him for this liberality, but he would neuer haue thought that he had had power to haue geuen so many things, and of so great value. But muche more he maruelled, when shortly after one of young Antonius men brought him home all the pots in a basket, bidding him set his marke and stampe vpon them, and to locke them vp. Philotas returned the bringer of them, fearing to be reproued if he tooke them. Then the young gentleman Antonius sayd vnto him: alas poore man, why doest thou make it nise to take them? B Knowest thou not that it is the sonne of Antonius that geues them thee, and is able to do it? If thou wilt not beleue me, take rather the readie money they come to: bicause my father peraduenture may aske for some of the plate, for the antike & excellent workemanship of them. This I haue heard my grandfather tell oftentimes. But now againe to Cleopatra. Plato wryteth that there are foure kinds of flatterie: but Cleopatra deuided it into many kinds. For she, were it in sport, or in matter of earnest, still deuised sundrie new delights to haue Antonius at commaundement, neuer leauing him night nor day, nor once letting him go out of her sight. For she would play at dyce with him, drinke with him, and hunt commonly with him, and also be with him when he went to any exercise or actiuity of body. And somtime also, when he would goe vp and downe the citie disguised like a slaue in the night, & would peere into poore mens C windowes & their shops, and scold & brawle with them within the house: Cleopatra would be also in a chamber maides array, & amble vp & downe the streets with him, so that oftentimes Antonius bare away both mockes & blowes. Now, though most men misliked this maner, yet the Alexandrians were commonly glad of this iolity, & liked it well, saying verie gallantly, and wisely: that Antonius shewed them a commicall face, to wit, a merie countenaunce: and the Romanes a tragicall face, to say, a grimme looke. But to reckon vp all the foolishe sportes they made, reuelling in this sorte: it were too fond a parte of me, and therefore I will only tell you one among the rest. On a time he went to angle for fish, and when he could take none, he was as angrie as could be, bicause Cleopatra stoode by. Wherefore he secretly commaunded the fisher men, that when he cast in his line, they should straight diue vnder the wa- D ter, and put a fishe on his hooke which they had taken before: and so snatched vp his angling rodde, and brought vp fish twise or thrise. Cleopatra found it straight, yet she seemed not to see it, but wondred at his excellent fishing: but when she was alone by her selfe among her owne people, she told them howe it was, and bad them the next morning to be on the water to see the fishing. A number of people came to the hauen, and got into the fisher boates to see this fishing. Antonius then threw in his line and Cleopatra straight commaunded one of her men to diue vnder water before Antonius men, and to put some old salte fish vpon his baite, like vnto those that are brought out of the contrie of Pont. When he had hong the fish on his hooke, Antonius thinking he had taken a fishe in deede, snatched vp his line presently. Then they all fell a laughing. Cleopatra laughing also, said vnto him: leaue vs (my Lord) Egyptians (which E dwell in the contry of Pharus and Canobus) your angling rodde: this is not thy profession: thou must hunt after conquering of realmes and contries. Nowe Antonius delighting in these fond and childish pastimes, verie ill newes were brought him from two places. The first from Rome, that his brother Lucius, and Fuluia his wife, fell out first betwene themselues, and afterwards fell to open warre with Cesar, & had brought all to nought, that they were both driuen to flie out of Italie. The seconde newes, as bad as the first: that Labienus conquered all Asia with the armie of the Parthians, from the riuer of Euphrates, and from Syria, vnto the contries of Lydia and Ionia. Then began Antonius with much a doe, a litle to rouse him selfe as if he had bene wakened out of a deepe sleepe, and as a man may say, comming out of a great dronkennes. So, first of all he bent him selfe against the Parthians, and went as farre F as the contrie of Phoenicia: but there he receiued lamentable letters from his wife Fuluia. Whereuppon he straight returned towards Italie, with two hundred saile: and as he went, tooke vp his frendes by the way that fled out of Italie, to come to him. By them he was informed, that his wife Fuluia was the only cause of this warre: who being of a peeuish, crooked and troublesome nature, had purposely raised this vprore in ITALIE, in hope thereby to withdraw him from Cleopatra. But by good fortune, his wife Fuluia going to meete with Antonius, sickened by the way, and dyed in the citie of SICYONE: and therefore Octauius Cæsar, and he were the easelier made frendes together. For when Antonius landed in ITALIE, and that men saw Cæsar asked nothing of him, and that Antonius on the other side layed all the fault & burden on his wife Fuluia: the frendes of both parties would not suffer them to vnrippe any olde matters, and to proue or defend who had the wrong or right, and who was the first procurer of this warre, fearing to make matters worse betweene them: but they made them frendes together, and deuided the Empire of ROME betweene them, making the sea Ionium the bounds of their diuision. For they gaue all the prouinces Eastward, vnto Antonius: and the countries Westward, vnto Cæsar: and left AFRICKE vnto Lepidus: and made a law, that they three one after an other should make their frendes Consuls, when they would not be them selues. This seemed to be a sound counsell, but yet it was to be confirmed with a straighter bonde, which fortune offered thus. There was Octauia the eldest sister of Cæsar, not by one mother, for she came of Ancharia, & Cæsar him self afterwards of Accia. It is reported, that he dearly loued his sister Octauia, for in deede she was a noble Ladie, and left the widow of her first husband Caius Marcellus, who dyed not long before: and it seemed also that Antonius had bene widower euer since the death of his wife Fuluia. For he denied not that he kept Cleopatra, but so did he not confesse that he had her as his wife: & so with reason he did defend the loue he bare vnto this ÆGYPTIAN Cleopatra. Thereuppon euerie man did set forward this mariage, hoping thereby that this Ladie Octauia, hauing an excellent grace, wisedom, & honestie, ioyned vnto so rare a beawtie, that when she were with Antonius (he louing her as so worthy a Ladie deserueth) she should be a good meane to keepe good loue & amitie betwext her brother and him. So when Cæsar & he had made the matche betwene them, they both went to ROME about this mariage, although it was against the law, that a widow should be maried within tenne monethes after her husbandes death. Howbeit the Senate dispensed with the law, and so the mariage proceeded accordingly. Sextus Pompeius at that time kept in SICILIA, and so made many an inrode into ITALIE with a great number of pynnasies and other pirates shippes, of the which were Captaines two notable pirats, Menas, and Menecrates, who so scoored all the sea thereabouts, that none durst peepe out with a sayle. Furthermore, Sextus Pompeius had delt verie frendly with Antonius, for he had curteously receiued his mother, when she fled out of ITALIE with Fuluia: and therefore they thought good to make peace with him. So they met all three together by the mount of Misena, vpon a hill that runneth farre into the sea: Pompey hauing his shippes ryding hard by at ancker, and Antonius and Cæsar their armies vpon the shoare side, directly ouer against him. Now, after they had agreed that Sextus Pompeius should haue SICILE and SARDINIA, with this condicion, that he should ridde the sea of all theeues and pirats, and make it safe for passengers, and withall that he should send a certaine of wheate to ROME: one of them did feast an other, and drew cuts who should beginne. It was Pompeius chaunce to inuite them first. Whereupon Antonius asked him: & where shall we supper? There, said Pompey, and shewed him his admirall galley which had six bankes of owers: that (sayd he) is my fathers house they haue left me. He spake it to taunt Antonius, bicause he had his fathers house, that was Pompey the great. So he cast ankers enowe into the sea, to make his galley fast, and then builte a bridge of wodde to conuey them to his galley, from the heade of mount Misena: and there he welcomed them, and made them great cheere. Now in the middest of the feast, when they fell to be merie with Antonius loue vnto Cleopatra: Menas the pirate came to Pompey, and whispering in his care, said vnto him: shall I cut the gables of the ankers, and make thee Lord not only of SICILE and SARDINIA, but of the whole Empire of ROME besides? Pompey hauing pawsed a while vpon it, at length aunswered him: thou shouldest haue done it, and neuer haue told it me, but now we must content vs with that we haue. As for my selfe, I was neuer taught to breake my faith, nor to be counted a traitor. The other two also did likewise feast him in their campe, and then he returned into SICILE. Antonius after this agreement made, sent Ventidius before into ASIA to stay the PARTHIANS, and to keepe them they should no further: and he him ſelfe in the meane time, to gratifie Cæſar, was contented to be choſen Iulius Cæſars prieſt and ſacrificer, & ſo they ioyntly together diſpatched all great matters, concerning the ſtate of the Empire. But in all other maner of ſportes and exercyſes, wherein they paſſed the time away the one with the other: Antonius was euer inferior vnto Cæſar, and alway loſt, which grieued him much. With Antonius there was a ſoothſayer or aſtronomer of Ægypt, that coulde caſt a figure, and iudge of mens natiuities, to tell them what ſhould happen to them. He, either to pleaſe Cleopatra, or elſe for that he founde it ſo by his art, told Antonius plainly, that his fortune (which of it ſelfe was excellent good, and very great) was altogether bleamiſhed, and obſcured by Cæſars fortune: and therefore he counſelled him vtterly to leaue his company, and to get him as farre from him as he could. For thy Demon ſaid he, (that is to ſay, the good angell and ſpirit that kepeth thee) is affraied of his: and being coragious & high when he is alone, becometh feareſull and timerous when he commeth neere vnto the other. Howſoeuer it was, the euents enſuing proued the Ægyptians words true. For, it is ſaid, that as often as they two drew cuts for paſtime, who ſhould haue any thing, or whether they plaied at dice, Antonius alway loſt. Oftentimes when they were diſpoſed to ſee cockefight, or quailes that were taught to fight one with an other: Cæſars cockes or quailes did euer ouercome. The which ſpighted Antonius in his mind, although he made no outward ſhew of it: and therefore he beleeued the Ægyptian the better. In fine, he recommended the affaires of his houſe vnto Cæſar, & went out of Italie with Octauia his wife, whom he caried into Græce, after he had had a daughter by her. So Antonius lying all the winter at Athens, newes came vnto him of the victories of Ventidius, who had ouercome the Parthians in battel, in the which alſo were ſlaine, Labienus, and Pharnabates, the chiefeſt Captaine king Orodes had. For theſe good newes he feaſted all Athens, and kept open houſe for all the Græcians, and many games of price were plaied at Athens, of the which he him ſelfe would be iudge. Wherfore leauing his gard, his axes, and tokens of his Empire at his houſe, he came into the ſhow place (or liſtes) where theſe games were played, in a long gowne and ſlippers after the Græcian facion, and they caried tippeſtaues before him, as marſhalls men do cary before the Iudges to make place: and he himſelfe in perſon was a ſtickler to part the young men, when they had fought enough. After that, preparing to go to the warres, he made him a garland of the holy Oliue, and caried a veſſell with him of the water of the fountaine Clepſydra, bicauſe of an Oracle he had receiued that ſo commaunded him. In the meane time, Ventidius once againe ouercame Pacorus, (Orodes ſonne king of Parthia) in a battell fought in the contrie of Cyrreſtica, he being come againe with a great armie to inuade Syria: at which battell was ſlaine a great number of the Parthians, & among them Pacorus, the kings owne ſonne ſlaine. This noble exployt as famous as euer any was, was a full reuenge to the Romanes, of the ſhame and loſſe they had receiued before by the death of Marcus Craſſus: and he made the Parthians flie, and glad to kepe them ſelues within the confines and territories of Mesopotamia, and Media, after they had thriſe together bene ouercome in ſeuerall battells. Howbeit Ventidius durſt not vndertake to follow them any further, fearing leaſt he ſhould haue gotten Antonius diſpleaſure by it. Notwithſtanding, he led his armie againſt them that had rebelled, and conquered them againe: amongeſt whome he beſieged Antiochus, king of Commagena, who offered him to giue a thowſand talentes to be pardoned his rebellion, and promiſed euer after to be at Antonius commaundement. But Ventidius made him aunſwere, that he ſhould ſend vnto Antonius, who was not farre of, and would not ſuffer Ventidius to make any peace with Antiochus, to the end that yet this litle exployt ſhould paſſe in his name, and that they ſhould not thinke he did any thing but by his Lieutenaunt Ventidius. The ſiege grew verie long, bicauſe they that were in the towne, ſeeing they coulde not be receiued vpon no reaſonable compoſition: determined valliantly to defende them ſelues to the laſt man. Thus Antonius did nothing, and yet receiued great ſhame, repenting him much that he tooke not their firſt offer. And yet at laſt he was glad to make truce with Antiochus, and to take three hundred talentes for compoſition. Thus after he had ſet order for the ſtate & affaires of Syria, he returned againe to Athens: and hauing giuen Ventidius ſuche honors as he deſerued, he ſent him to Rome, to triumphe for the Parthians. Ventidius was the only man that euer triumphed of the Parthians vn-

till this present day, a meane man borne, and of no noble house nor family: who only came to that he attained vnto, through Antonius frendshippe, the which deliuered him happie occasion to achieue to great matters. And yet to say truely, he did so well quit him selfe in all his enterprises, that he confirmed that which was spoken of Antonius and Cæsar: to wit, that they were alway more fortunate when they made warre by their Lieutenants, then by them selues. For Sossius, one of Antonius Lieutenauntes in Syria, did notable good seruice: and Canidius, whom he had also left his Lieutenaunt in the borders of Armenia, did conquer it all. So did he also ouercome the kinges of the Iberians and Albanians, and went on with his conquests vnto mount Caucasus. By these conquests, the fame of Antonius power increased more and more, and grew dreadfull vnto all the barbarous nations. But Antonius notwithstanding, grewe to be maruelously offended with Cæsar, vpon certaine reportes that had bene brought vnto him: and so tooke sea to go towards Italie with three hundred saile. And bicause those of Brundusium would not receiue his armie into their hauen, he went further vnto Tarentum. There his wife Octauia that came out of Græce with him, besought him to send her vnto her bother: the which he did. Octauia at that time was great with child, and moreouer had a second daughter by him, and yet she put her selfe in iorney, and met with her brother Octauius Cæsar by the way, who brought his two chiefe frendes, Mæcenas and Agrippa with him. She tooke them aside, and with all the instance she could possible, intreated them they would not suffer her that was the happiest woman of the world, to become nowe the most wretched and vnfortunatest creature of all other. For now, said she, euerie mans eyes doe gaze on me, that am the sister of one of the Emperours and wife of the other. And if the worst councell take place, (which the goddes forbidde) and that they growe to warres: for your selues, it is vncertaine to which of them two the goddes haue assigned the victorie, or ouerthrowe. But for me, on which side soeuer victorie fall, my state can be but most miserable still. These words of Octauia so softned Cæsars harte, that he went quickely vnto Tarentum. But it was a noble sight for them that were present, to see so great an armie by lande not to sturre, and so many shippes aflote in the roade, quietly and safe: and furthermore, the meeting and kindenesse of frendes, louinglie imbracing one an other. First, Antonius feasted Cæsar, which he graunted vnto for his sisters sake. Afterwardes they agreed together, that Cæsar should geue Antonius two legions to go against the Parthians: and that Antonius should let Cæsar haue a hundred gallies armed with brasen spurres at the prooes. Besides all this, Octauia obteyned of her husbande, twentie brigantines for her brother: and of her brother for her husbande, a thowsande armed men. After they had taken leaue of eache other, Cæsar went immediatly to make warre with Sextus Pompeius, to gette Sicilia into his handes. Antonius also leauing his wife Octauia and litle children begotten of her, with Cæsar, and his other children which he had by Fuluia: he went directlie into Asia. Then beganne this pestilent plague and mischiefe of Cleopatraes loue (which had slept a longe tyme, and seemed to haue bene vtterlie forgotten, and that Antonius had geuen place to better counsell) againe to kindle, and to be in force, so soone as Antonius came neere vnto Syria. And in the ende, the horse of the minde as Plato termeth it, that is so hard of rayne (I meane the vnreyned lust of concupiscence) did put out of Antonius heade, all honest and commendable thoughtes: for he sent Fonteius Capito to bring Cleopatra into Syria. Vnto whome, to welcome her, he gaue no trifling things: but vnto that she had already, he added the prouinces of Phœnicia, those of the nethermost Syria, the Ile of Cyprus, and a great parte of Cilicia, and that contry of Iurie where the true balme is, and that parte of Arabia where the Nabatheians doe dwell, which stretcheth out towardes the Ocean. These great giftes muche misliked the Romanes. But now, though Antonius did easely geue away great seigniories, realmes, & mighty nations vnto some priuate men, and that also he tooke from other kings their lawfull realmes: (as from Antigonus king of the Iewes, whom he openly beheaded, where neuer king before had suffred like death) yet all this did not so much offend the Romanes, as the vnmeasurable honors which he did vnto Cleopatra. But yet he did much more aggrauate their malice & ill wil towards him, bicause that Cleopatra hauing brought him two twinnes, a sonne and a daughter, he named his sonne Alexander, & his daughter Cleopatra, and gaue them to their surnames, the

A Sunne to the one, & the moone to the other. This notwithstanding, he that could finely cloke his shamefull deedes with fine words, said that the greatnes & magnificence of the Empire of Rome appeared most, not where the Romanes tooke, but where they gaue much: & nobility was multiplied amongest men, by the posterity of kings, when they left of their seede in diuers places: and that by this meanes his first auncester was begotten of Hercules, who had not left the hope and continuance of his line and posterity, in the wombe of one only woman, fearing Solons lawes, or regarding the ordinaunces of men touching the procreacion of children: but that he gaue it vnto nature, and estublished the fundacion of many noble races and families in diuers places. Nowe when Phraortes had slaine his father Orodes, and possessed the kingdome many gentlemen of Parthia forsooke him, and fled from him. Amongst them was Monæses, Phraortes slue his father Orodes king of Persia.

B a noble man, and of great authority among his contry men, who came vnto Antonius, that receiued him, & compared his fortune vnto Themistocles, and his owne riches & magnificence, vnto the kings of Persia. For he gaue Monæses three cities, Larissa, Arethvsa, & Hiera-polis, which was called before Bombyce. Howbeit the king of Parthia shortly after called him home againe, vpon his faith & word. Antonius was glad to let him go, hoping thereby to steale vpon Phraortes vnprouided. For he sent vnto him, & told him that they would remaine good frends, & haue peace together, so he would but only redeliuer the standerds & enfignes of the Romanes, which the Parthians had wonne in the battell where Marcus Crassus was slaine, & the men also that remained yet prisoners of this ouerthrow. In the meane time he sent Cleopatra backe into Ægypt, & tooke his way towards Arabia & Armenia, & there tooke

C a general muster of all his army he had together, & of the kings his cõfederats that were come by his cõmaundement to aide him, being a maruelous number: of the which, the chiefest was Artauasdes, king of Armenia, who did furnish him with six thowsande horsemen, and seuen thowsand footemen. There were also of the Romanes about three score thowsand footmen, & of horsemen (Spaniards & Gavles reckoned for Romanes) to the number of ten thowsand, & of other nations thirty thowsand men, reckoning together the horsemen and light armed footemen. This so great & puisant army which made the Indians quake for feare, dwelling about the contry of the Bactrians, and all Asia also to tremble: serued him to no purpose, & all for the loue he bare to Cleopatra. For the earnest great desire he had to lye all winter with her, made him begin his warre out of due time, and for hast, to put all in hazard, being so

D rauished & enchaunted with the sweete poyson of her loue, that he had no other thought but of her, & how he might quickly returne againe: more then how he might ouercome his enemies. For first of all, where he should haue wintered in Armenia to refresh his men, wearied with the long iorney they had made, hauing comen eight thowsand furlongs, and then at the beginning of the spring to go and inuade Media, before the Parthians should stirre out of their houses & garrisons: he could tary no lenger, but led them forthwith vnto the prouince of Atropatene, leauing Armenia on the left hand, & forraged al the contry. Furthermore, making all the hast he coulde, he left behinde him engines of battery which were caried with him in three hũdred carts, (among the which also there was a ramme foure score foote long) being things most necessary for him, and the which he could not get againe for money if they

E were once lost or marred. For the hie prouinces of Asia haue no trees growing of such height and length, neither strong nor straight enough to make such like engines of battery. This notwithstanding, he left them all behind him, as a hinderance to bring his matters & intent speedily to passe: and left a certaine number of men to keepe them, and gaue them in charge vnto one Tatianus. Then he went to besiege the citie of Phraata, being the chiefest and greatest citie the king of Media had, where his wife and children were. Then he straight founde his owne fault, and the want of his artillerie he left behinde him, by the worke he had in hande: for he was fayne for lacke of a breache (where his men might come to the sworde with their enemies that defended the walle) to force a mount of earth hard to the walles of the citie, the which by litle and litle with greate labour, rose to some height. In the meane time

F king Phraortes came downe with a great armie: who vnderstanding that Antonius had left his engines of batterie behind him, he sent a great number of horsemen before, which enuironed Tatianus with all his cariage, and slue him, and ten thowsand men he had with him. After this,

the barbarous people tooke these engines of battery and burnt them, and got many prisoners, amongst whom they tooke also king Polemon. This discomfiture maruelously troubled all Antonius army, to receiue so great an ouerthrow (beyond their expectacion) at the beginning of their iorney: insomuche that Artabazus, king of the Armenians, dispairing of the good successe of the Romanes: departed with his men, notwithstanding that he was himselfe the first procurer of this warre and iorney. On the other side, the Parthians came coragiously vnto Antonius campe, who lay at the siege of their chiefest citie, and cruelly reuiled and threatned him. Antonius therefore fearing that if he lay still and did nothing, his mens harts would faile them: he tooke ten legions, with three cohorts or enfignes of the Prætors, (which are companies appointed for the gard of the Generall) and all his horsemen, and caried them out to forrage, hoping therby he should easely allure the Parthians to fight a battell. But when he had marched about a dayes iorney from his campe, he saw the Parthians wheeling round about him to geue him the onset, & to skirmish with him, when he would thinke to march his way. Therefore he set out his signall of battell, & yet caused his tents and fardells to be trussed vp, as though he ment not to fight, but only to lead his men back againe. Then he marched before the army of the barbarous people, the which was marshald like a cressant or halfe moone: and commaunded his horsemen, that as soone as they thought the legions were nere enough vnto their enemies to set vpon the voward, that then they should set spurres to their horses, & begin the charge. The Parthians standing in battell ray, beholding the countenaunce of the Romanes as they marched: they appeared to be souldiers in deede, to see them marche in so good array as was possible. For in their march, they kept the rankes a like space one from an other, not straggling out of order, and shaking their pikes, speaking neuer a word. But so soone as the allarom was giuen, the horsemen sodainly turned head vpon the Parthians, and with great cries gaue charge on them: who at the first receiued their charge coragiously, for they were ioined nere thẽ within an arrowes shoote. But when the legions also came to ioine with them, showting out alowde, & ratling of their armors: the Parthians horses and them selues were so affrayed and amazed withall, that they all turned taile and fled, before the Romanes could come to the sword with them. Then Antonius followed thẽ hard in chase, being in great good hope by this conflict to haue brought to end all, or the most part of this warre. But after that his footemen had chased them fiftie furlonges of, and the horsemen also thrise as farre: they found in all but thirty prisoners taken, and about foure score men only slaine. But this did much discorage them, when they cõsidered with them selues, that obtaining the victory, they had slaine so few of their enemies: and where they were ouercome, they lost as many of their men, as they had done at the ouerthrow when the cariage was taken. The next morning, Antonius army trussed vp their cariage, and marched backe towards their campe: and by the way in their returne they met at the first a fewe of the Parthians: then going further, they met a few moe. So at length when they all came together, they reuiled them, & troubled them on euery side, as freshly & coragiously, as if they had not bene ouerthrowen: so that the Romanes very hardly got to their campe with safety. The Medes on the other side, that were besieged in their chiefe city of Phraata, made a saly out vpon them that kept the mount, which they had forced and cast against the wall of the city, and draue them for feare, from the mount they kept. Antonius was so offended withall, that he executed the Decimation. For he deuided his men by ten legions, and then of them he put the tenth legion to death, on whom the lot fell: and to the other nine, he caused them to haue barley giuen them in stead of wheate. Thus this warre fell out troublesome vnto both parties, and the ende thereof muche more fearefull. For Antonius could looke for no other of his side, but famine: bicause he could forrage no more, nor fetche in any vittells, without great losse of his men. Phraortes on the other side, he knew well enough that he could bring the Parthians to any thing els, but to lye in campe abroad in the winter. Therefore he was affrayed, that if the Romanes continued their siege all winter long, & made warre with him still: that his mẽ would forsake him, & specially bicause the time of the yere went away apace, & the ayer waxed clowdy, & cold, in the equinoctiall autumne. Therupon he called to mind this deuise. He gaue the chiefest of his gentlemẽ of the Parthians charge, that when they met the Romanes out of their campe, going to forrage, or to water their

A their horſe, or for ſome other prouiſion: that they ſhould not diſtreſſe them too muche, but ſhould ſuffer them to carie ſomewhat away, and greatly commend their valliantnes and hardines, for the which their king did eſteeme them the more, and not without cauſe. After theſe firſt baytes and allurements, they beganne by litle and litle to come neerer vnto them, and to talke with them a horſebacke, greatly blaming Antonius ſelfewill that did not geue their king Phraortes occaſion to make a good peace, who deſired nothing more, then to ſaue the liues of ſo goodly a companie of valliant men: but that he was too fondly bent to abide two of the greateſt and moſt dreadfull enemies he could haue, to wit: winter, and famine, the which they ſhould hardly away withall, though the PARTHIANS did the beſt they could to aide & accompany them. Theſe words being oftentimes brought to Antonius, they made him a litle pliant, The craft of the Parthians againſt the Romanes.

B for the good hope he had of his returne: but yet he woulde not ſende vnto the king of PARTHIA, before they had firſt asked theſe barbarous people that ſpake ſo curteouſly vnto his men, whether they ſpake it of them ſelues, or that they were their maiſters words. When they told them the king him ſelfe ſayd ſo, and did perſwade them further not to feare or miſtruſt them: then Antonius ſent ſome of his frends vnto the king, to make demaund for the deliuery of the enſignes and priſoners he had of the ROMANES, ſince the ouerthrow of Craſſus: to the ende it ſhould not appeare, that if he asked nothing, they ſhoulde thinke he were glad that he might only ſcape with ſafety out of the daunger he was in. The king of PARTHIA anſwered him: that for the enſignes & priſoners he demaunded, he ſhould not breake his head about it: notwithſtãding, that if he would preſently depart without delay, he might depart in peaceable maner,

C and without daunger. Wherefore Antonius after he had giuen his men ſome time to truſſe vp their cariage, he raiſed his campe, & tooke his way to depart. But though he had an excellent tongue at will, and very gallant to enterteine his ſouldiers and men of warre, and that he could paſſingly well do it, as well, or better then any Captaine in his time: yet being aſhamed for reſpects, he would not ſpeake vnto them at his remouing, but willed Domitius AEnobarbus to do it. Many of them tooke this in very ill parte, & thought that he did it in diſdaine of them: but the moſt part of them preſently vnderſtoode the truth of it, and were alſo aſhamed. Therefore they thought it their dueties to carie the like reſpect vnto their Captaine, that their Captaine did vnto them: and ſo they became the more obedient vnto him. So Antonius was minded to returne the ſame way he came, being a plaine barren contry without wodde. But there came a Antonius returneth from the iorney of the Parthiãs.

D ſouldier to him, borne in the contry of the MARDIANS, who by oft frequenting the PARTHIANS of long time, knew their facions very wel, and had alſo ſhewed him ſelfe very true & faithfull to the ROMANES, in the battell where Antonius engines of battery and cariage were taken away. This man came vnto Antonius, to counſell him to beware how he went that way, and to make his army a pray, being heauily armed, vnto ſo great a number of horſemen, all archers in the open field, where they ſhould haue nothing to let them to compaſſe him round about: and that this was Phraortes fetch to offer him ſo frendly cõdicions & curteous words to make him raiſe his ſiege, that he might afterwards meete him as he would, in the plaines: howbeit, that he would guide him, if he thought good, an other way on the right hand, through woddes & mountaines, a farre neerer way, and where he ſhould finde great plenty of all things needefull

E for his army. Antonius hearing what he ſaid, called his counſel together, to conſult vpon it. For after he had made peace with the PARTHIANS, he was loth to geue them cauſe to thinke he miſtruſted them: and on thother ſide alſo he would gladly ſhorten his way, and paſſe by places wel inhabited, where he might be prouided of al things neceſſary: therfore he asked the MARDIAN what pledge he would put in, to performe that he promiſed. The MARDIAN gaue himſelf to be bound hand and foote, till he had brought his army into the contry of ARMENIA. So he guided the army thus bound, two dayes together, without any trouble or ſight of enemy. But the third day, Antonius thinking the PARTHIANS would no more follow him, & truſting therin, ſuffred the ſouldiers to march in diſorder as euery mã lifted. The MARDIAN perceiuing that the dammes of a riuer were newly broken vp, which they ſhould haue paſſed ouer, & that the

F riuer had ouerflowen the bankes and drowned all the way they ſhoulde haue gone: he geſſed ſtraight that the PARTHIANS had done it, and had thus broken it open, to ſtay the ROMANES for getting too farre before them. Therupon he bad Antonius looke to him ſelfe, and told him that his enemies were not farre from thence. Antonius hauing ſet his men in order, as he was placing of his archers & ſling men to reſiſt the enemies, & to driue them backe: they diſcried the PARTHIANS that wheeled round about the army to compaſſe them in on euery ſide, & to breake their rankes, & their light armed men gaue charge apon them. So after they had hurt many of the ROMANES with their arrowes, and that they them ſelues were alſo hurt by them with their dartes and plummets of leade: they retyred a litle, and then came againe and gaue charge. Vntill that the horſemen of the GAVLES turned their horſes, & fiercely gallopped towards them, that they diſperſed them ſo, as al that day they gathered no more together. Therby Antonius knew what to do, and did not only ſtrengthen the rereward of his army, but both the flanks alſo, with darters and ſling men, and made his army march in a ſquare battell: commaunding the horſemen, that when the enemies ſhould come to aſſaile them, they ſhoulde driue them backe, but not follow them too farre. Thus the PARTHIANS foure daies after, ſeeing they did no more hurte to the ROMANES, then they alſo receiued of them: they were not ſo hotte vpon them as they were commaunded, but excuſing them ſelues by the winter that troubled them, they determined to returne backe againe. The fiſt day, Flauius Gallus, a valliant man of his handes, that had charge in the armie: came vnto Antonius to pray him to let him haue ſome moe of his light armed men then were alreadie in the rereward, and ſome of the horſemen that were in the voward, hoping thereby to doe ſome notable exploite. Antonius graunting them vnto him, when the enemies came according to their maner to ſet vpon the taile of the army, and to skirmiſh with them: Flauius coragiouſly made them retire, but not as they were wont to doe before, to retire and ioyne preſently with their army, for he ouerraſhly thruſt in among them to fight it out at the ſword. The Capteines that had the leading of the rereward, ſeeing Flauius ſtray too farre from the army: they ſent vnto him to will him to retire, but he would not harken to it. And it is reported alſo, that Titius himſelfe the Treaſorer, tooke the enſignes, & did what he could to make the enſigne bearers returne backe, reuiling Flauius Gallus, bicauſe that through his folly and deſperatnes he cauſed many honeſt and valliant men to be both hurt & ſlaine to no purpoſe. Gallus alſo fel out with him, and commaunded his men to ſtay. Wherefore Titius returned againe into the army, and Gallus ſtil ouerthrowing and driuing the enemies backe whom he met in the voward, he was not ware that he was compaſſed in. Then ſeeing him ſelfe enuironned of all ſides, he ſent vnto the army, that they ſhould come and aide him: but there the Captaines that led the legions (among the which Canidius, a man of great eſtimacion about Antonius made one) committed many faults. For where they ſhould haue made head with the whole army vpon the PARTHIANS, they ſent him aide by ſmall cõpanies: and when they were ſlaine, they ſent him others alſo. So that by their beaſtlineſſe and lacke of conſideracion, they had like to haue made all the armie flie, if Antonius him ſelfe had not come frõ the front of the battell with the third legion, the which came through the middeſt of them that fled, vntill they came to front of the enemies, & that they ſtayed them from chaſing any further. Howbeit at this laſt conflict there were ſlaine no leſſe thẽ three thowſand men, and fiue thowſande beſidẽs brought ſore hurt into the campe, and amongeſt them alſo Flauius Gallus, whoſe body was ſhot through in foure places, whereof he died. Antonius went to the tents to viſite & comfort the ſicke & wounded, and for pities ſake he could not refraine from weeping: and they alſo ſhewing him the beſt countenaunce they coulde, tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to go and be dreſſed, and not to trouble him ſelfe for them, moſt reuerently calling him their Emperour & Captaine: & that for them ſelues, they were whole & ſafe, ſo that he had his health. For in deede to ſay truly, there was not at that time any Emperour or Captaine that had ſo great & puiſant an army as his together, both for luſty youths, & corage of the ſouldiers, as alſo for their pacience to away with ſo great paines & trouble. Furthermore, the obedience & reuerẽce they ſhewed vnto their captaine, with a maruelous earneſt loue & good wil, was ſo great: & all were indifferẽtly (as wel great as ſmal, the noble men, as meane men, the Captaines and ſouldiers) ſo earneſtly bent to eſteeme Antonius good will & fauor, aboue their owne life & ſafety: that in this point of marſhall diſcipline, the auncient ROMANES could not haue don any more. But diuers things were cauſe therof, as we haue told you before: Antonius nobility & ancient houſe, his eloquence, his plaine nature, his liberality & magnificence,

The loue and reuerence of the ſouldiers vnto Antonius.

The rare and ſingular gifts of Antonius.

A gnificence,& his familiarity to ſport & to be mery in company: but ſpecially the care he tooke at that time to help,viſite,& lament thoſe that were ſicke & woũded,ſeing euery man to haue that which was meete for him: that was of ſuch force & effect,as it made them that were ſicke & wounded to loue him better,& were more deſirous to do him ſeruice,then thoſe that were whole & ſoũd. This victory ſo encoraged the enemies,(who otherwiſe were weary to follow Antonius any further) that all night longe they kept the fieldes, and houered about the Romanes campe,thinking that they would preſently flie,& then that they ſhould take the ſpoile of their campe. So the next morning by breake of daye, there were gathered together a farre greater nũber of the Parthians, then they were before. For the rumor was,that there were not much fewer then forty thowſand horſe,bicauſe their king ſent thither euen the very gard B about his perſon, as vnto a moſt certaine and aſſured victorie, that they might be partners of the ſpoyle and booty they hoped to haue had: for as touching the king him ſelfe, he was neuer in any conflict or battell. Then Antonius deſirous to ſpeake to his ſouldiers, called for a blacke gowne,to appeare the more pitifull to them: but his friends did diſſwade him from it. Therefore he put on his coate armor,and being ſo apparelled, made an oration to his armie: in the which he highly commended them that had ouercome and driuen backe their enemies, and greatly rebuked them that had cowardly turned their backes. So that thoſe which had ouercome,prayed him to be of good chere: the other alſo to cleere them ſelues,willingly offred to take the lotts of Decimation if he thought good,or otherwiſe,to receiue what kind of puniſhment it ſhould pleaſe him to laye vpon them, ſo that he would forget any more to C miſlike,or to be offended with them. Antonius ſeeing that,did lift vp his hands to heauen, and made his prayer to the goddes,that if in exchaunge of his former victories,they would nowe ſende him ſome bitter aduerſitie: then that all might light on him ſelfe alone, and that they would giue the victorie to the reſt of his armie. The next morning,they gaue better order on euery ſide of the armie,and ſo marched forward: ſo that when the Parthians thought to returne againe to aſſaile them,they came farre ſhort of the reckoning. For where they thought to come not to fight,but to ſpoyle and make hauock of all: when they came neare them,they were ſore hurt with their ſlings and darts,and ſuch other iauelings as the Romanes darted at them,& the Parthians found them as rough and deſperat in fight,as if they had bene freſh men they had delt withall. Whereuppon their harts beganne againe to fayle them. But yet D when the Romanes came to goe downe any ſteepe hills or mountaines, then they would ſet on them with their arrowes,bicauſe the Romanes could goe downe but fayer and ſoftly. But then againe,the ſouldiers of the legion that caried great ſhields,returned backe,and incloſed them that were naked or light armed, in the middeſt amongeſt them, and did kneele of one knee on the ground,and ſo ſet downe their ſhields before them: and they of the ſecond ranck alſo couered them of the firſt rancke,and the third alſo couered the ſecond,and ſo from ranck to rancke all were couered. Inſomuch that this manner of couering and ſheading them ſelues with ſhields,was deuiſed after the facion of laying tiles vpon houſes,and to fight,was like the degrees of a Theater,and is a moſt ſtronge defence and bulwarke againſt all arrowes and ſhot that falleth vpon it. When the Parthians ſaw this countenaunce of the Romane ſouldiers E of the legion, which kneeled on the ground in that ſorte vpon one knee,ſuppoſing that they had bene wearied with trauell: they layed downe their bowes,& tooke their ſpeares & launces,and came to fight with them man for man. Then the Romanes ſodainely roſe vpon their feete,and with the darts that they threwe from them,they ſlue the formoſt,and put the reſt to flight,and ſo did they the next dayes that followed. But by meanes of theſe daungers and lets, Antonius armie could winne no way in a day,by reaſon whereof they ſuffred great famine: for they could haue but litle corne,and yet were they driuen daily to fight for it, and beſides that, they had no inſtruments to grynd it,to make bread of it. For the moſt part of them had bene left behind,bicauſe the beaſts that caried them were either dead,or els imployed to cary them that were ſore and wounded. For the famine was ſo extreame great,that the eight parte of a F buſhell of wheate was ſold for fifty Drachmas,and they ſold barley bread by the waight of ſiluer. In the ende,they were compelled to liue of erbes and rootes,but they found few of them that men doe commonly eate of,and were inforced to taſt of them that were neuer eaten before: among the which there was one that killed them, and made them out of their witts. For he that had once eaten of it, his memorye was gone from him, and he knewe no manner of thing, but onely busied him selfe in digging and hurling of stones from one place to another, as though it had bene a matter of great waight, and to be done with all possible speede. All the campe ouer, men were busily stouping to the ground, digging and carying of stones from one place to another: but at the last, they cast vp a great deale of choller, and dyed sodainly, bicause they lacked wine, which was the onely soueraine remedy to cure that disease. It is reported that Antonius seeing such a number of his men dye dayly, and that the PARTHIANS left them not, nether would suffer them to be at rest: he oftentymes cryed out sighing, and sayd: O, tenne thowsand. He had the valliantnes of tenne thowsand GRÆCIANS in such admiration, whome Xenophon brought away after the ouerthrow of CYRVS: bicause they had comen a farder iorney from BABYLON, and had also fought against much moe enemies many tymes told, then them selues, and yet came home with safetie. The PARTHIANS therfore seeing that they could not breake the good order of the armie of the ROMANES, and contrarily that they them selues were oftentymes put to flight, and welfauoredly beaten: they fell againe to their olde craftie suttelties. For when they found any of the ROMANES scattered from the armie to goe forrage, to seeke some corne, or other vittells: they would come to them as if they had bene their friends, and shewed them their bowes vnbent, saying, that them selues also did returne home to their contry as they did, and that they would follow them no further, howbeit that they should yet haue certaine MEDES that would follow them a dayes iorney or two, to keepe them that they should doe no hurt to the villages from the high wayes: and so holding them with this talke, they gently tooke their leaue of them, and bad them farewell, so that the ROMANES began againe to thinke them selues safe. Antonius also vnderstanding this, being very glad of it, determined to take his way through the plaine contry, bicause also they should find no water in the mountaines, as it was reported vnto him. So as he was determined to take this course, there came into his hoast one Mithridates, a gentleman from the enemies campe, who was Cosen vnto Monæzes that fled vnto Antonius, and vnto whome he had giuen three cities. When he came to Antonius campe, he praied them to bring him one that could speake the PARTHIAN, or SYRIAN tongue. So one Alexander ANTIOCHIAN, a famillier of Antonius, was brought vnto him. Then the gentleman told him what he was, and sayde, that Monæzes had sent him to Antonius, to requite the honor and curtesie he had shewed vnto him. After he had vsed this ceremonious speeche, he asked Alexander if he sawe those highe Mountaines a farre of, which he poynted vnto him with his finger. Alexander aunswered he did. The PARTHIANS (sayd he) doe lye in ambushe at the foote of those Mountaines, vnder the which lyeth a goodly playne champion contry: and they thinke that you beeing deceiued with their craftie suttill wordes, will leaue the way of the Mountaines, and turne into the plaine. For the other way, it is very hard and painefull, and you shall abide great thirst, the which you are well acquainted withall: but if Antonius take the lower way, let him assure him selfe to runne the same fortune that Marcus Crassus did. So Mithridates hauing sayd, he departed. Antonius was maruelously troubled in his mind when he heard thus much, & therfore called for his friends, to heare what they would say to it. The MARDIAN also that was their guide, being asked his opinion, aunswered: that he thought as much as the gentleman Mithridates had sayd. For, sayd he, admit that there were no ambushe of enemies in the valley, yet is it a long crooked way, and ill to hit: where taking the Mountaine waye, though it be stonye and painefull, yet there is no other daunger, but a whole dayes trauelling without any water. So Antonius chaūging his first mind and determination, remoued that night, and tooke the Mountaine way, commaunding euery man to prouide him selfe of water. But the most part of them lacking vessells to cary water in, some were driuen to fill their salletts and murrians with water, and others also filled goates skinnes to cary water in. Nowe they marching forwarde, worde was brought vnto the PARTHIANS that they were remoued: whereuppon, contrary to their manner, they presently followed them the selfe same night, so that by breake of day they ouertooke the rereward of the ROMANES, who were so lame and wearied with going, and lacke of sleepe, that they were euen done. For, beyond expectacion, they had gone that night, two hundred

A and forty furlong, and further, to see their enemies so sodainly at their backs, that made them vterly dispaire: but moste of all, the fighting with them increased their thirst, bicause they were forced to fight as they marched, to driue their enemies backe, yet creeping on still. The woward of the armie by chaunce met with a riuer that was very cleere, and colde water, but it was salt and venemous to drinke: for straight it did gnawe the gutts of those that had dronke it, and made them maruelous drye, and put them into a terrible ache and pricking. And notwithstanding that the MARDIAN had told them of it before, yet they would not be ruled, but violently thrust them backe that would haue kept them from drinking, and so dranke. But Antonius going vp and downe amongst them, prayed them to take a litle pacience for a while, for hard by there was another riuer that the water was excellent good to drinke, & that from

B thencesforth the way was so stony and ill for horsemen, that the enemies could followe them no further. So he caused the retreate to be sownded to call them backe that fought, and commaunded the tents to be set vppe, that the souldiers might yet haue shadow to refreshe them with. So when the tents were set vp, and the PARTHIANS also retyred according to their manner: the gentleman Mithridates before named, returned againe as before, and Alexander in like manner againe brought vnto him for Interpreter. Then Mithridates aduised him, that after the armie had reposed a litle, the ROMANES should remoue forthwith, and with all possible speede get to the riuer: bicause the PARTHIANS would goe no further, but yet were cruelly bent to follow them thither. Alexander caried the report thereof vnto Antonius, who gaue him a great deale of gold plate to bestowe vpon Mithridates. Mithridates tooke as much of him as

C he could well cary away in his gowne, and so departed with speede. So Antonius raysed his campe being yet day light, and caused all his army to marche, & the PARTHIANS neuer troubled any of them by the way: but amongest them selues it was as ill and dreadfull a night as euer they had. For there were Villens of their owne company, who cut their fellowes throates for the money they had, and besides that, robbed the sumpters and cariage of such money as they caried: and at length, they set vpon Antonius slaues that drane his owne sumpters and cariage, they brake goodly tables & riche plate in peeces, and deuided it among them selues. Thereuppon all the campe was straight in tumult and vprore: For the residue of them were affraid it had bene the PARTHIANS that had giuen them this alarom, and had put all the armie out of order. Insomuch that Antonius called for one Rhamnus, one of his slaues infranchised

D that was of his gard, and made him giue him his faith that he would thrust his sword through him when he would bid him, and cut of his head: bicause he might not be taken aliue of his enemies, nor knowen when he were dead. This grieued his friends to the hart, that they burst out a weeping for sorrow. The MARDIAN also did comfort him, and assured him that the riuer he sought for was hard by, and that he did gesse it by a sweete moyst wind that breathed vpon them, and by the ayer which they found fresher then they were wont, and also, for that they fetched their wind more at libertie: and moreouer, bicause that since they did set forward, he thought they were neare their iorneys ende, not lacking much of day. On the other side also, Antonius was informed, that this great tumult and trouble came not through the enemies, but through the vile couetousnes and villany of certaine of his souldiers. Therefore Antonius

E to set his armie againe in order, and to pacifie this vprore, sownded the trompet that euery man should lodge. Now day began to breake, and the army to fall againe into good order, and all the hurly burly to cease, when the PARTHIANS drewe neare, and that their arrowes lighted among them of the rereward of his army. Thereuppon the signall of battell was giuen to the light armed men, and the legioners did couer them selues as they had done before with their shields, with the which they receiued & defended the force of the PARTHIANS arrowes, who neuer durst any more come to hand strokes with them: and thus they that were in the woward, went downe by litle and litle, till at length they spyed the riuer. There Antonius placed his armed men vpon the sands to receiue and driue backe the enemies, and first of all, got ouer his men that were sicke and hurt, and afterwards all the rest. And those also that were left

F to resist the enemies, had leysure enough to drinke safely, and at their pleasure. For when the PARTHIANS saw the riuer, they vnbent their bowes, and bad the ROMANES passe ouer without any feare, and greatly commended their valliantnes. When they had all passed ouer the

The ſixt daye after this laſt battell, they came to the riuer of Araxes, which deuideth the contry of ARMENIA from MEDIA: the which appeared vnto them very daungerous to paſſe, for the depth and ſwiftnes of the ſtreame. And furthermore, there ranne a rumor through the campe, that the PARTHIANS lay in ambuſhe thereabouts, and that they would come & ſet vpon them whileſt they were troubled in paſſing ouer the riuer. But now, after they were all comen ſafely ouer without any daunger, and that they had gotten to the other ſide, into the prouince of ARMENIA: then they worſhipped that land, as if it had bene the firſt land they had ſeene after a long and daungerous voyage by ſea, being now arriued in a ſafe and happy hauen: and the teares ranne downe their cheekes, and euery man imbraced eache other for the great ioy they had. But nowe, keeping the fields in this frutefull contry ſo plentifull of all things, after ſo great a famine and want of all thinges: they ſo cramm'd them ſelues with ſuch plenty of vittells, that many of them were caſt into flyxes and dropſies. There Antonius muſtring his whole army, found that he had loſt twenty thowſand footemen, and foure thowſand horſemen, which had not all bene ſlayne by their enemies: for the moſt part of them dyed of ſicknes, making ſeuen and twenty dayes iorney, comming from the citie of

But theſe victories were not throughly performed nor accompliſhed, bicauſe they followed no long chaſe: and thereby it eaſily appeared, that Artabazus king of ARMENIA, had reſerued Antonius to end this warre. For if the ſixteene thowſand horſemen which he brought with him out of MEDIA, had bene at theſe battells, conſidering that they were armed and apparelled much after the PARTHIANS manner, and acquainted alſo with their fight: When the ROMANES had put them to flight that fought a battell with them, & that theſe ARMENIANS had followed the chaſe of them that fled, they had not gathered them ſelues againe in force, neither durſt they alſo haue returned to fight with them ſo often, after they had bene ſo many times ouerthrowen. Therefore, all thoſe that were of any credit and countenaunce in the army, did perſwade and egge Antonius to be reuenged of this ARMENIAN king. But Antonius wiſely diſſembling his anger, he told him not of his trechery, nor gaue him the worſe countenaunce, nor did him leſſe honor then he did before: bicauſe he knew his armie was weake, & lacked things neceſſary. Howbeit afterwards he returned againe into ARMENIA with a great

This greatly offended the ROMANES, and made them much to miſlike it: when they ſaw that for Cleopatraes ſake he depriued his contry of her due honor and glory, onely to gratifie the ÆGYPTIANS. But this was a prety while after. Howbeit then, the great haſte he made to returne vnto Cleopatra, cauſed him to put his men to ſo great paines, forcing them to lye in the field all winter long when it ſnew vnreaſonably, that by the way he loſt eight thowſand of his men, and ſo came downe to the ſea ſide with a ſmall companye, to a certaine place called

A ring that vnlooked for, the onely thing he lacked, (which made him he could not ouercome the PARTHIANS, meaning that he had not brought horsemen, and men with darts and slinges enough) was offred him in that sort: that he did him more pleasure to accept it, then it was pleasure to the other to offer it. Hereuppon, after he had spoken with the king of MEDES at the riuer of Araxes, he prepared him selfe once more to goe through ARMENIA, and to make more cruell warre with the PARTHIANS, then he had done before. Now whilest Antonius was busie in this preparation, Octauia his wife, whome he had left at ROME, would needes take sea to come vnto him. Her brother Octauius Cæsar was willing vnto it, not for his respect at all (as most authors doe report) as for that he might haue an honest culler to make warre with Antonius if he did misuse her, and not esteeme of her as she ought to be. But when she was come Octauia, Antonius wife, came to Athens to meete with him.

B to ATHENS, she receiued letters from Antonius, willing her to stay there vntill his comming, & did aduertise her of his iorney and determination. The which though it grieued her much, and that she knewe it was but an excuse: yet by her letters to him of aunswer, she asked him whether he would haue those thinges sent vnto him which she had brought him, being great store of apparell for souldiers, a great number of horse, summe of money, and gifts, to bestow on his friendes and Captaines he had about him: and besides all those, she had two thowsand souldiers chosen men, all well armed, like vnto the Prætors bands. When Niger, one of Antonius friends whome he had sent vnto ATHENS, had brought these newes from his wife Octauia, and withall did greatly prayse her, as she was worthy, and well deserued: Cleopatra knowing that Octauia would haue Antonius from her, and fearing also that if with her vertue and

C honest behauior, (besides the great power of her brother Cæsar) she did adde thereunto her modest kind loue to please her husband, that she would then be too stronge for her, and in the end winne him away: she suttelly seemed to languish for the loue of Antonius, pyning her body for lacke of meate. Furthermore, she euery way so framed her countenaunce, that when Antonius came to see her, she cast her eyes vpon him, like a woman rauished for ioy. Straight againe when he went from her, she fell a weeping and blubbering, looked rufully of the matter, and still found the meanes that Antonius should oftentymes finde her weeping: and then when he came sodainely vppon her, she made as though she dryed her eyes, and turned her face away, as if she were vnwilling that he should see her weepe. All these tricks she vsed, Antonius being in readines to goe into SYRIA, to speake with the king of MEDES. Then the flat- The flickering enticements of Cleopatra, vnto Antonius.

D terers that furthered Cleopatraes mind, blamed Antonius, and tolde him that he was a hard natured man, and that he had small loue in him, that would see a poore Ladye in such torment for his sake, whose life depended onely vpon him alone. For, Octauia, sayd they, that was maryed vnto him as it were of necessitie, bicause her brother Cæsars affayres so required it: hath the honor to be called Antonius lawefull spowse and wife: and Cleopatra, being borne a Queene of so many thowsands of men, is onely named Antonius Leman, and yet that she disdayned not so to be called, if it might please him she might enioy his company, and liue with him: but if he once leaue her, that then it is vnpossible she should liue. To be short, by these their flatteries and enticements, they so wrought Antonius effeminate mind, that fearing least she would make her selfe away: he returned againe vnto ALEXANDRIA, and referred the king of MEDES

E to the next yeare following, although he receyued newes that the PARTHIANS at that tyme were at ciuill warres amonge them selues. This notwithstanding, he went afterwardes and made peace with him. For he maried his Daughter which was very younge, vnto one of the sonnes that Cleopatra had by him: and then returned, beeing fully bent to make warre with Cæsar. When Octauia was returned to ROME from ATHENS, Cæsar commaunded her to goe out of Antonius house, and to dwell by her selfe, bicause he had abused her. Octauia aunswered him againe, that she would not forsake her husbands house, and that if he had no other occasion to make warre with him, she prayed him then to take no thought for her: for sayd she, it were too shamefull a thinge, that two so famous Captaines should bringe in ciuill warres among the ROMANES, the one for the loue of a woma, & the other for the iealousy betwixt one The occasion of ciuil warres betwixt Antonius and Cæsar.

F an other. Now as she spake the worde, so did she also performe the deede. vnkindly vse so noble a Lady: but yet the greatest cause of their malice vnto him, was for the diuision of lands he made amongst his children in the citie of ALEXANDRIA. And to confesse a troth, it was too arrogant and insolent a part, and done (as a man would say) in derision and contempt of the ROMANES. For he assembled all the people in the show place, where younge men doe exercise them selues, and there vpon a high tribunall siluered, he set two chayres of gold, the one for him selfe, and the other for Cleopatra, and lower chaires for his children: then Antonius arrogantly deuideth diuers prouinces vnto his children by Cleopatra. he openly published before the assembly, that first of all he did establish Cleopatra Queene of B Cæsarion, the supposed sõne of Cæsar, by Cleopatra. ÆGYPT, of CYPRVS, of LYDIA, and of the lower SYRIA, and at that time also, Cæsarion king of Alexander & Ptolomy, Antonius sonnes by Cleopatra. the same Realmes. This Cæsarion was supposed to be the sonne of Iulius Cæsar, who had left Cleopatra great with child. Secondly he called the sonnes he had by her, the kings of kings, and gaue Alexander for his portion, ARMENIA, MEDIA, and PARTHIA, when he had conquered the contry: and vnto Ptolomy for his portion, PHENICIA, SYRIA, and CILICIA. And therewithall he brought out Alexander in a long gowne after the facion of the MEDES, with a high copped tanke hat on his head, narrow in the toppe, as the kings of the MEDES and ARMENI-ANS doe vse to weare them: and Ptolomy apparelled in a cloke after the MACEDONIAN manner, with slippers on his feete, and a broad hat, with a royall band or diademe. Such was the apparell and old attyre of the auncient kinges and successors of Alexander the great. So after C his sonnes had done their humble duties, and kissed their father and mother: presently a company of ARMENIAN souldiers set there of purpose, compassed the one about, and a like company of the MACEDONIANS the other. Now for Cleopatra, she did not onely weare at that time (but at all other times els when she came abroad) the apparell of the goddesse Isis, and so gaue Accusations betwixt Octauius Cæsar, & Antonius. audience vnto all her subiects, as a new Isis. Octauius Cæsar reporting all these thinges vnto the Senate, and oftentimes accusing him to the whole people and assembly in ROME: he thereby stirred vp all the ROMANES against him. Antonius on thother side sent to ROME likewise to accuse him, and the chiefest poyntes of his accusations he charged him with, were these. First, that hauing spoyled Sextus Pompeius in SICILE, he did not giue him his parte of the Ile. Secondly, that he did deteyne in his hands the shippes he lent him to make that warre. Thirdly, D that hauing put Lepidus their companion and triumuirate out of his part of the Empire, and hauing depriued him of all honors: he retayned for him selfe the lands and reuenues thereof, which had bene assigned vnto him for his part. And last of all, that he had in manner deuided all ITALY amongest his owne souldiers, and had left no part of it for his souldiers. Octauius Cæsar aunswered him againe: that for Lepidus, he had in deede deposed him, and taken his part of the Empire from him, bicause he did ouercruelly vse his authoritie. And secondly, for the conquests he had made by force of armes, he was contented Antonius should haue his part of them, so that he would likewise let him haue his part of ARMENIA. And thirdly, that for his souldiers, they should seeke for nothing in ITALY, bicause they possessed MEDIA and PAR-THIA, the which prouinces they had added to the Empire of ROME, valliantly fighting with E their Emperor and Captaine. Antonius hearing these newes, being yet in ARMENIA, commaunded Canidius to goe presently to the sea side with his sixteene legions he had: and he him selfe with Cleopatra, went vnto the citie of EPHESVS, & there gathered together his gal-lies and shippes out of all parts, which came to the number of eight hundred, reckoning the great shippes of burden: and of those, Cleopatra furnished him with two hundred, and twenty warre. So Antonius, through the perswasions of Domitius, commaunded Cleopatra to returne againe into ÆGYPT, and there to vnderstand the successe of this warre. But Cleopatra, fearing least Antonius should againe be made friends with Octauius Cæsar, by the meanes of his wife Octauia: she so plyed Canidius with money, and filled his purse, that he became her spokes F man vnto Antonius, and told him there was no reason to send her from this warre, who defraied so great a charge: neither that it was for his profit, bicause that thereby the ÆGYPTIANS would

A would then be vtterly discoraged, which were the chiefest strength of the army by sea: considering that he could see no king of all the kings their confederats, that Cleopatra was inferior vnto, either for wisedom or iudgement, seeing that longe before she had wisely gouerned so great a realme as Ægypt, & besides that she had bene so long acquainted with him, by whom she had learned to manedge great affayres. These fayer perswasions wan him: for it was predestined that the gouernment of all the world should fall into Octauius Cesars handes. Thus, all their forces being ioyned together, they hoysed sayle towards the Ile of Samos, and there gaue them selues to feasts and sollace. For as all the kings, Princes, & communalties, peoples and cities from Syria, vnto the marishes Mæotides, and from the Armenians to the Ly-B rians, were sent vnto, to send and bringe all munition and warlike preparation they could:
euen so all players, minstrells, tumblers, fooles, and iesters, were commaunded to assemble in the Ile of Samos. So that, where in manner all the world in euery place was full of lamentations, sighes and teares: onely in this Ile of Samos there was nothing for many dayes space, but singing and pyping, and all the Theater full of these common players, minstrells, and singing men. Besides all this, euery citie sent an oxe thither to sacrifice, and kings did striue one with another who should make the nobleste feasts, & giue the richest gifts. So that euery man sayd, what can they doe more for ioy of victorie, if they winne the battell? When they make already such sumptuous feasts at the beginning of the warre? When this was done, he gaue the whole rabble of these minstrells, & such kind of people, the citie of Priene to keepe them withal, during this warre. Then he went vnto the citie of Athens, and there gaue him selfe a-C gaine to see playes and pastimes, and to keepe the Theaters. Cleopatra on the other side, being ielous of the honors which Octauia had receiued in this citie, where in deede she was maruelouslie honored and beloued of the Athenians: to winne the peoples good will also at Athens, she gaue them great gifts: and they likewise gaue her many great honors, and appointed certain Ambassadors to cary the decree to her house, amõg the which Antonius was one, who as a Citizen of Athens reported the matter vnto her, & made an oration in the behalfe of the citie. Afterwards he sent to Rome to put his wife Octauia out of his house, who (as it is reported) went out of his house with all Antonius children, sauing the eldest of them he had by Fuluia, who was with her father, bewailing & lamenting her cursed hap that had brought her to this, that she was accompted one of the chiefest causes of this ciuill warre. The Romanes D did pitie her, but much more Antonius, & those specially that had seene Cleopatra: who nether excelled Octauia in beawtie, nor yet in young yeares. Octauius Cesar vnderstanding the sodain & wonderful great preparation of Antonius, he was not a litle astonied at it, (fearing he should be driuen to fight that sommer) bicause he wanted many things, & the great and grieuous ex-actions of money did sorely oppresse the people. For all manner of men els, were driuen to pay the fourth part of their goods and reuenue: but the Libertines, (to were, those whose fathers or other predecessors had some time bene bond men) they were sessed to pay the eight part of all their goods at one payment. Hereuppon, there rose a wonderfull exclamation and great vprore all Italy ouer: so that among the greatest faults that euer Antonius committed, they blamed him most, for that he delayed to giue Cesar battell. For he gaue Cesar leysure to E make his preparacions, and also to appease the complaints of the people. When such a great summe of money was demaunded of them, they grudged at it, and grewe to mutinie vpon it: but when they had once paied it, they remembred it no more. Furthermore, Titius and Plancus (two of Antonius chiefest friends and that had bene both of them Consuls) for the great iniuries Cleopatra did them, bicause they hindered all they could, that she should not come to this warre: they went and yelded them selues vnto Cesar, and tolde him where the testament was that Antonius had made, knowing perfitly what was in it. The will was in the custodie of the Vestall Nunnes: of whom Cesar demaunded for it. They aunswered him, that they would not giue it him: but if he would goe and take it, they would not hinder him. Thereuppon Cesar went thither, & hauing red it first to him self, he noted certaine places worthy of reproch: F so assembling all the Senate, he red it before them all. Whereuppon diuers were marueloulsly offended, and thought it a straunge matter that he being aliue, should be punished for that he had appoynted by his will to be done after his death. Cesar chiefly tooke hold of this that he ordeyned touching his buriall: for he willed that his bodie, though he dyed at Rome, should A be brought in funerall pompe through the middest of the market place, and that it should be sent into Alexandria vnto Cleopatra. Furthermore, among diuers other faultes wherewith Antonius was to be charged, for Cleopatraes sake: Caluisius, one of Cæsars friends reproued him, bicause he had franckly giuen Cleopatra all the libraries of the royall citie of Pergamvm, in the which she had aboue two hundred thowsand seueral bookes. Again also, that being on a time set at the table, he sodainly rose from the borde, and trode vpon Cleopatraes foote, which was a signe giuen betwene them, that they were agreed of. That he had also suffred the Ephesians in his presence to call Cleopatra, their soueraine Ladye. That diuers times sitting in his tribunall and chayer of state, giuing audience to all kings and Princes: he had receiued loue letters from Cleopatra, written in tables of onyx or christall, and that he had red them, sitting B in his imperiall seate. That one day when Furnius, a man of great accompt, and the eloquentest man of all the Romanes, pleaded a matter before him: Cleopatra by chaunce cõming through the market place in her litter where Furnius was a pleading: Antonius straight rose out of his seate, and left his audience to followe her litter. This notwithstanding, it was thought Caluisi- us deuised the most part of all these accusations of his owne head. Neuertheles they that loued Antonius, were intercessors to the people for him, and amongest them they sent one Geminius vnto Antonius, to pray him he would take heede, that through his negligence his Empire were not taken from him, and that he should be counted an enemie to the people of Rome. This Geminius being arriued in Græce, made Cleopatra ielous straight of his cõming: bicause she surmised that he came not but to speake for Octauia. Therefore she spared not to C tawnt him all supper tyme, and moreouer to spyte him the more, she made him be set lowest of all at the borde, the which he tooke paciently, expecting occasion to speake with Antonius.

Now Antonius commaunding him at the table to tell him what wind brought him thither: he aunswered him, that it was no table talke, and that he would tell him to morrow morning fasting: but dronke or fasting, howsoeuer it were, he was sure of one thing, that all would not go well on his side, vnles Cleopatra were sent backe into Ægypt. Antonius tooke these wordes in very ill part. Cleopatra on the other side aunswered him, thou doest well Geminius, sayd she, to tell the truth before thou be compelled by torments: but within fewe dayes after, Geminius stale away, and fled to Rome. The flatterers also to please Cleopatra, did make her driue many other of Antonius faithfull seruaunts and friends from him, who could not abide the iniuries D done vnto them: amonge the which these two were chiefe, Marcus Syllanus, and Dellius the Historiographer: who wrote that he fled, bicause her Phisitian Glaucus tolde him, that Cleo- patra had set some secretly to kill him. Furthermore he had Cleopatraes displeasure, bicause he sayde one night at supper, that they made them drinke sowet wine, where Sarmentus at Rome drancke good wine of Falerna. This Sarmentus was a pleasaunt younge boye, such as the Lordes of Rome are wont to haue about them to make them pastyme, which they call their ioyes, and he was Octauius Cæsars boye. Nowe, after Cæsar had made sufficient preparation, he proclaymed open warre against Cleopatra, and made the people to abolishe the power and Empire of Antonius, bicause he had before giuen it vppe vnto a woman. And Cæsar sayde furthermore, that Antonius was not Maister of him selfe, but that Cleopatra had E brought him beside him selfe, by her charmes and amorous poysons: and that they that should make warre with them, should be Mardian the Euenuke, Photinus, and Iras, a woman of Cleopatraes bedchamber, that friseled her heare, and dressed her head, and Charmion, the which were those that ruled all the affaires of Antonius Empire. Before this warre, as it is reported, many signes & wonders fel out. First of all, the citie of Pisavrvm which was made a colony to Rome, and replenished with people by Antonius, standing vpon the shore side of the sea Adriatick, was by a terrible earthquake sonck into the ground. One of the images of stone which was set vp in the honor of Antonius, in the citie of Alba, did sweate many dayes together: and though some wyped it away, yet it left not sweating still. In the citie of Patras, F whilest Antonius was there, the temple of Hercules was burnt with lightning. And at the citie of Athens also, in a place where the warre of the gyants against the goddes is set out in imagerie: the statue of Bacchus with a terrible winde was throwen downe in the Theater.

It

A It was sayd that Antonius came of the race of Hercules, as you haue heard before, and in the manner of his life he followed Bacchus: and therefore he was called the new Bacchus. Furthermore, the same blustering storme of wind, ouerthrew the great mõstrous images at ATHENS, that were made in the honor of Eumenes and Attalus, the which men had named and intituled, the Antonians, and yet they did hurt none of the other images which were many besides. The Admirall galley of Cleopatra, was called Antoniade, in the which there chaunced a marueilous ill signe. Swallowes had bred vnder the poope of her shippe, & there came others after them that draue away the first, & plucked downe their neasts. Now when all things were ready, and that they drew neare to fight: it was found that Antonius had no lesse then fiue hundred good ships of warre, among the which there were many gallies that had eight & ten bancks of owers, the which were sumptuously furnished, not so meete for fight, as for triumphe: a hundred thowsand footemen, & twelue thowsand horsemen, & had with him to ayde him these kinges and subiects following. Bocchus king of LYBIA, Tarcondemus king of high CILICIA, Archelaus king of CAPPADOCIA, Philadelphus king of PAPHLAGONIA, Mithridates king of COMMAGENE, and Adallas king of THRACIA. All the which were there euery man in person. The residue that were absent sent their armies, as Polemõ king of PONT, Manchus king of ARABIA, Herodes king of IVRY: & furthermore, Amyntas king of LYCAONIA, & of the GALATIANS: and besides all these, he had all the ayde the king of MEDES sent vnto him. Now for Cæsar, he had two hundred and fifty shippes of warre, foure score thowsand footemen, & well neare as many horsemen as his enemy Antonius. Antonius for his part, had all vnder his dominiõ from ARMENIA, B & the riuer of Euphrates, vnto the sea IONIVM & ILLYRICVM. Octauius Cæsar had also for his part, all that which was in our HEMISPHÆRE, or halfe part of the world, from ILLYRIA, vnto the Occean sea vpon the west: then all from the Occean, vnto Mare Siculũ: & from AFRICK, all that which is against ITALY, as GAVLE, & SPAYNE. Furthermore, all from the prouince of CYRENIA, vnto ÆTHIOPIA, was subiect vnto Antonius. Now Antonius was made so subiect to a womans will, that though he was a great deale the stronger by land, yet for Cleopatraes sake, C he would needes haue this battell tryed by sea: though he sawe before his eyes, that for lacke of water men, his Captaines did presse by force all sortes of men out of GRÆCE that they could take vp in the field, as trauellers, muleters, reapers, haruest men, and younge boyes, and yet could they not sufficiently furnishe his gallies: so that the most part of them were empD ty, and could scant rowe, bicause they lacked water men enowe. But on the contrary side, Cæsars shippes were not built for pompe, highe, and great, onely for a fight and brauery, but they were light of yarage, armed and furnished with water men as many as they needed, and had them all in readines, in the hauens of TARENTVM, and BRVNDVSIVM. So Octauius Cæsar sent vnto Antonius, to will him to delay no more time, but to come on with his army into ITALY, and that for his owne part he would giue him safe harber, to lande without any trouble, and that he would withdraw his armie from the sea, as farre as one horse could runne, vntil he had put his army a shore, & had lodged his men. Antonius on the other side brauely sent him word againe, and chalenged the combate of him man to man, though he were the elder: and that if he refused him so, he would then fight a battell with him in the fields of PHARSALIA, as Iulius E Cæsar, and Pompey had done before. Now whileſt Antonius rode at anker, lying idely in harber at the head of ACTIVM, in the place where the citie of NICOPOLIS standeth at this present, Cæsar had quickly passed the sea Ionium, and taken a place called TORYNE, before Antonius vnderstoode that he had taken shippe. Then began his men to be affraid, bicause his army by land was left behind. But Cleopatra making light of it: and what daunger, I pray you, said she, is Cæsar keepe at * TORYNE? The next morning by breake of day, his enemies comming with F full force of owers in battell against him, Antonius was affraid that if they came to ioyne, they would take and cary away his shippes that had no men of warre in them. So he armed all his water men, and set them in order of battell vpon the forecastell of their shippes, and then lift vp all his rancks of owers towards the element, as well of the one side, as the other, with the prooes against the enemies, at the entry and mouth of the gulfe, which beginneth at the point of ACTIVM, and so kept them in order of battell, as if they had bene armed and furnished with water men and souldiers. Thus Octauius Cæsar beeing finely deceyued by this stratageame, retyred presently, and therewithall Antonius very wisely and sodainely did cut him off from fresh water. For, vnderstanding that the places where Octauius Cæsar landed, had very litle store of water, and yet very bad: he shut them in with stronge ditches and trenches he cast, to keepe them from salying out at their pleasure, and so to goe seeke water further of. Furthermore, he delt very friendely and curteously with Domitius, and against Cleopatraes mynde. For, he being sicke of an agewe when he went and tooke a litle boate to goe to Cæsars campe, Antonius was very sory for it, but yet he sent after him all his caryage, trayne, and men: and the same Domitius, as though he gaue him to vnderstand that he repented his open treason, he died immediatly after. There were certen kings also that forsooke him, and turned on Cæsars side: as Amyntas, and Deiotarus. Furthermore, his fleete and nauy that was vnfortunate in all thinges, and vnready for seruice, compelled him to chaunge his minde, and to hazard battell by land. And Canidius also, who had charge of his army by land, when time came to follow Antonius determination: he turned him cleane contrary, and counselled him to send Cleopatra backe againe, and him selfe to retyre into MACEDON, to fight there on the maine land. And furthermore told him, that Dicomes king of the GETES, promised him to ayde him with a great power: and that it should be no shame nor dishonor to him to let Cæsar haue the sea, (bicause him selfe & his men both had bene well practised & exercised in battels by sea, in the warre of SICILIA against Sextus Pompeius) but rather that he should doe against all reason, he hauing so great skill and experience of battells by land as he had, if he should not employ the force and valliantnes of so many lusty armed footemen as he had ready, but would weaken his army by deuiding them into shippes. But now, notwithstanding all these good perswasions, Cleopatra forced him to put all to the hazard of battel by sea: considering with her selfe how she might flie, & prouide for her safetie, not to helpe him to winne the victory, but to flie more easily after the battel lost. Betwixt Antonius campe & his fleete of shippes, there was a great hie point of firme lande that ranne a good waye into the sea, the which Antonius often vsed for a walke, without mistrust of feare or daunger. One of Cæsars men perceiued it, & told his Maister that he would laugh & they could take vp Antonius in the middest of his walke. Thereuppon Cæsar sent some of his men to lye in ambush for him, & they missed not much of taking of him: for they tooke him that came before him, bicause they discouered to soone, & so Antonius scaped verie hardly. So when Antonius had determined to fight by sea, he set all the other shippes a fire, but three score shippes of ÆGYPT, & reserued onely but the best & greatest gallies, from three bancks, vnto tenne bancks of owers. Into them he put two & twenty thowsand fighting men, with two thowsand darters & slingers. Now, as he was setting his men in order of battel, there was a Captaine, & a valliant man, that had serued Antonius in many battels & conflicts, & had all his body hacked & cut: who as Antonius passed by him, cryed out vnto him, & sayd: O, noble Emperor, how commeth it to passe that you trust to these vile brittle shippes? what, doe you mistrust these woundes of myne, and this sword? let the ÆGYPTIANS & PHÆNICIANS fight by sea, and set vs on the maine land, where we vse to conquer, or to be slayne on our feete. Antonius passed by him, and sayd neuer a word, but only beckoned to him with his hand & head, as though he willed him to be of good corage, although in deede he had no great corage him selfe. For when the Masters of the gallies & Pilots would haue let their sailes alone, he made them clap them on, saying to culler the matter withall, that not one of his enemies should scape. All that day, & the three dayes following, the sea rose so high, & was so boysterous, that the battel was put of. The fift day the storme ceased, & the sea calmed againe, & then they rowed with force of owers in battaile one against the other: Antonius leading the right wing with Publicola, & Cælius the left, & Marcus Octauius, & Marcus Iustetus the middest. Octauius Cæsar on thother side, had placed Agrippa in the left winge of his armye, and had kept the right winge for him selfe. For the armies by lande, Canidius was generall of Antonius side, and Taurus of Cæsars side: who kept their men in battell raye the one before the other, vppon the sea side, without stirring one againe the other. Further, touching both the Chieftaynes: Antonius being in a swift pinnase, was caried vp and downe by force of owers through his army, & spake to his people to encorage them to fight valliantly, as if they were on maine land, bicause of the steadines & heauines of their ships: & commaunded the Pilots & masters of the gallies,

B they had bene ſhippes riding at anker, and a good while he was ſo perſwaded: So he kept his gallies eight furlong from his enemies. About noone there roſe a litle gale of winde from the ſea, and then Antonius men waxing angry with tarying ſo long, and truſting to the greatnes and height of their ſhipps, as if they had bene inuincible: they began to march forward with their left wing. Ceſar ſeeing that, was a glad man, and began a litle to giue backe from the right wing, to allure them to come further out of the ſtraight & gulfe: to thend that he might with his light ſhippes well manned with water men, turne and enuiron the gallies of the enemies, the which were heauy of yarage, both for their biggenes, as alſo for lacke of watermen to row them. When the skirmiſh began, and that they came to ioyne, there was no great hurt at the firſt meeting, neither did the ſhippes vehemently hit one againſt the other, as they doe com-

C monly in fight by ſea. For on the one ſide, Antonius ſhippes for their heauines, could not haue the ſtrength and ſwiftnes to make their blowes of any force: and Ceſars ſhippes on thother ſide tooke great heede, not to ruſhe & ſhocke with the forecaſtells of Antonius ſhippes, whoſe proues were armed with great braſen ſpurres. Furthermore they durſt not flancke them, becauſe their points were eaſily broken, which way ſoeuer they came to ſet vpon his ſhippes, that were made of great mayne ſquare peeces of tymber, bounde together with great iron pinnes: ſo that the battel was much like to a battel by land, or to ſpeake more properly, to the aſſault of a citie. For there were alwaies three or foure of Ceſars ſhippes about one of Antonius ſhippes, and the ſouldiers fought with their pykes, halberds, and darts, and threw pots and darts with fire. Antonius ſhips on the other ſide beſtowed among them, with their crosbowes

D and engines of battery, great ſtore of ſhot from their highe towers of wodde, that were apon their ſhippes. Now Publicola ſeing Agrippa put forth his left wing of Ceſars army, to compaſſe in Antonius ſhippes that fought: he was driuen alſo to looſe of to haue more roome, & going a litle at one ſide, to put thoſe further of that were affraid, and in the middeſt of the battel. For they were ſore diſtreſſed by Arruntius. Howbeit the battell was yet of euen hand, and the victorie doubtfull, being indifferent to both: when ſodainely they ſaw the three ſcore ſhippes of Cleopatra buſie about their yard maſts, and hoyſing ſaile to flie. So they fled through the middeſt of them that were in fight, for they had bene placed behind the great ſhippes, & did marueloufly diſorder the other ſhippes. For the enemies them ſelues wondred much to ſee them ſaile in that ſort, with ful ſaile towards PELOPONNESVS. There Antonius ſhewed plainely, that

E he had not onely loſt the corage and hart of an Emperor, but alſo of a valliant man, & that he was not his owne man: (prouing that true which an old man ſpake in myrth, that the ſoule of a louer liued in another body, and not in his owne) he was ſo caried away with the vaine loue of this woman, as if he had bene glued vnto her, & that ſhe could not haue remoued without mouing of him alſo. For when he ſaw Cleopatraes ſhippe vnder ſaile, he forgot, forſooke, & betrayed them that fought for him, & imbarked vpon a galley with fiue bankes of owers, to follow her that had already begon to ouerthrow him, & would in the end be his vtter deſtruction. When ſhe knew this galley a farre of, ſhe lift vp a ſigne in the poope of her ſhippe, and ſo Antonius comming to it, was pluckt vp where Cleopatra was, howbeit he ſaw her not at his firſt comming, nor ſhe him, but went and ſate down alone in the prowe of his ſhippe, and ſaid ne-

F uer a word, clapping his head betwene both his hands. In the meane time came certaine light brigantynes of Ceſars that followed him hard. So Antonius ſtraight turned the prowe of his ſhippe, and preſently put the reſt to flight, ſauing one Eurycles LACEDEMONIAN, that followed him neare,and preſt vpon him with great corage,ſhaking a dart in his hand ouer the prow, as though he would haue throwen it vnto Antonius. Antonius ſeing him,came to the foreca- A ſtell of his ſhip,& asked him what he was that durſt follow Antonius ſo neare? I am,aunſwered he,Eurycles the ſonne of Lachares,who through Cæſars good fortune ſeketh to reuenge the death of my father. This Lachares was condemned of fellonie, and beheaded by Antonius. But yet Eurycles durſt not venter on Antonius ſhippe, but ſet vpon the other Admirall galley (for there were two) and fell with him with ſuch a blowe of his braſen ſpurre,that was ſo heauy and bigge, that he turned her round, and tooke her, with another that was loden with very rich ſtuffe and cariage. After Eurycles had left Antonius, he returned againe to his place,and ſate downe,ſpeaking neuer a word as he did before: and ſo liued three dayes alone, without ſpeaking to any man. But when he arriued at the head of Tænarus, there Cleopatraes women B firſt brought Antonius and Cleopatra to ſpeake together, and afterwards,to ſuppe and lye together. Then beganne there agayne a great number of Marchaunts ſhippes to gather about them,and ſome of their friends that had eſcaped from this ouerthrow: who brought newes, that his army by ſea was ouerthrowen,but that they thought the army by land was yet whole.

The Antonius ſent vnto Canidius,to returne with his army into Asia,by Macedon. Now for him ſelf, he determined to croſſe ouer into Affrick,& toke one of his carects or hulks loden Antonius lyceneeth his friends to depart,and giueth them a ſhippe loden with gold and ſiluer. with gold and ſiluer,and other rich cariage,and gaue it vnto his friends: commaunding them to depart,and to ſeeke to ſaue them ſelues. They aunſwered him weeping, that they would nether doe it,nor yet forſake him. Then Antonius very curteouſly and louingly did comfort them,and prayed them to depart: and wrote vnto Theophilus gouernor of Corinthe, that C he would ſee them ſafe,and helpe to hide them in ſome ſecret place,vntil they had made their way and peace with Cæſar. This Theophilus was the father of Hipparchus,who was had in great eſtimation about Antonius. He was the firſt of all his infranchiſed bondmen that reuolted from him,and yelded vnto Cæſar,and afterwardes went and dwelt at Corinthe. And thus it ſtoode with Antonius. Now for his armie by ſea, that fought before the head or foreland of Actium: they helde out a longe tyme, and nothing troubled them more then a great boyſterous wind that roſe full in the prooes of their ſhippes, and yet with much a doe, his nauy Antonius nauy ouerthrowen by Cæſar. was at length ouerthrowen,fiue howers within night. There were not ſlaine aboue fiue thow- D ſand men: but yet there were three hundred ſhippes taken, as Octauius Cæſar writeth him ſelfe in his commentaries. Many plainely ſawe Antonius flie, and yet could hardly beleeue it,that he that had nyneteene legions whole by lande, and twelue thowſand horſemen vpon the ſea ſide, would ſo haue forſaken them, and haue fled ſo cowardly: as if he had not oftentimes proued both the one and the other fortune,& that he had not bene throughly acquainted with the diuers chaunges and fortunes of battells. And yet his ſouldiers ſtill wiſhed for him,and euer hoped that he would come by ſome meanes or other vnto them. Furthermore, they ſhewed them ſelues ſo valliant and faithfull vnto him,that after they certainly knewe he was fled,they kept them ſelues whole together ſeuen daies. In the ende Canidius, Antonius tute of their heads and leaders,they yelded themſelues vnto the ſtronger. This done,Cæſar ſai-Antonius legions doe yeld them ſelues vnto Octauius Cæſar. led towards Athens,and there made peace with the Græcians,and deuided the reſt of the E corne that was taken vp for Antonius army,vnto the townes and cities of Græce,the which had bene brought to extreme miſery & pouerty,cleane without money,ſlaues,horſe,& other beaſtes of cariage. So that my grandfather Nicarchus tolde,that all the Citizens of our citie of Chæronea,(not one excepted)were driuen them ſelues to cary a certaine meaſure of corne on their ſhoulders to the ſea ſide,that lieth directly ouer againſt the Ile of Anticyra, & yet were they driuen thether with whippes. They caried it thus but once: for,the ſecond tyme that they were charged againe to make the like cariage,all the corne being ready to be caried, newes came that Antonius had loſt the battel,& ſo ſcaped our poore city. For Antonius ſouldi-ers & deputies fled immediatly,& the citizens deuided the corne amongſt them. Antonius being arriued in Libya,he ſent Cleopatra before into Ægypt from the citie of Parætonivm: & F he him ſelfe remained very ſolitary,hauing onely two of his friends with him,with whom he wandred vp & down,both of them orators,the one Ariſtocrates a Græcian,& the other Lu-

A cilius a ROMANE. Of whom we haue written in an other place, that at the battell where Brutus was ouerthrowen, by the citie of PHILIPPES, he came & willingly put him self into the hands of those that followed Brutus, saying that it was he: bicause Brutus in the meane time might haue liberty to saue him selfe. And afterwards bicause Antonius saued his life, he still remained with him: and was very faithfull and frendly vnto him till his death. But when Antonius heard, that he whom he had trusted with the gouernment of LIBYA, and vnto whom he had geuen the charge of his armie there, had yelded vnto Cesar: he was so madde withall, that he would haue slaine him selfe for anger, had not his frendes about him withstoode him, and kept him from it. So he went vnto ALEXANDRIA, and there found Cleopatra about a wonderfull enterprise, and of great attempt. Betwixt the redde sea, and the sea betwene the landes that poynt B vpon the coast of ÆGYPT, there is a litle peece of land that deuideth both the seas, and separateth AFRICKE from ASIA: the which straight is so narrow at the end where the two seas are narrowest, that it is not aboue three hundred furlonges ouer. Cleopatra went about to lift her shippes out of the one sea, and to hale them ouer the straight into the other sea: that when her shippes were come into this goulfe of ARABIA, she might then carie all her gold & siluer away, and so with a great companie of men goe and dwell in some place about the Ocean sea farre from the sea Mediterranium, to scape the daunger and bondage of this warre. But now, bicause the ARABIANS dwelling about the citie of PETRA, did burne the first shippes that were brought alande, and that Antonius thought that his armie by lande, which he left at ACTIVM was yet whole: she left of her enterprise, and determined to keepe all the portes and C passages of her realme. Antonius, he forsooke the citie and companie of his frendes, and built him a house in the sea, by the Ile of PHAROS, vpon certaine forced mountes which he caused to be cast into the sea, and dwelt there, as a man that banished him selfe from all mens companie: saying that he would lead Timons life, bicause he had the like wrong offered him, that was afore offered vnto Timon: and that for the vnthankefulnes of those he had done good vnto, and whom he tooke to be his frendes, he was angry with all men, and would trust no man. This Timon was a citizen of ATHENS, that lined about the warre of PELOPONNESVS, as appeareth by Plato, and Aristophanes commedies: in the which they mocked him, calling him a vyper, & malicious man vnto mankind, to shunne all other mens companies, but the companie of young Alcibiades, a bolde and insolent youth, whom he woulde greatly feast, and make D much of, and kissed him very gladly. Apemantus wondering at it, asked him the cause what he ment to make so muche of that young man alone, and to hate all others: Timon aunswered him, I do it sayd he, bicause I know that one day he shall do great mischiefe vnto the ATHENIANS. This Timon sometimes would haue Apemantus in his companie, bicause he was much like to his nature & condicions, and also followed him in maner of life. On a time when they solemnly celebrated the feasts called Choæ at ATHENS, (to wit, the feasts of the dead, where they make sprincklings and sacrifices for the dead) and that they two then feasted together by them selues, Apemantus said vnto the other: O, here is a trimme banket Timon. Timon aunswered againe, yea said he, so thou wert not here. It is reported of him also, that this Timon on a time (the people being assembled in the market place about dispatch of some affaires) got vp E into the pulpit for Orations, where the Orators commonly vse to speake vnto the people: & silence being made, euerie man listning to heare what he would say, bicause it was a wonder to see him in that place: at length he began to speake in this maner. My Lordes of ATHENS, I haue a litle yard in my house where there groweth a figge tree, on the which many citizens haue hãged them selues: & bicause I meane to make some building vpon the place, I thought good to let you all vnderstand it, that before the figge tree be cut downe, if any of you be desperate, you may there in time goe hang your selues. He dyed in the citie of HALES, and was buried vpon the sea side. Nowe it chaunced so, that the sea getting in, it compassed his tombe rounde about, that no man coulde come to it: and vpon the same was wrytten this epitaphe.

Many other things could we tell you of this Timon, but this litle ſhall ſuffice at this preſent. But now to returne to Antonius againe. Canidius him ſelfe came to bring him newes, that he had loſt all his armie by land at ACTIVM. On thother ſide he was aduertiſed alſo, that Herodes king of IVRIE, who had alſo certeine legions and bandes with him, was reuolted vnto Cæſar, and all the other kings in like maner: ſo that, ſauing thoſe that were about him, he had none left him. All this notwithſtanding did nothing trouble him, and it ſeemed that he was contented to forgoe all his hope, and ſo to be ridde of all his care and troubles. Thereupon he left his ſolitarie houſe he had built in the ſea which he called Timoneon, and Cleopatra receiued him into her royall pallace. He was no ſooner comen thither, but he ſtraight ſet all the city of rioting and banketing againe, and him ſelfe, to liberalitie and giftes. He cauſed the ſonne of Iulius Cæſar and Cleopatra, to be enrolled (according to the maner of the ROMANES) amongeſt the number of young men: & gaue Antyllus, his eldeſt ſonne he had by Fuluia, the mans gowne, the which was a plaine gowne, without gard or imbroderie of purple. For theſe things, there was kept great feaſting, banketing, and dauncing in ALEXANDRIA many dayes together. In deede they did breake their firſt order they had ſet downe, which they called Amimetobion, (as much to ſay, no life comparable) & did ſet vp an other which they called Synapothanumenon (ſignifying the order and agreement of thoſe that will dye together) the which in exceeding ſumptuouſnes and coſt was not inferior to the firſt. For their frendes made them ſelues to be inrolled in this order of thoſe that would dye together, and ſo made great feaſtes one to an other: for euerie man when it came to his turne, feaſted their whole companie and fraternitie. Cleopatra in the meane time was verie carefull in gathering all ſorts of poyſons together to deſtroy men. Now to make proofe of thoſe poyſons which made men dye with leaſt paine, ſhe tried it vpon condemned men in priſon. For when ſhe ſaw the poyſons that were ſodaine and vehement, and brought ſpeedy death with grieuous torments: & in contrary maner, that ſuche as were more milde and gentle, had not that quicke ſpeede and force to make one dye ſodainly: ſhe afterwardes went about to proue the ſtinging of ſnakes and adders, and made ſome to be applied vnto men in her ſight, ſome in one ſorte, and ſome in an other. So when ſhe had dayly made diuers and ſundrie proofes, ſhe found none of all them ſhe had proued ſo fit, as the biting of an Aſpicke, the which only cauſeth a heauines of the head, without ſwounding or complaining, and bringeth a great deſire alſo to ſleepe, with a litle ſwet in the face, and ſo by litle and litle taketh away the ſences and vitall powers, no liuing creature perceiuing that the pacientes feele any paine. For they are ſo ſorie when any bodie waketh them, and taketh them vp: as thoſe that being taken out of a ſound ſleepe, are very heauy and deſirous to ſleepe. This notwithſtanding, they ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Octauius Cæſar in ASIA, Cleopatra requeſting the realme of ÆGYPT for her children, and Antonius praying that he might be ſuffered to liue at ATHENS like a priuate man, if Cæſar would not let him remaine in ÆGYPT. And bicauſe they had no other men of eſtimacion about them, for that ſome were fledde, and thoſe that remained, they did not greatly truſt them: they were inforced to ſende Euphronius the ſchoolemaiſter of their children. For Alexas LAODICIAN, who was brought into Antonius houſe and fauor by meanes of Timagenes, and afterwards was in greater credit with him, then any other GREGIAN: (for that he had alway bene one of Cleopatraes miniſters to win Antonius, and to ouerthrow all his good determinations to vſe his wife Octauia well) him Antonius had ſent vnto Herodes king of IVRIE, hoping ſtill to keepe him his frend, that he ſhould not reuolt from him. But he remained there, and betrayed Antonius. For where he ſhould haue kept Herodes from reuolting from him, he perſwaded him to turne to Cæſar: & truſting king Herodes, he preſumed to come in Cæſars preſence. Howbeit Herodes did him no pleaſure: for he was preſently taken priſoner, and ſent in chaines to his owne contrie, & there by Cæſars commaundement put to death. Thus was Alexas in Antonius life time put to death, for betraying of him. Furthermore, Cæſar would not graunt vnto Antonius requeſts: but for Cleopatra, he made her aunſwere, that he woulde deny her nothing reaſonable, ſo that ſhe would either put Antonius

A to death, or driue him out of her contrie. Therewithall he sent Thyreus one of his men vnto her, a verie wise and discreete man, who bringing letters of credit from a young Lorde vnto a noble Ladie, and that besides greatly liked her beawtie, might easely by his eloquence haue perswaded her. He was longer in talke with her then any man else was, and the Queene her selfe also did him great honor: insomuch as he made Antonius gealous of him. Whereupon Antonius caused him to be taken and well fauoredly whipped, and so sent him vnto Cæsar: and bad him tell him that he made him angrie with him, bicause he shewed him selfe prowde and disdainfull towards him, and now specially when he was easie to be angered, by reason of his present miserie. To be short, if this mislike thee said he, thou hast Hipparchus one of my infranchised bondmen with thee: hang him if thou wilt, or whippe him at thy pleasure, that we may B crie quittaunce. From thenceforth, Cleopatra to cleere her selfe of the suspicion he had of her, she made more of him then euer she did. For first of all, where she did solemnise the day of her birth very meanely and sparingly, fit for her present misfortune: she now in contrary maner did keepe it with such solemnitie, that she exceeded all measure of sumptuousnes and magnificence: so that the ghests that were bidden to the feasts, and came poore, went away rich. Nowe things passing thus, Agrippa by diuers letters sent one after an other vnto Cæsar, prayed him to returne to Rome, bicause the affaires there did of necessity require his person and presence. Thereupon he did deferre the warre till the next yeare following: but when winter was done, he returned againe through Syria by the coast of Africke, to make warres against Antonius, and his other Captaines. When the citie of Pelusium was taken, there ran a ru-C mor in the citie, that Seleucus, by Cleopatraes consent, had surrendered the same. But to cleere her selfe that she did not, Cleopatra brought Seleucus wife and children vnto Antonius, to be reuenged of them at his pleasure. Furthermore, Cleopatra had long before made many sumptuous tombes and monumentes, as well for excellencie of workemanshippe, as for height and greatnes of building, ioyning hard to the temple of Isis. Thither she caused to be brought all the treasure & pretious things she had of the auncient kings her predecessors: as gold, siluer, emerods, pearles, ebbanie, iuorie, and sinnamon, and besides all that, a maruelous number of torches, faggots, and flaxe. So Octauius Cæsar being affrayed to loose suche a treasure and masse of riches, and that this woman for spight would set it a fire, and burne it euery whit: he alwayes sent some one or other vnto her from him, to put her in good comfort, whilest he in D the meane time drewe neere the citie with his armie. So Cæsar came, and pitched his campe hard by the city, in the place where they runne and manage their horses. Antonius made a saly vpon him, and fought verie valliantly, so that he draue Cæsars horsemen backe, fighting with his men euen into their campe. Then he came againe to the pallace, greatly boasting of this victorie, and sweetely kissed Cleopatra, armed as he was, when he came from the fight, recommending one of his men of armes vnto her, that had valliantly fought in this skirmish. Cleopatra to reward his manlines, gaue him an armor and head peece of cleane gold: howbeit the man at armes when he had receiued this rich gift, stale away by night, and went to Cæsar. Antonius sent againe to chalenge Cæsar, to fight with him hande to hande. Cæsar aunswered him, that he had many other wayes to dye then so. Then Antonius seeing there was no way more E honorable for him to dye, then fighting valliantly: he determined to sette vp his rest, both by sea and lande. So being at supper, (as it is reported) he commaunded his officers and household seruauntes that waited on him at his bord, that they should fill his cuppes full, and make as muche of him as they could: for said he, you know not whether you shall doe so much for me to morrow or not, or whether you shall serue an other maister: and it may be you shall see me no more, but a dead bodie. This notwithstanding, perceiuing that his frends and men fell a weeping to heare him say so: to salue that he had spoken, he added this more vnto it, that he would not leade them to battell, where he thought not rather safely to returne with victorie, then valliantly to dye with honor. Furthermore, the selfe same night within litle of midnight, when all the citie was quiet, full of feare, and sorrowe, thinking what would be the issue and F ende of this warre: it is said that sodainly they heard a maruelous sweete harmonie of sundrie sortes of instrumentes of musicke, with the crie of a multitude of people, as they had bene dauncing, and had song as they vse in Bacchus feastes, with mouinges and turninges after the maner of the Satyres: & it ſeemed that this daunce went through the city vnto the gate that opened to the enemies, & that all the troupe that made this noiſe they heard, went out of the city at that gate. Now, ſuch as in reaſon ſought the depth of the interpretacion of this wōder, thought that it was the god vnto whom Antonius bare ſingular deuotion to counterfeate and reſemble him, that did forſake them. The next morning by breake of day, he went to ſet thoſe few footemen he had in order vpon the hills adioyning vnto the citie: and there he ſtoode to behold his gallies which departed from the hauen, and rowed againſt the gallies of his enemies, and ſo ſtoode ſtill, looking what exployte his ſouldiers in them would do. But when by force of rowing they were come neere vnto them, they firſt ſaluted Cæſars men: and then Cæſars men reſaluted them alſo, and of two armies made but one, and then did all together row toward the citie. When Antonius ſawe that his men did forſake him, and yeelded vnto Cæſar, and that his footemen were broken and ouerthrowen: he then fled into the citie, crying out that Cleopatra had betrayed him vnto them, with whom he had made warre for her ſake. Then ſhe being affraied of his fury, fled into the tombe which ſhe had cauſed to be made, and there locked the dores vnto her, and ſhut all the ſpringes of the lockes with great boltes, and in the meane time ſent vnto Antonius to tell him that ſhe was dead. Antonius beleuing it, ſaid vnto him ſelfe: what doeſt thou looke for further, Antonius, ſith ſpitefull fortune hath taken from thee the only ioy thou haddeſt, for whom thou yet reſeruedſt thy life? when he had ſayd theſe words, he went into a chamber & vnarmed him ſelfe, and being naked ſaid thus: O Cleopatra, it grieueth me not that I haue loſt thy companie, for I will not be long from thee: but I am ſory, that hauing bene ſo great a Captaine and Emperour, I am in deede condemned to be iudged of leſſe corage and noble minde, then a woman. Now he had a man of his called Eros, whom he loued and truſted much, and whom he had long before cauſed to ſweare vnto him, that he ſhould kill him when he did commaunde him: and then he willed him to keepe his promiſe. His man drawing his ſworde, lift it vp as though he had ment to haue ſtriken his maiſter: but turning his head at one ſide, he thruſt his ſword into him ſelfe, and fell downe dead at his maiſters foote. Then ſaid Antonius, O noble Eros, I thanke thee for this, and it is valliantly done of thee, to ſhew me what I ſhould doe to my ſelfe, which thou couldeſt not doe for me. Therewithall he tooke his ſword, and thruſt it into his bellie, and ſo fell downe vpon a litle bed. The wounde he had killed him not preſently, for the blood ſtinted a litle when he was layed: and when he came ſomwhat to him ſelfe againe, he praied them that were about him to diſpatch him. But they all fled out of the chamber, and left him crying out & tormenting him ſelfe: vntill at laſt there came a ſecretarie vnto him called Diomedes, who was commaunded to bring him into the tombe or monument where Cleopatra was. When he heard that ſhe was aliue, he verie earneſtlie prayed his men to carie his bodie thither, and ſo he was caried in his mens armes into the entry of the monument. Notwithſtāding, Cleopatra would not open the gates, but came to the high windowes, and caſt out certaine chaines and ropes, in the which Antonius was truſſed: and Cleopatra her owne ſelfe, with two women only, which ſhe had ſuffered to come with her into theſe monumentes, triſed Antonius vp. They that were preſent to behold it, ſaid they neuer ſaw ſo pitiefull a ſight. For, they plucked vp poore Antonius all bloody as he was, and drawing on with pangs of death, who holding vp his hands to Cleopatra, raiſed vp him ſelfe as well as he could. It was a hard thing for theſe women to do, to lift him vp: but Cleopatra ſtowping downe with her head, putting to all her ſtrength to her vttermoſt power, did lift him vp with much a doe, and neuer let goe her hold, with the helpe of the women beneath that bad her be of good corage, and were as forie to ſee her labor ſo, as ſhe her ſelfe. So when ſhe had gotten him in after that ſorte, and layed him on a bed: ſhe rent her garments vpon him, clapping her breſt, and ſcratching her face & ſtomake. Then ſhe dried vp his blood that had berayed his face, and called him her Lord, her husband, and Emperour, forgetting her owne miſerie and calamity, for the pitie and compaſſion ſhe tooke of him. Antonius made her ceaſſe her lamenting, and called for wine, either bicauſe he was a thirſt, or elſe for that he thought thereby to haſten his death. When he had dronke, he earneſtly prayed her, and perſwaded her, that ſhe would ſeeke to ſaue her life, if ſhe could poſſible, without reproache and diſhonor: and that chiefly ſhe ſhould truſt Proculeius aboue any man elſe about Cæſar. Antonius caried vnto Cleopatraes tombe.

A for him ſelfe, that ſhe ſhould not lament nor ſorowe for the miſerable chaunge of his fortune at the end of his dayes: but rather that ſhe ſhould thinke him the more fortunate, for the former triumphes & honors he had receiued, conſidering that while he liued he was the nobleſt and greateſt Prince of the world, & that now he was ouercome, not cowardly, but valiantly, a ROMANE by an other ROMANE. As Antonius gaue the laſt gaſpe, Proculeius came that was ſent from Cæſar. For after Antonius had thruſt his ſworde in him ſelfe, as they caried him into the tombes and monuments of Cleopatra, one of his gard called Dercetæus, tooke his ſword with the which he had ſtriken him ſelfe, and hidde it: then he ſecretly ſtale away, and brought Octauius Cæſar the firſt newes of his death, & ſhewed him his ſword that was bloodied. Cæſar hearing theſe newes, ſtraight withdrewe him ſelfe into a ſecret place of his tent, and there burſt

B out with teares, lamenting his hard and miſerable fortune, that had bene his frende and brother in law, his equall in the Empire, and companion with him in ſundry great exploytes and battells. Then he called for all his frendes, and ſhewed them the letters Antonius had written to him, and his aunſweres alſo ſent him againe, during their quarrell and ſtrife: & how fiercely and prowdly the other anſwered him, to all iuſt and reaſonable matters he wrote vnto him. After this, he ſent Proculeius, and commaunded him to doe what he could poſſible to get Cleopatra aliue, fearing leaſt otherwiſe all the treaſure would be loſt: and furthermore, he thought that if he could take Cleopatra, and bring her aliue to ROME, ſhe would maruelouſly beawtifie and ſette out his triumphe. But Cleopatra would neuer put her ſelfe into Proculeius handes, al-

C though they ſpake together. For Proculeius came to the gates that were very thicke & ſtrong, and ſurely barred, but yet there were ſome cranewes through the which her voyce might be heard, and ſo they without vnderſtoode, that Cleopatra demaunded the kingdome of ÆGYPT for her ſonnes: and that Proculeius aunſwered her, that ſhe ſhould be of good cheere, and not be affrayed to referre all vnto Cæſar. After he had viewed the place verie well, he came and reported her aunſwere vnto Cæſar. Who immediatly ſent Gallus to ſpeake once againe with her, and bad him purpoſely hold her with talke, whileſt Proculeius did ſet vp a ladder againſt that high windowe, by the which Antonius was triſed vp, and came downe into the monument with two of his men hard by the gate, where Cleopatra ſtoode to heare what Gallus ſayd vnto her. One of her women which was ſhut in her monuments with her, ſaw Proculeius by chaunce as he came downe, and ſhreeked out: O, poore Cleopatra, thou art taken. Then when ſhe ſawe

D Proculeius behind her as ſhe came from the gate, ſhe thought to haue ſtabbed her ſelfe in with a ſhort dagger ſhe ware of purpoſe by her ſide. But Proculeius came ſodainly vpon her, and taking her by both the hands, ſaid vnto her. Cleopatra, firſt thou ſhalt doe thy ſelfe great wrong, and ſecondly vnto Cæſar: to depriue him of the occaſion and oportunitie, openly to ſhew his bountie and mercie, and to geue his enemies cauſe to accuſe the moſt curteous and noble Prince that euer was, and to appeache him, as though he were a cruell and mercieleſſe man, that were not to be truſted. So euen as he ſpake the word, he tooke her dagger from her, and ſhooke her clothes for feare of any poyſon hidden about her. Afterwardes Cæſar ſent one of his infranchiſed men called Epaphroditus, whom he ſtraightly charged to looke well vnto her, and to beware in any caſe that ſhe made not her ſelfe away: and for the reſt, to vſe her with all

E the curteſie poſſible. And for him ſelfe, he in the meane time entred the citie of ALEXANDRIA, and as he went, talked with the Philoſopher Arrius, and helde him by the hande, to the end that his contrie men ſhould reuerence him the more, bicauſe they ſaw Cæſar ſo highly eſteeme and honor him. Then he went into the ſhow place of exerciſes, and ſo vp to his chaire of ſtate which was prepared for him of a great height: and there according to his commaundement, all the people of ALEXANDRIA were aſſembled, who quaking for feare, fell downe on their knees before him, and craued mercie. Cæſar bad them all ſtande vp, and told them openly that he forgaue the people, and pardoned the felonies and offences they had committed againſt him in this warre. Firſt, for the founders ſake of the ſame citie, which was Alexander the great: ſecondly, for the beawtie of the citie, which he muche eſteemed and wondred

F at: thirdly, for the loue he bare vnto his verie frend Arrius. Thus did Cæſar honor Arrius, who craued pardon for him ſelfe and many others, & ſpecially for Philoſtratus, the eloquenteſt man of all the ſophiſters and Orators of his time, for preſent and ſodaine ſpeech: howbeit he falſly named him selfe an Academicke Philosopher. Therefore, Cæsar that hated his nature & condicions, would not heare his sute. Thereupon he let his gray beard grow long, and followed Arrius steppe by steppe in a long mourning gowne, still bussing in his eares this Greeke verse: A his time, for presentspeech vpon a sodaine.

A vvise man it that he be vvise in deede, May by a vvise man haue the better speede.

Cæsar vnderstanding this, not for the desire he had to deliuer Philostratus of his feare, as to ridde Arrius of malice & enuy that might haue fallen out against him: he pardoned him. Now touching Antonius sonnes, Antyllus, his eldest sonne by Fuluia was slaine, bicause his schoolemaister Theodorus did betray him vnto the souldiers, who strake of his head. And the villaine tooke a precious stone of great value from his necke, the which he did sowe in his girdell, and afterwards denied that he had it: but it was founde about him, and so Cæsar trussed him vp for it. For Cleopatraes children, they were verie honorablie kept, with their gouernors and traine that waited on them. But for Cæsarion, who was sayd to be Iulius Cæsars sonne: his mother Cleopatra had sent him vnto the INDIANS through ÆTHIOPIA, with a great summe of money. But one of his gouernors also called Rhodon, euen such an other as Theodorus, perswaded him to returne into his contrie, & told him that Cæsar sent for him to geue him his mothers kingdom. So, as Cæsar was determining with him selfe what he should doe, Arrius sayd vnto him, B

Too Many Cæsars is not good.

The saying of Arrius the Philosopher.

Alluding vnto a certaine verse of Homer that sayth:

Too Many Lords doth not vvell.

Therefore Cæsar did put Cæsarion to death, after the death of his mother Cleopatra. Many Princes, great kings and Captaines did craue Antonius body of Octauius Cæsar, to giue him honorable burial: but Cæsar would neuer take it from Cleopatra, who did sumptuously and royally burie him with her owne handes, whom Cæsar suffred to take as much as she would to bestow vpon his funeralls. Now was she altogether ouercome with sorow & passion of minde, for she had knocked her brest so pitiefully, that she had martired it, and in diuers places had raised vlsers and inflamacions, so that she fell into a feuer withal: whereof she was very glad, hoping thereby to haue good colour to absteine from meate, and that so she might haue dyed easely without any trouble. She had a Phisition called Olympus, whom she made priuie of her intent, to thend he shoulde helpe her to ridde her out of her life: as Olympus wryteth him selfe, who wrote a booke of all these thinges. But Cæsar mistrusted the matter, by many coniectures he had, and therefore did put her in feare, & threatned her to put her children to shameful death. With these threats, Cleopatra for feare yelded straight, as she would haue yelded vnto strokes: and afterwards suffred her selfe to be cured and dieted as they listed. Shortly after, Cæsar came him selfe in person to see her, and to comfort her. Cleopatra being layed vpon a litle low bed in poore estate, when she sawe Cæsar come into her chamber, she sodainly rose vp, naked in her smocke, and fell downe at his feete maruelously disfigured: both for that she had plucked her heare from her head, as also for that she had martired all her face with her nailes, and besides, her voyce was small and trembling, her eyes sonke into her heade with continuall blubbering and moreouer, they might see the most parte of her stomake torne in sunder. To be short, her bodie was not much better then her minde: yet her good grace and comelynes, and the force of her beawtie was not altogether defaced. But notwithstanding this ougly and pitiefull state of hers, yet she showed her selfe within, by her outward lookes and countenance. When Cæsar had made her lye downe againe, and sate by her beddes side: Cleopatra began to cleere and excuse her selfe for that she had done, laying all to the feare she had of Antonius. Cæsar, in contrarie maner, reproued her in euery poynt. Then she sodainly altered her speache, and prayed him to pardon her, as though she were affrayed to dye, & desirous to liue. At length, she gaue him a breefe and memoriall of all the readie money & treasure she had. But by chaunce there stoode Seleucus by, one of her Treasorers, who to seeme a good seruant, came straight to Cæsar, to disproue Cleopatra, that she had not set in al, but kept many things back of purpose. Cleopatra was in such a rage with him, that she flew vpon him, and tooke him by the heare of the head, and boxed him wellfauoredly. Cæsar fell a laughing, and parted the fray. Alas, said she, O Cæsar: is not this a great shame and reproche, that thou hauing vouchesaued to take the peines C

A wcome vnto me, and haſt done me this honor, poore wretche, and caitife creature, brought into this pitiefull & miſerable eſtate: and that mine owne ſeruaunts ſhould come now to accuſe me, though it may be I haue reſerued ſome iuells & trifles meete for women, but not for me (poore ſoule) to ſet out my ſelfe withall, but meaning to geue ſome pretie preſentes & gifts vnto Octauia and Liuia, that they making meanes & interceſſion for me to thee, thou mighteſt yet extend thy fauor and mercie vpon me? Cæſar was glad to heare her ſay ſo, perſwading him ſelfe thereby that ſhe had yet a deſire to ſaue her life. So he made her anſwere, that he did not only geue her that to diſpoſe of at her pleaſure, which ſhe had kept backe, but further promiſed to vſe her more honorably and bountifully then ſhe would thinke for: and ſo he tooke his leaue of her, ſuppoſing he had deceiued her, but in deede he was deceiued him ſelfe. There B was a young gentleman Cornelius Dolabella, that was one of Cæſars very great familiars, & beſides did beare no euil will vnto Cleopatra. He ſent her word ſecretly as ſhe had requeſted him, that Cæſar determined to take his iorney through SYRIA, & that within three dayes he would ſende her away before with her children. When this was tolde Cleopatra, ſhe requeſted Cæſar that it would pleaſe him to ſuffer her to offer the laſt oblations of the dead, vnto the ſoule of Antonius. This being graunted her, ſhe was caried to the place where his tombe was, & there falling downe on her knees, imbracing the tombe with her women, the teares running downe her cheekes, ſhe began to ſpeake in this ſorte: O my deare Lord Antonius, not long ſithence I buried thee here, being a free woman: and now I offer vnto thee the funerall ſprinklinges and oblations, being a captiue and priſoner, and yet I am forbidden and kept from tearing & mur- C dering this captiue body of mine with blowes, which they carefully gard and keepe, onely to triumphe of thee: looke therefore henceforth for no other honors, offeringes, nor ſacrifices from me, for theſe are the laſt which Cleopatra can geue thee, ſith nowe they carie her away. Whileſt we liued together, nothing could ſeuer our companies: but now at our death, I feare me they will make vs chaunge our contries. For as thou being a ROMANE, haſt bene buried in ÆGYPT: euen ſo wretched creature I, an ÆGYPTIAN, ſhall be buried in ITALIE, which ſhall be all the good that I haue receiued by thy contrie. If therefore the gods where thou art now haue any power and authoritie, ſith our gods here haue forſaken vs: ſuffer not thy true frend and louer to be caried away aliue, that in me, they triumphe of thee: but receiue me with thee, and let me be buried in one ſelfe tombe with thee. For though my griefes and miſeries be in- D finite, yet none hath grieued me more, nor that I could leſſe beare withall: then this ſmall time, which I haue bene driue to liue alone without thee. Then hauing ended theſe doleful plaints, and crowned the tombe with garlands and ſundry noſegayes, and maruelous louingly imbraced the ſame: ſhe commaunded they ſhould prepare her bath, and when ſhe had bathed and waſhed her ſelfe, ſhe fell to her meate, and was ſumptuouſly ſerued. Nowe whileſt ſhe was at dinner, there came a contrieman, and brought her a basket. The ſouldiers that warded at the gates, asked him ſtraight what he had in his basket. He opened the basket, and tooke out the leaues that couered the figges, and ſhewed them that they were figges he brought. They all of them maruelled to ſee ſo goodly figges. The contrieman laughed to heare them, and bad them take ſome if they would. They beleued he told them truely, and ſo bad him carie them E in. After Cleopatra had dined, ſhe ſent a certaine table written and ſealed vnto Cæſar, and commaunded them all to go out of the tombes where ſhe was, but the two women, then ſhe ſhut the dores to her. Cæſar when he receiued this table, and began to read her lamentation and petition, requeſting him that he would let her be buried with Antonius, founde ſtraight what ſhe ment, and thought to haue gone thither him ſelfe: howbeit he ſent one before in all haſt that might be, to ſee what it was. Her death was very ſodaine. For thoſe whom Cæſar ſent vnto her ran thither in all haſt poſſible, & found the ſouldiers ſtanding at the gate, miſtruſting nothing, nor vnderſtanding of her death. But when they had opened the dores, they founde Cleopatra ſtarke dead, layed vpon a bed of gold, attired and araied in her royall robes, and one of her two women, which was called Iras, dead at her feete: and her other woman called Charmion halfe F dead, and trembling, trimming the Diademe which Cleopatra ware vpon her head. One of the ſouldiers ſeeing her, angrily ſayd vnto her: is that well done Charmion? Verie well ſayd ſhe againe, and meete for a Princes diſcended from the race of ſo many noble kings. She ſayd no more, but fell downe dead hard by the bed. Some report that this Aſpicke was brought vnto her in the basket with figs, & that ſhe had cõmaunded them to hide it vnder the figge leaues, that when ſhe ſhoulde thinke to take out the figges, the Aſpicke ſhoulde bite her before ſhe ſhould ſee her: howbeit, that when ſhe would haue taken away the leaues for the figges, ſhe perceiued it, and ſaid, art thou here then? And ſo, her arme being naked, ſhe put it to the Aſpicke to be bitten. Other ſay againe, ſhe kept it in a boxe, and that ſhe did pricke and thruſt it with a ſpindell of golde, ſo that the Aſpicke being angerd withall, lept out with great furie, and bitte her in the arme. Howbeit fewe can tell the troth. For they report alſo, that ſhe had hidden poyſon in a hollow raſer which ſhe caried in the heare of her head: and yet was there no marke ſeene of her bodie, or any ſigne diſcerned that ſhe was poyſoned, neither alſo did they finde this ſerpent in her tombe. But it was reported onely, that there were ſeene certeine freſh ſteppes or trackes where it had gone, on the tombe ſide toward the ſea, and ſpecially by the dores ſide. Some ſay alſo, that they found two litle pretie bytings in her arme, ſcant to be diſcerned: the which it ſeemeth Cæſar him ſelfe gaue credit vnto, bicauſe in his triumphe he caried Cleopatraes image, with an Aſpicke byting of her arme. And thus goeth the report of her death. Now Cæſar, though he was maruelous ſorie for the death of Cleopatra, yet he wondred at her noble minde and corage, and therefore commaunded ſhe ſhould be nobly buried, and layed by Antonius: and willed alſo that her two women ſhoulde haue honorable buriall. Cleopatra dyed being eight and thirtie yeare olde, after ſhe had raigned two and twenty yeres, and gouerned aboue fourteene of them with Antonius. And for Antonius, ſome ſay that he liued three and fitie yeares: and others ſay, ſix and fiftie. All his ſtatues, images, and metralls, were plucked downe and ouerthrowen, ſauing thoſe of Cleopatra which ſtoode ſtill in their places, by meanes of Archibius one of her frendes, who gaue Cæſar a thowſande talentes that they ſhould not be handled, as thoſe of Antonius were. Antonius left ſeuen children by three wiues, of the which, Cæſar did put Antyllus, the eldeſt ſonne he had by Fuluia, to death. Octauia his wife tooke all the reſt, and brought them vp with hers, and maried Cleopatra, Antonius daughter, vnto king Iuba, a maruelous curteous & goodly Prince. And Antonius, the ſonne of Fuluia came to be ſo great, that next vnto Agrippa, who was in greateſt eſtimacion about Cæſar, and next vnto the children of Liuia, which were the ſecond in eſtimacion: he had the third place. Furthermore, Octauia hauing had two daughters by her firſt husband Marcellus, and a ſonne alſo called Marcellus: Cæſar maried his daughter vnto that Marcellus, and ſo did adopt him for his ſonne. And Octauia alſo maried one of her daughters vnto Agrippa. But when Marcellus was deade, after he had bene maried a while, Octauia perceiuing that her brother Cæſar was very buſie to chooſe ſome one among his frends, whom he truſted beſt to make his ſonne in law: ſhe perſwaded him, that Agrippa ſhould mary his daughter, (Marcellus widow) and leaue her owne daughter. Cæſar firſt was contented withall, and then Agrippa: and ſo ſhe afterwards tooke away her daughter and maried her vnto Antonius, and Agrippa maried Iulia, Cæſars daughter. Now there remained two daughters more of Octauia and Antonius. Domitius AEnobarbus maried the one: and the other, which was Antonia, ſo fayer and vertuous a young Ladie, was maried vnto Druſus the ſonne of Liuia, and ſonne in law of Cæſar. Of this marige, came Germanicus and Clodius: of the which, Clodius afterwards came to be Emperour. And of the ſonnes of Germanicus, the one whoſe name was Caius, came alſo to be Emperour: who, after he had licentiouſly raigned a time, was ſlaine, with his wife and daughter. Agrippina alſo, hauing a ſonne by her firſt husbande AEnobarbus called Lucius Domitius: was afterwardes maried vnto Clodius, who adopted her ſonne, and called him Nero Germanicus. This Nero was Emperour in our time, and ſlue his owne mother, and had almoſt deſtroyed the Empire of Rome, through his madnes and wicked life, being the fift Emperour of Rome after Antonius.

NOw, sithence it falleth out, that Demetrius and Antonius were one of them much like to the other, hauing fortune a like diuers and variable vnto them: let vs therefore come to consider their power and authoritie, and how they came to be so great. First of all, it is certaine that Demetrius power and greatnes fell vnto him by inheritance from his father Antigonus: who became the greatest and mightiest Prince of all the successors of Alexander, and had won the most parte of Asia, before Demetrius came of full age. Antonius in contrary maner, borne of an honest man, who otherwise was no man of warre, and had not left him any meane to arise to such greatnes: durst take vpon him to contend for the Empire with Cæsar, that had no right vnto it by inheritaunce, but yet made him selfe successor of the power, the which the other by great paine and trauell had obteyned, and by his owne industrie became so great, without the helpe of any other: that the Empire of the whole worlde being deuided into two partes, he had the one halfe, and tooke that of the greatest countenaunce and power. Antonius being absent, oftentimes ouercame the Parthians in battell by his Lieutenaunts, and chased away the barbarous people dwelling about mount Caucasus, vnto the sea Hyrcanium: insomuche as the thing they most reproue him for, did most witnes his greatnes. For, Demetrius father made him gladly marrie Phila, Antipaters daughter, although she was too old for him: because she was of a nobler house then him selfe. Antonius on thother side was blamed for marying of Cleopatra, a Queene that for power and nobilitie of blood, excelled all other kings in her time, but Arsaces: and moreouer made him selfe so great, that others thought him worthie of greater things, then he him selfe required. Now for the desire that moued the one and the other to conquer realmes: the desire of Demetrius was vnblameable & iust, desiring to raigne ouer people, which had bene gouerned at all times, & desired to be gouerned by kings. But Antonius desire was altogether wicked & tyrannicall: who sought to keepe the people of Rome in bondage and subiection, but lately before rid of Cæsars raigne and gouernment. For the greatest and most famous exployte Antonius euer did in warres (to wit, the warre in the which he ouerthrew Cassius and Brutus) was begon to no other ende, but to depriue his countriemen of their libertie and freedom. Demetrius in contrarie maner, before fortune had ouerthrowen him, neuer left to set Greece at libertie, and to driue the garrisons away, which kept the cities in bondage: and not like Antonius, that bosted he had slaine them that had set Rome at libertie. The chiefest thing they commended in Antonius, was his liberalitie and bountie: in the which Demetrius excelled him so farre, that he gaue more to his enemies, then Antonius did to his frends: although he was marueilously well thought of, for the honorable and sumptuous funerall he gaue vnto Brutus bodie. Howbeit Demetrius caused all his enemies be buried that were slaine in battel, and returned vnto Ptolomy all the prisoners he had taken, with great giftes and presentes he gaue them. They were both in their prosperitie, verie riotousllie and licentiouslie geuen: but yet no man can euer say, that Demetrius did at any time let slippe any oportunitie or occasion to followe great matters, but onelie gaue him selfe in deede to pleasure, when he had nothing else to doe. And further, to say truely, he tooke pleasure of Lamia, as a man woulde haue a delight to heare one tell tales, when he hath nothing else to doe, or is desirous to sleepe: but in deede when he was to make any preparation for warre, he had not then Iuey at his darts end, nor had his helmet perfumed, nor came not out of Ladies closets, picked and princt to go to battell: but he let all dauncing and sporting alone, and became as the Poet Euripides saith, Demetrius & Antonius vices.

The souldier of Mars, cruell, and bloodie.

But to conclude, he neuer had ouerthrowe or misfortune through negligence, nor by delaying time to followe his owne pleasure: as we see in painted tables, where Omphale secretlie stealeth away Hercules clubbe, and tooke his Lyons skinne from him. Euen so Cleopatra oftentimes vnarmed Antonius, and intised him to her, making him lose matters of great importaunce, and verie needefull iorneys, to come and be dandled with her, about the riuers of Canobus, and Taphosiris. In the ende, as Paris fledde from the battell, and went to hide him selfe in Helens armes: euen so did he in Cleopatraes armes, or to speake more properlie, Paris hidde him selfe in Helens closet, but Antonius to followe Cleopatra, fledde and lost the victorie. Furthermore, Demetrius had many wiues that he had maried, and all at one time: the which was not dissalowable or not forbidden by the kinges of Macedon, but had bene vsed from Philippe and Alexanders time, as also king Lysimachus and Ptolomy had, and did honor all them that he maried. But Antonius first of all maried two wiues together, the which neuer Romane durst doe before, but him selfe. Secondly, he put away his first Romane wife, which he had lawfully maried: for the loue of a straunge woman, he fondly fell in fancy withall, and contrarie to the lawes and ordinaunces of Rome. And therefore Demetrius mariages neuer hurt him, for any wrong he had done to his wiues: but Antonius contrarily was vndone by his wiues. Of all the lasciuious partes Antonius played, none were so abhominable, as this onely fact of Demetrius. For the historiographers write, that they would not suffer dogges to come into the castell of Athens, bicause of all beastes he is too busie with bitcherie: and Demetrius, in Mineruaes temple it selfe lay with Curtisans, and there defiled many citizens wiues. And besides all this, the horrible vice of crueltie, which a man would thinke were least mingled with these wanton delightes, is ioyned with Demetrius concupiscence: who suffered, (or more properly compelled) the goodliest young boy of Athens, to dye a most pitiefull death, to saue him selfe from violence, being taken. And to conclude, Antonius by his incontinencie, did no hurte but to him selfe: and Demetrius did hurte vnto all others. Demetrius neuer hurte any of his frendes: and Antonius suffered his Vncle by his mothers side to be slaine, that he might haue his will of Cicero to kill him: a thing so damnable, wicked, and cruell of it selfe, that he hardlie deserued to haue bene pardoned, though he had killed Cicero, to haue saued his Vncles life. Nowe where they falsefied and brake their othes, the one making Artabazus prisoner, and the other killing of Alexander: Antonius out of doubt had best cause, and iustest colour. For Artabazus had betrayed him, and forsaken him in Media. But Demetrius (as diuers doe reporte) deuised a false matter to accuse Alexander, to cloke the murther he had committed: and some thinke he did accuse him, to whom he him selfe had done iniurie vnto: and was not reuenged of him, that woulde doe him iniurie. Furthermore, Demetrius him selfe did many noble feates in warre, as we haue recited of him before: and contrarilie Antonius, when he was not there in person, wanne many famous and great victories by his Lieutenaunces: and they were both ouerthrowen being personallie in battell, but yet not both after one sorte. For the one was forsaken of his men being Macedonians, and the other contrarily forsooke his that were Romanes: for he fled, & left them that ventred their liues for his honor. So that the fault the one did was, that he made them his enemies that fought for him: and the fault in the other, that he so beastlie left them that loued him best, and were most faithfull to him. And for their deathes, a man can not praise the one nor

For he ſuffered him ſelfe to be taken priſoner, and when he was ſent away to be kept in a ſtraunge place, he had the hart to liue yet three yeare longer, to ſerue his mouth and bellie, as brute beaſtes doe. Antonius on the other ſide ſlue him ſelfe, (to confeſſe a troth) cowardly, and miſerably, to his great paine and griefe: and yet was it before his bodie came into his enemies hands.

Artaxerxes, the firſt of this name of all the kinges of PERSIA, a noble and curteous Prince as any of all his houſe: was ſurnamed long hand, bicauſe his right hand was longer then his left, and he was the ſonne of king Xerxes. But the ſeconde, whoſe life we preſentlie intend to wryte, was ſurnamed Mnemon, as muche to ſay, great memorie: and he was the ſonne of the daughter of the firſt Artaxerxes. For king Darius, and his wife Paryſatis, had foure ſonnes: of the which, the eldeſt was this Artaxerxes, the ſeconde Cyrus, and two other younger, Oſtanes and Oxathres. Cyrus from the beginning bare the name of the former auncient Cyrus, which in the PERSIAN tongue ſignifieth the ſunne. But Artaxerxes was called before Arſicas, although Dinon wryteth, that he was called Oarſes. Howebeit it is vnlikelie that Cteſias (although his bookes otherwiſe be full of fables, and as vntrue as they are founde) ſhould forget the name of the Prince with whom he dwelt, whom he ſerued, and continuallie followed, both him, his wife, and children. Cyrus from his cradell was of a hotte ſturring minde, and Artaxerxes in contrarie manner, more mylde and gentle in all his actions and doinges. He was maried to a verie fayer Ladie, by his father and mothers commaundement: & afterwards kept her againſt their wills, being forbidden by them. For king Darius his father, hauing put his ſonnes wiues brother to death, he woulde alſo haue put her to death: but her husband with teares made ſuche humble ſute to his mother for her, that with muche a doe, he did not onely gette pardon for her life, but graunt alſo that ſhe ſhoulde not be put from him. This notwithſtanding, his mother alwayes loued Cyrus better then him, and praied that he might be king after his fathers death. Wherfore Cyrus being in his prouinces of Asia by the sea side, when he was sent for to come to the Court, at what time his father lay sicke of the disease he dyed: he went thither in good hope his mother had preuailed with his father, that in his will he would make him his heire of the realme of Persia. For his mother Paryſatis alleaged a matter very probable, and the which in old time did helpe king Xerxes in the like case, through Demaratus counsell. She said that Arſicas was borne before her husband Darius was king, & Cyrus after he was crowned king. All this could not preuaile. For her eldest sonne Arſicas, surnamed Artaxerxes, was assigned king of Persia, & Cyrus gouernor of Lydia, and the kings Lieutenaunt generall of all the low contries of Asia toward the sea side. Shortly after king Darius death, the new king Artaxerxes went vnto Paſargades, there to be consecrated and annoynted king, by the Priestes of the contrie of Persia. The place of this Paſargades, is a temple dedicated vnto Minerua the goddesse of battells, as I take it: where the newe king must be consecrated, and when he commeth into the temple, he putteth of his gowne, and putteth on that which the old auncient Cyrus ware before he was king. Furthermore, he must eate of a certaine tart or fricacie made of figges with turpentine: and then he must drinke a drinke made with vineger and milke. There are also certeine other secret ceremonies which they must keepe, and none doe know, but the verie Priestes them selues. Now Artaxerxes being readie to enter into all these ceremonies, Tiſaphernes came vnto him, & brought him one of the Priestes that had bene Cyrus schoolemaister in his youth, and had taught him magicke: who by reason shoulde haue bene more offended then any man else, for that he was not appointed king. And this was the cause why they beleued him the better, when he accused Cyrus. For he sayd that Cyrus had conspired treason against the king his brothers owne person, & that he ment traiterously to kill him in the temple, when he should put of his gowne. Some doe reporte, that Cyrus was apprehended vpon this simple accusacion by word of mouth. Others write also, that Cyrus came into the temple, and hiding him selfe, he was taken with the maner, and bewraied by the Priest. So as he was going to suffer death, his mother tooke Cyrus in her armes, and wounde the heare of her heade about his necke, and tyed him straightly to her: and withall she wept so bitterly, and made suche pitiefull mone vnto the king her sonne, that through her intercession, the king graunted him his life, & sent him againe into his contrie and gouernment. But this satisfied not Cyrus, neither did he so muche remember the king his brothers fauor vnto him, in graunting him his life: as he did the despite he had offred him, to be made prisoner. Insomuch that for this grudge and euill will, he euer after had a greater desire then before to be king. Some wryters alleage, that he entred into actuall rebellion against his brother by force of armes, bicause he had not sufficient reuenue to defray the ordinary expence of his house: howbeit it is a meere folly to say so. For though he had had no other helpe but his mother, he might haue had of her what he would haue taken, and desired. Againe, to shew that of him selfe he had abilitie enough: we neede but alleage the souldiers and straungers he gaue pay vnto, in diuers places, as Xenophon wryteth. For he brought them not all together into one armie, bicause he desired to kepe his enterprise as secret as he could: but he had frendes and seruaunts that leauied them in diuers places, and vnder diuers colours. And furthermore, he had his mother alway about the king, that cleered all suspicions conceiued against him. He him selfe also on the other side, whilest he made these preparacions, wrote verie humbly vnto his brother, somtime asking somwhat of him, and an other time accusing Tiſaphernes: all to blinde the king, to make him thinke that he bent all his malice and spite against him, besides that the king of his owne nature was somwhat dull, and slow, which the common people thought to proceede of his curtesie and good nature. At his first comming to the crowne, he followed the first Artaxerxes goodnes and curtesie, by whom he had his name. For he gaue more easie audience vnto suters, he did also more honorably reward & recompence those that had deserued well: & he vsed such moderacion in punishng of offendors, that it appeared he did it not of any malicious minde and desire of reuenge, nor yet of will to hurte any man. When he had any thing geuen him, he tooke it as thankefully, as they offered it him, and did as willingly and frankely also geue againe. For, how litle a thing soeuer was offered him, he tooke it well. And it is reported that one Romiſes on a time presented him

A a maruelous fayer pomegarnet. By the ſunne ſayd he, this man in a ſhort time of a litle towne would make a great citie, he that would make him gouernor of it. Another time there was a poore laborer ſeing euery mã giue the king a preſent, ſome one thing, ſome another as he paſſed by them: he hauing nothing at hand to giue him, ranne to the riuers ſide, & tooke both his hands full of water, and came and offred it him. King Artaxerxes was ſo glad of it, that he ſent him in a cuppe of maſſy gold, a thowſand Darecks, which were peeces of gold ſo named, bicauſe the image of Darius was ſtamped vpon them. And vnto one Euclidas a LACEDÆMONIAN, that preſumed to giue him bold words, it pleaſed him to aunſwer him by one of his Captaines: thou mayſt ſay what thou lyſt, and I as king, may ſay and doe what I lyſt. Another time as he was a hunting, Tiribazus ſhewed the king his gowne that was all to tattered: well, ſayd

B the king, and what wouldeſt thou haue me to doe? Tiribazus aunſwered him, I praye your grace take another, and giue me that you haue on. The king did ſo, and told him: Tiribazus, I giue thee my gowne, but I commaund thee not to weare it. Tiribazus tooke it, and cared not for the kings commaundement that he ſhould not weare it, not that he was any euill diſpoſed man, but bicauſe he was a fond light headed fellowe that cared for nothing: thereuppon he ſtraight put the kings gowne on his backe, and not contented therewith, he did beſides ſet on many iewells of gold which kings onely are wont to weare, and womens trinckets and ornaments. Therewithal euery man in the Court murmured at him, bicauſe it was a preſumption, directly againſt the lawes and ordinaunces of PERSIA. Howbeit the king did but laugh at it, & tolde him: I giue thee leaue Tiribazus to weare thoſe womens gawdes as a woman, and the

C kings robe as a foole. Furthermore, where the manner was in PERSIA that no perſon ſate at the kings bord, but his mother and wife, of the which, his mother ſate vppermoſt, & his wife lowermoſt: Artaxarxes made his two brethren Oſtanes and Oxathres ſit at his owne bord. But yet he pleaſed the PERSIANS beſt of all, bicauſe he was content his wife Statyra ſhould ſit openly in her charret, and that ſhe might be ſeene and reuerenced by the other Ladyes of the contry. And this made him ſingularly beloued of the people. Now, ſuch as deſired innouation and chaunge, and that could not away with quiet life: they gaue out that the Realme of PERSIA required ſuch a Prince as Cyrus, that was liberall of nature, giuen to armes, & greatly rewarded his ſeruaunts, and that the greatnes of the Empire of PERSIA ſtoode in neede of a king, whoſe mind was bent to high attempts and noble enterpriſes. So Cyrus thereuppon be-D gan to make warre vpon his brother, not onely truſting vnto them that were of the lowe contries about him, but hoping of thoſe alſo in the high prouinces neare vnto the king. Furthermore he wrote alſo vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, to pray them to ſend him men of warre, promiſing to giue the footemen they ſent, horſes: and the horſemen, coches: landed men, whole villages: and to thoſe that had villages, to giue them cities. Beſides all this, that for the ordinary wages of them that ſhould ſerue him in this warre, he would not pay them by accompt, but by full meaſure: and boaſting largely of him ſelfe, he ſayd he had a greater mind then his brother, that he could better away with hardnes then he, that he vnderſtoode magick better then he, and that he could drinke more wine then he, and cary it better. And that the king his brother in contrary manner was ſo womaniſhe and fearefull, that when he went a hunting, he Cyrus wonderfull promiſes.

E durſt ſcarce get vp vpon his horſe backe: and when he went to the warres, he would hardly take his charriot. When the LACEDÆMONIANS had red his letters, they ſent a litle ſcrowle vnto Clearchus, commaunding him to obey Cyrus in any thing he would commaund him. So Cyrus did ſet forward to make warre againſt his brother, hauing leauied a great number of fighting men of barbarous nations, and of GRÆCIANS, litle leſſe then thirteene thowſand men: ſometime aduertiſing one cauſe, ſometime another, why he leauied ſuch a multitude of men. But his purpoſe could not be long diſſembled: for Tiſaphernes went him ſelfe vnto the Court, to bringe newes of his attempt. Then all the Court was ſtraight in an vprore withall. Many men alſo did accuſe the Queene mother, for the practiſe of this warre, & all her friends & ſeruaunts were vehemently ſuſpected to be conſpyrators with Cyrus: but the greateſt thing

F that troubled Paryſatis moſt, was Queene Statyra her Daughter in lawe, who ſtormed maruelouſly to ſee this warre begon againſt king Artaxerxes her husband, and inceſſantly cryed out on her: O, where is the faith thou vowedſt by othe? whereto are thy interceſſions come thou madeſt,for the pardon of his life: who now conſpyreth his brothers death? By ſauing of his life,art not thou now the cauſe of this warre and troubles we ſee at hand? After this reproch and ſhame receiued by Statira,Paryſatis,being a cruell and malicious woman of nature,ſo hated her, that from thenceforth ſhe ſought all the wayes ſhe could to put her to death. And Dinon the Hiſtoriographer ſayth,that during this warre,ſhe did execute her wicked purpoſe vpon her: but Cteſias writeth,that it was after the warre. And therfore it is liker, that he being daily in the king of PERSIAES Court,ſhould certainely knowe the tyme when ſhe did execute her treaſon againſt her, and alſo there is no cauſe why he ſhould rather write it in any other time, then in that in the which the facte was done: although in many other places he commonly vſeth to fitten,and to write deuiſes of his owne head. Therefore let vs leaue the report of this fact to the ſelfe ſame time and place as he hath written it. Now when Cyrus drew neare vnto his brothers contry, he had newes, and a rumor ranne through his campe,that the king was not determined to come and fight with him ſo ſoone: and that he ment firſt to goe further into PERSIA,and to tary there til he had gathered his army together out of all parts. And for proofe hereof,the king hauing caſt a great trenche of ten yardes broad,and as many high, the ſpace of foure hundred furlong in length: he left it without gard, and let Cyrus winne it, who came on further without any reſiſtaunce,euen to the very citie ſelfe of BABYLON. Howbeit in the ende,Tiribazus (as it is reported) was the firſt man that durſt tell the king, that he ſhould not flie fight in that ſort, nor hide him ſelfe in the furdeſt part of PERSIA, leauing his enemy the Realmes of MEDIA,BABYLON,and SVSA: conſidering alſo that he had many moe ſouldiers in readines then his enemye, and an infinite number of Captaines more skilfull,and abler to giue counſell,and to fight,then he was. Theſe words of Tiribazus made the king alter his mind,and to determine to giue battell as ſoone as he could. Thereuppon he marched forward againſt his enemie,with nyne hundred thowſand fighting men,excellently well armed, and marching in very good order. That maruelouſly aſtonied Cyrus men, and made them affrayd at the firſt, when they ſaw them in ſo excellent good order before them: for that they were diſperſed ſtragling here and there without any order, and men vnarmed, truſting too much in them ſelues,in deſpiſing of their enemie: ſo that Cyrus had much a doe to ſet his men in battell raye,and yet was it with great noyſe and tumult. But the GRÆCIANS wondred moſt of all other, when they ſawe the kinges armye marche in ſo good order of battell without any noyſe. For they thought to haue ſeene a wonderfull great diſorder and confuſion, in ſuch an infinite multitude of people: and ſuppoſed they would haue made ſuch a noyſe, that one of them ſhould not haue heard another. Where in deede to the contrary, all was ſo well marſhalled, ſpecially bicauſe he had placed before his battell the beſt carts he had armed with ſiethes,and drawen with the ſtrongeſt and biggeſt great horſe he had in all his armie: hoping by the fiercenes and furye of their careere,to breake into the ranckes of the enemies, before they could come to ioyne with theirs. But ſith this battell is deſcribed by diuers Hiſtoriographers,but ſpecially by Xenophon,who hath (as a man would ſay) liuely ſet it out to the eye, & ſetteth it forth to the Reader,not as a battell already fought, but preſently a fighting, ſtirring vp their mindes as if them ſelues were in the action and inſtant daunger, he hath ſo paſſingly ſet it downe: it were but a folly therefore of me to take vppon me to make any further deſcription of it,ſauing to touch ſome ſpeciall poynts worthy of note,which he peraduenture hath left out. As,the place where the battell was fought,is called COVNAXA,fiue hundred furlongs from BABYLON: and how that before the battell, Clearchus gaue Cyrus counſell to keepe behind the ſquadron of the GRÆCIANS; and not to hazard his perſon among the firſt: and that Cyrus aunſwered him, what ſayeſt thou Clearchus? wouldeſt thou haue me that ſtriues to be king,to ſhew my ſelfe vnworthy to be a king? But Cyrus hauing made this fault, not ſtanding vpon his ſafetie and garde,but ouer raſhely thruſting him ſelfe into great daunger: Clearchus ſelfe alſo committed as great a fault (if it were not worſe) when he would not ſet his men in order directly againſt the battel of the enemies,where the kings perſon ſtoode, but went and pent them vp by the riuers ſide, being affrayd leaſt they ſhould haue bene compaſſed in behind. For if he would haue looked ſo ſtraightly to him ſelfe, and haue prouided euery way for his ſafetie,that no man might come to hurt him: he ſhould haue kept him ſelfe at home, and Artaxerxes army,of nyne hundred thowſand fighting men,againſt his brother Cyrus.

A not haue ſtirred one foote out of the dores. But ſith he had comen ſo farre, as from the low contries of Asia, vnto the place where the field was fought, and vncompelled, onely to put Cyrus in his fathers ſoate & imperiall crowne, to goe chooſe a place in the battell, not where he might doe his Lord beſt ſeruice that had hyered him, but rather where he might fight more at his eaſe, and at leſſe daunger: it was euen as much, as if through cowardlines his wits had bene taken from him when he ſhould haue fought, or that through treaſon he had forſaken his enterpriſe. For, to proue that the trowpes which were about the kinges perſon, had neuer bene able to haue receiued the charge of the Græcians, and that thoſe being ouerthrowen, the king had bene ſlayne in the field, or els forced to flie, and that Cyrus had wonne the field, and by this victorie had bene king: the ſucceſſe of this battell doth plainely B ſhewe it. And therefore Clearchus ouer curious reſpect, deſerued more blame for the loſſe of this battell: then Cyrus ouerhardines. For if king Artaxerxes would haue choſen or wiſhed a place where the Græcians might haue done him leſſe hurt: he could not haue deuiſed a fitter place that was ſo farre from him, and from whence the Græcians could neither ſee nor heare what was done where he was, as it fell out in ſequell. For Cyrus was ſlayne before he could preuaile by Clearchus victorie, he was ſo farre from him: and furthermore, Cyrus therein knew before what was meeteſt to be done. For he commaunded Clearchus to place him ſelfe with his company in the middeſt of the battell: who aunſwered him, he ſhould take no thought for nothing, for he would ſee all things well ordered. And when he had ſayd ſo, he marred all afterwardes: For where the Græcians were, they ouerthrewe the barbarous C people that made head againſt them, & had thē in chaſe while they were weary of following of them. Cyrus being mownted vpon a whot ſtirring horſe, that had a hard head, and was very fierce and dogged, called Paſacas, as Cteſias writeth: Artagerſes, the gouernor of the prouince of the Cadvsians, ſpyed him a farre of, and when he had found him, clapped ſpurres to his horſe, and came with full cariere vnto him, and cryed out: O traytor, and moſt vnfaithfull and deſperate man, thou now diſhonoreſt the name of Cyrus (which is the goodlieſt and moſt honorableſt name of all the Persians) for that thou haſt brought ſo valliant Græcians hether to ſo wicked an enterpriſe, to ſpoyle the Persians goods, in hope to deſtroy thy ſoueraine Lord and onely brother, who hath an infinite number of ſlaues and ſeruaunts farre honeſter men then thou wilt be while thou lieueſt, and that thou ſhalt preſently knowe by D proofe, for thou ſhalt dye before thou ſee the king thy brothers face: and therewithall he threw his dart at him with all the force he had. But Cyrus armor was ſo good, that it pearſed him not: yet the blowe came with ſuch good will, that it made him ſtagger on his horſe back. When Artagerſes had giuen him that blowe, he preſently turned his horſe. But Cyrus therewithall threw a dart at him ſo happily, that he ſlue him right in the place aboue the bone that ioyneth the two ſhoulders together: ſo that the head of his dart, ranne quite through his necke. Nowe, that Cyrus ſlue Artagerſes with his owne hands in the field, all the Hiſtoriographers doe agree vpon it: but for the death of Cyrus, bicauſe Xenophon toucheth it but a litle by the way, for that he was not preſent in the very place where he was ſlayne: it ſhal not be hurtfull particularly to ſet downe the manner thereof, both according to the report of Dinon, and E alſo of Cteſias. Firſt, Dinon writeth, that after Cyrus had ſlayne Artagerſes, he went with great fury, and flue in amongeſt the trowpe of them which were neareſt vnto the kings perſon, and that he came ſo neare the king, that he ſlue his horſe ſtarke dead vnder him, and the king fell to the ground withall. But Tiribazus that was hard by him, ſtraight mownted the king againe vpon an other horſe, and ſayd vnto him: your grace will remember this battell another day, for it is not to be forgotten. And Cyrus clapping ſpurres againe to his horſe, threwe an other dart at Artaxerxes, and hit him. But at the third charge, the king tolde them that were about him, he could not abide this, and that he had rather dye then ſuffer it: ſo therewithall he ſpurring his horſe to charge Cyrus, (who came fiercely and deſperatly, hauing an infinite number of blowes with darts throwen at him on euery ſide) threw his dart at him alſo. So did all thoſe F that were about his perſon: and ſo was Cyrus ſlayne in this conflict. Some ſaye, that he was ſlayne with the wounde the kinge his brother gaue him. Others ſaye, that it was a man at armes of the contry of Caria, vnto whom the king for reward of his good ſeruice, gaue him

Dinons report of Cyrus death

The Carians be called cocks, bicause they weare creſts on their headpeeces.

the honor in all battels to cary before the firſt ranke, a cocke of gold on the toppe of a ſpeare: for the PERSIANS doe cal the CARIANS cocks, bicauſe in the warres they vſe to weare creaſts in the toppe of their headpeeces. And this is Dinons reporte. But Cteſias, to cowche in fewe words that which Dinon reporteth at large, ſayth: that Cyrus after he had ſlaine Artagerſes, he gallopped on the ſpurre againſt the king him ſelfe, and the king againſt him, and not a worde betwene them both. Arieus, one of Cyrus flatterers, threwe the firſt dart at the king, but killed him not: and the king with all his force againe threwe his dart, thinking to haue hit Cyrus, but he miſſed him, and ſlue Tiſaphernes, one of the vallianteſt and ſtowteſt men Cyrus had about him, and ſo fell downe dead. Then Cyrus hit Artaxerxes ſo ſore a blowe on his breaſt, that he pearced his armor, and entred into his fleſh two fingers deepe. The king with this blowe fell downe to the ground: wherewithall the moſt part of his men about him were ſo affrayd, that they forſooke him, and fled. Howbeit he got vp againe, with the helpe of others that were about him, amongeſt whome Cteſias ſayd he was one: and ſo recouered a litle hill not farre of, to take a litle breath. In the meane time, Cyrus horſe that was whotte in the mouth, and hard headed as we haue told you: caried his maſter ſpyte of his hart farre from his men, amonge his enemies, and no man knew him, bicauſe it was night, and his men were very buſie in ſeeking for him. But Cyrus hoping he had wonne the victory, being of a whot ſtirring nature, and valliant: he went vppe and downe in the thickeſt of his enemies, crying out in the PERSIAN tongue, ſaue your ſelues poore men, ſaue your ſelues. When they heard him ſay ſo, ſome made a lane for him to paſſe by them, and did him reuerence: But by euill fortune his Tiara (which is the highe royall hat after the PERSIAN manner) fell of of his head. Then a younge PERSIAN called Mithridates, paſſing by him, hit him a blowe with his dart vpon one of his temples, hard by his eye, not knowing what he was. His wound ſtraight fell of a marueious bleeding. Whereuppon, Cyrus ſtaggering at it, fell to the ground in a ſwownd, and his horſe ranne away from him: but the cappariſon he had vppon him fell to the ground all bloudied, and his page that had hurt him, tooke it vp. Shortly after, Cyrus being comen to him ſelfe againe, ſome of his Euenukes (which were men gelt, and groomes of his chamber) that were about him, did lift him vp, thinking to ſet him vpon another horſe, and to get him out of the preaſe: but he was not able to ſit on his horſe. Thereuppon he proued if he could better goe a foote, & the Euenuks held him vp by the armes, & led him amaſed as he was, not able to ſtād on his feete, although he thought he had won the battell: bicauſe he heard his enemies flying about him cry, the gods ſaue king Cyrus, and they prayed him to pardon them, and to receiue them to mercy. But in the meane time, there came certaine poore men of the citie of CAVNVS, who followed the kings campe, getting their liuing as drudges and ſlaues, to doe moſt vile ſeruice. They ioined with the trowpe where Cyrus was, ſuppoſing they had bene the kings men: but when they perceiued in the ende by the red coates they ware vpon their armors, that they were enemies, for that the kings men ware white coates: there was one among the reſt that valliantly ſtrake at Cyrus behind with his pertiſan, not knowing in deede that it was Cyrus. The blowe lighted full on the hamme of his legge and cut his ſinewes ſo, that Cyrus fell withall, and falling, by misfortune fell vpon a great ſtone with his browe, where he had bene hurt before, that he died forthwith. Thus doth Cteſias report it, where me thinketh he cutteth his throate with a dull edged knife, he hath ſuch a doe to bring Cyrus to his ende. Now after Cyrus was dead, Artaſyras, one of king Artaxerxes Euenukes, whome they called the kings eye in the Court: paſſing by a horſebacke, knewe Cyrus Euenukes that mourned very pitifully, lamenting the death of their maſter. So he asked the Euenuke whome Cyrus loued beſt: who is that that is dead, O Pariſcas, that thou weepeſt ſo bitterly? Pariſcas aunſwered him againe, ſeeſt thou not Artaſyras, that it is Cyrus but newly dead? Artaſyras wondred much when he ſawe him. So he comforted the Euenuke, and willed him in no caſe to goe from the body: and in the meane time he gallopped a pace to the king, who thought he had loſt all, and was very ill beſides, both for the great thirſt he ſuffred, as alſo for his wound he had on his breaſt. Nowe when the Euenuke came vnto the king, & told him with a ſmyling countenaunce the newes, how he had ſeene Cyrus dead: The king was ſo ioyfull at the newes, that he was deſirous him ſelfe forthwith to goe vnto the place where he lay to ſee him, and commaunded Artaſyras to bringe

A bring him thither. But after he had considered better of it, he was counselled not to goe thither him selfe for feare of the GRÆCIANS, who they sayd wonne all, and were yet chasing & killing them in the field, that fled: But rather than he should send a good company of men thither, to bring him iust report, whether the newes were true of his death or not. Vpon this aduise he stayed, and sent thither thirtye men, euery man with torches in their handes. In the meane tyme, one of his Euenukes called Satibarzanes, ranne vp and downe to see if he could get any water for the king, that was almost dead for thirst: for there was no water neere vnto him where he was, and besides, his campe was farre from him. His Euenuke hauing run vp and downe a great way to seeke it, mette by chaunce with these poore slaues and pesants the CAYNIANS, amonge the which one of them caried in an olde ragged goates skinne, about eight glasfefulles of naughty stincking water. So he presently caried the same to the king, who

B dranke it vp euery whit. When the king had dronke it, the Euenuke asked him, if that muddy water did him no hurt. The king sware by the goddes vnto him, that he neuer dranke better wine, nor sweeter water then that was, nor that pleased him better then that did: therefore, sayde he, I beseeche the goddes if it be not my happe to finde him that gaue me this water to reward him, yet that it will please them to send him good fortune. As the king was talking thus with his Euenuke, the thirty men with their torches returned vnto him, and altogether with ioyfull countenaunce, confirmed the good newes he looked not for. For there were comen together againe a great number of souldiers about him, and still came more one after another, that he beganne againe to be coragious. Then he came downe into the

C playne, with a world of lights and torches about him, and went straight vnto the place where his brother Cyrus body lay. There, following the auncient manner of the PARSIANS against their enemies, he caused his head and right hand to be striken of, and then made him selfe to be brought vnto him, the which he tooke by the heares of his head (for Cyrus wore them long and thicke) and did him selfe shew it vnto them that fled still, and were afraid, to encourage them againe. They wondering to see it, did him humble reuerence, and so gathered by companies about the king, that in a smal time there were gathered together about him, three score and tenne thousand fighting men, with the which he tooke his way againe towards the campe. In deede Ctesias sayth, that he had but foure hundred thousand fighting men in all: but Dinon and Xenophon say more. And for the number of them that were slayne, Ctesias sayth, that

D word was brought to the king, that there were nine aboue nyne thousand slaine, howbeit that to sight they seemed to be no lesse then twenty thousand. But for that point, he might be talked withall, in either of both. But furthermore, where he sayth that the king did send him with Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN vnto the GRÆCIANS, and others with him: that is a flat lye. For Xenophon knew right well, that this Ctesias wayted vpon the king, bicause he speaketh of him in diuers places of his historie: and if he had bene appointed by the king to carry report vnto the GRÆCIANS of so waighty a matter, it is like enough Xenophon would not haue concealed it, when he nameth Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN. But Ctesias (as it appeareth by his writings) was a very ambitious man, and partiall vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, but specially vnto Clearchus, so

E is glad when he can get any occasion to speake of him selfe for his glory, of LACEDÆMONIANS & of Clearchus. Now after this battell, king Artaxerxes sent goodly riche gifts vnto Artagerses sonne, whose father Cyrus had slayne with his owne hands, and as it is reported, did also greatly honor Ctesias and many others: and did not forget also to cause the poore CAYNIAN slaue to be sought out, that had giuen him the water to be caried to him which saued his life, and when he had found him out, of a poore wretch vnknowen before, he made him a riche and

F great man. He seuerely punished those also that had offended the martial law, as amongst others, Arbaces, one of the MEDES: who when the battell was ioyned, he fled first on Cyrus side, and then when he vnderstoode he was slayne, he returned againe to the kings side. For supposing that it was rather timerousnes and cowardly nature, then for treason or euil will he had done, he compelled him to carye a whore on his backe starke naked, all daye long about the market place. And to another, who besides he had yeelded him selfe to his enemies, falsely boasted that he had slayne two: he made his conduct to be bored thorough in three seuerall places with a cordiners alle. Now the king being of opinion that it was him selfe that had slayne his brother Cyrus with his owne hand, and being desirous that euery man should so thinke & say: he sent presents vnto Mithridates, that had hurt him first in the forehead, and commaunded him that caried the giftes vnto him, to tell him from the king: the king doth send thee these presents, bicause thou finding first the cappariſon of Cyrus horse, diddest bring it vnto the king. The CARIAN also that had cut the hamme of his legge wherewith Cyrus fell downe, asked his gift likewise: the which the king gaue him, and bad the Messenger tell him, the king doth giue thee this, bicause thou wast the second person that broughtest him the good newes. For Artagyras was the first, and thou the second, that brought him newes of the death of Cyrus. Now Mithridates, albeit he was not well pleased in his mind with those wordes, he went his way, and sayd nothing then, nor made any thing a doe: but the vnfortunate CARIAN fondely fell into a foolish vaine, common vnto men. For, the sodeine ioy he felt (as it seemeth) to see such a goodly riche present before him, as the king sent him: made him so forget him selfe, that he began to aspyre, and to pretend greater things, then became his state and calling. And therefore he would not take the kings gifte, as in respecte that he had brought him worde of Cyrus death: but began to storme, and to rage, calling the gods to witnesse, that it was he onely, and none other, that slue Cyrus, and that they did him great wronge, to take this honor from him. The king beeing told of it, tooke it so angrily: that he presently commaunded them to strike of his head. But Paryſatis (the Queene mother) beeing present when the king gaue this commaundement, she prayed him not to put him to death in that sort: for the Villain, sayd she, let me alone, I will chastise him well enough for his presumption and rashe speeche. The king was contented she should haue him. Thereuppon she sent the Sergeaunts to take this cursed CARIAN, and made him be hanged vpon a gybbet ten dayes together, and at the tenne dayes end, caused his eyes to be pulled out of his head, and last of all, poored molten mettell into his eares, and so killed the Villaine with this kinde of torment. Mithridates also shortly after, died miserably, by like follye. He was bidden to supper at a feast, whether came also the king and Queene mothers Euenukes: and when they came, Mithridates sate downe at the bord in the kings golden gowne he gaue him. When they had supped, and that they beganne to drinke one to another, one of Paryſatis Euenukes sayd vnto Mithridates: the king hath in deede giuen thee a goodly gowne Mithridates, and goodly chaynes and carcanets of gold, and so is the sword very riche and good he gaue thee, so that when thou hast that by thy side, there is no man I warrant thee but will thinke thee a happy man. Mithridates then, the wine fuming into his brayne, aunswered straight: what meanest thou by that, Sparamixes? I deserued a better then this, when the battell was fought. Then Sparamixes langhing on him, aunswered, I do not speak it for any hurt or euil wil I beare thee, Mithridates: but to speake franckly among out selues, bicause the GRÆCIANS haue a common prouerbe, that wine telleth true, I pray thee tell me, what valliant acte was it to take vp a cappariſon of a horse that fell on the ground, and to cary it to the king? which the Euenuke spitefully put forth vnto him, not that he was ignorant who did it, but to prouoke him to speake, and to put him in a rage, knowing that he was a hasty man of nature, & could not kepe his tongue, & least of all when he had droncke so wel as he had done, and so it fell out in deede. For Mithridates could not byte it in, but replyed straight: you may talke as long as you lyst of the cappariſon of a horse, & such trash, but I tell you plainly, that Cyrus was slayne with myne owne hands, and with no mans els. For I hit him not in vaine as Artagerses did, but full in the forehead hard by his eye, and strake him through and through his head againe, and so ouerthrewe him, of which blow he dyed. He had no sooner spoken those words, but the rest that were at the bord, cast down their eyes, foreseeing the death of this pore & vnfortunat Mithridates. But then the master of the feast began to speake, and sayd vnto him: friend Mithridates, I pray thee let vs drincke and be mery, and reuerence and thanke the good fortune of our king, and for the rest, let this talke goe, it is too highe for vs. When the Euenuke went from thence, he tolde Paryſatis the Queene mother what Mithridates had sayd before them all: and she went and told the king of it. Who was maruelously offended withall to be so belyed, and to lose the thing that was most honorable, and best pleased him in his victorie. For it was his mind, that all the world (both GRÆCIANS and barbarous people) should certainly beleue, that in the battell betwixt him and his brother he was hurt

A hurt, but yet that he ſlue Cyrus with his owne hand. So the king cõmaunded that Mithridates ſhould ſuffer the paines of death in botes, the which is after this maner. They take two botes made of purpoſe ſo euen, that the one is nether broder nor longer then the other, & then lay the offender in one of thẽ vpon his back, & ſo couer him with the other, & do ſow both botes togither: So that the parties feete, hands, & head do come out at holes made of purpoſe for him, the reſt of his bodye is all hidden within. Now they giue him meate as much as he will eate, & if he wil not eate, they force him to it, by thruſting alles in his eies: then when he hath eaten, they giue him hony to drinke mingled with milke, & they do not only powre it into his mouth, but alſo all his face ouer, turning him ful into the ſunne, ſo that his face is all couered ouer with flies: & furthermore, being driuen to do his needes in that troughe, of his excre-B ments there ingender wormes that eate his body euen to the very priuities. Then, when they ſee the man is dead, they take of the vppermoſt boate, & find all his fleſh deuowred with vermine ingendring of him, euen to his very intrals. So, when Mithridates had miſerably languiſhed in this manner, ſeuenteene daies together: at length he died in extreme torments. Now Paryſatis (the Queene mother) lacked no more to accompliſh her wicked deſire, but Meſabates, one of the kings Euenukes that had cut of Cyrus head and hand: & ſeing that he was very ware & circũſpect in his behauior, that ſhe could not take him at any aduauntage: in the end ſhe deuiſed a fine way to intrap him. She had a maruelous wit, & amonge other things could play paſſingly wel at all games at dyce, & did many times play with the king her ſonne before the warres: & after the warres alſo, when he had made peace, ſhe did play at dyce with him as C ſhe had done before, inſomuch as ſhe knew all his ſecret loue, and furthered him to enioy it. To be ſhort, ſhe would neuer be out of his ſight but as litle as ſhe could, & would let his wife Statira haue as litle time with him as might be, that ſhe might gouerne and rule him as ſhe would: both bicauſe ſhe hated her of all creatures liuing, and alſo for that ſhe would beare the greateſt ſway and credit about him. When ſhe ſaw the king one day at leyſure, not knowing how to paſſe the time away: ſhe inticed him to play a thowſand Darecks at dyce, and was contented to loſe them willingly, and paied the thowſand Darecks downe, ſeeming notwithſtanding to be angry with her loſſe. So ſhe prayed him alſo to play one of his Euenukes with her: & the king was well contented with it. But before they would play, they agreed betwene thẽ that they ſhould both name & except fiue of the truſtieſt & chiefeſt Euenukes they had:
D & then, which of them loſt, ſhould preſently deliuer vnto the winner his choyce of all the other Euenukes he would demaund. Thus they fel to play, & ſhe imploying all the cunning ſhe had, & playing as warely as ſhe could poſſible, beſides that the dyce ranne of her ſide, her luck ſerued her ſo, that ſhe wanne: & then ſhe required Meſabates for her winnings, being none of thoſe the king had excepted. Whẽ ſhe had him deliuered her, ſhe gaue him to the hangmen, & willed thẽ to flea him aliue, & then that they ſhould crucifie him, & naile him to a croſſe, & hang his skin vpon an other peece of tymber by him: the which was done accordingly. The king was maruelous angry withall when he knew it, & greeuouſly offended with his mother. Howbeit ſhe ſported it out, & laughing, told him: in deed it becomes thee wel to be angry for E loſing an old gelded Villain, where I loſt a thowſand Darecks quietly, & ſaid neuer a word. So there came no other thing of it, ſauing that the king was a litle angry, & repented him that he had plaied ſo fondly & was ſo finely mocked. But Queene Statira on the other ſide, beſids that ſhe was againſt her in al other things: ſhe ſpared not to tel Queene mother plainly, that it was wickedly done of her, to put the kings good & faithful ſeruaunts ſo cruelly to death, for Cyrus ſake. But now, after that Tiſaphernes (king Artaxerxes Lieuetenant) had deceiued Clearchus, & other captaines of Græce, deteſtably falſifying his word he had giuen thẽ, & that he had ſent them bound vnto the king: Cteſias ſayth, that Clearchus praied him to helpe him to a combe, & that hauing had one by his meanes, and alſo comed his head, it pleaſed him ſo wel, that to requite his good wil, he gaue him his ſeale of armes from his finger wherewith he ſealed his letters, for a witnes of the great friendſhip that was betwene them two. He ſayth alſo that in the F ſtone of this ring there was grauen the daunce of the Caryatides. And furthermore, that the other ſouldiers which were priſoners with Clearchus, did take away the moſte part of the vittells that were ſent to him, and left him litle or nothing: and that he did remedye all this, procuring a greater quantitie to be ſent vnto them, & that they ſhould put Clearchus portion apart, and all the other ſouldiers part alſo by them ſelues. This he did, as he ſayth, by Paryſatis conſent & commaundement, who knowing that amongeſt other vittells they dayly ſent Clearchus a gammon of bacon: ſhe tolde him one day he ſhould doe well to hide a litle knife in this gammon of bacon, and to ſend it him, to thend that the life of ſo noble & valliant a man as he was, ſhould not fall to the crueltie of the king. Howbeit, that he was affrayd to meddle withall, and durſt not doe it: & that the king ſware, & promiſed his mother, (who was an earneſt ſuter to him for Clearchus) that he would not put him to death. This notwithſtanding, the king being afterwards procured, and perſwaded to the contrary, by Queene Statira his wife: he put them all to death, but Menon. Therefore Paryſatis, Queene mother, after that time (ſayth Cteſias) deuiſed all the wayes ſhe could to poyſon Queene Statira, and to make her out of the way. But me thinketh this ſmelleth like a lye, that Paryſatis ſhould entend ſo wicked and daungerous an acte, as to put the kinges lawfull wife to death, by whome he had ſonnes that were to inherite the crowne, onely for the loue and reſpect of Clearchus: and it is too plaine that he coyned that, to honor and magnifie Clearchus memorie the more. But to proue it, a man may eaſily find it by the lyes he addeth afterwards vnto it: ſaying, that after the Captaines were ſlayne, all the bodies of the reſt were torne a peeces by dogges & fowles: and alſo that there came a boyſterous winde, and couered all Clearchus body with a great hill of duſt, and that out of this hill of duſt ſhortly after there ſpronge vp many palme trees, which made a prety thicke groue, that it ſhadowed all that place. Inſomuch that the king him ſelfe did afterwards maruelouſly repent him for putting of him to death, for that he was an honeſt man, & beloued of the gods. This was not for Clearchus ſake, but for an olde canckered malice Paryſatis had long time borne in her hart againſt Queene Statira: bicauſe ſhe ſaw wel enough, that the credit & authoritie her ſelf had with the king, was in reſpect of a ſonnes duty & obediēce to his mother, & in contrary maner, Statiraes credit & authoritie had a better ground & foūdaciō, bicauſe it came of the loue & good wil the king did beare her. And this is the onely cauſe that made her to practiſe the death of Quene Statira, hauing determined that her ſelf, or daughter in law, muſt nedes dye. Now Quene mother had one of the women of her chamber called Gigis, that was of great credit about her, & whome ſhe onely truſted. Dinon writeth, that this Gigis did help Paryſatis to make the poyſon. But Cteſias writeth contrarily, & ſaith that ſhe onely knew it, but otherwiſe that it was againſt her will: & that he that made the poyſon, was one Belitaras, but Dinon calleth him Melantas. Now, though in outward ſemblance and ſhew Queene mother & Statira ſemed to haue forgottē all malice betwene them, & that they begā again one of them to keepe company with the other, & did eate & drinke together: yet one of them miſtruſted the other, & tooke great heede to them ſelues, both of them eating one ſelfe meate, & in one diſhe together, and were both ſerued with one ſelf officers & men. In PERSIA there is a litle bird, of the which all the parts of it is excellent good to eate, & is ful of fat within: ſo that it is thought it liueth by ayer & dewe, and in the PERSIAN tongue they cal it Ryntaces. Paryſatis, as Cteſias ſayth, tooke one of theſe birdes, and cut it in the middeſt with a litle knife, the which was poyſoned onely on one of the ſides, and gaue that halfe which was poyſoned vnto Statira. Yet Dinon writeth, that it was not Paryſatis her ſelfe that gaue it her, but her caruer Melantas that carued her meate, & ſtill gaue Queene Statyra of that meate which the ſide of his poiſoned knife had touched. So Quene Statira preſētly fel ſick of the diſſeaſe wherof ſhe died, with greuous panges & gripings in her bowels, & found plainly that ſhe was poyſoned by Paryſatis meanes: wheruppō ſhe told the king as much, who was of the ſame opinion, & thought it was his mother, bicauſe he knew her cruel reuēging mind, that neuer pardoned any, againſt whō ſhe conceiued any grudge. The king therefore to know the troth, when his wife Statira was dead, apprehended all his mothers houſhold ſeruaunts & officers, & did put them to torments, to make them confeſſe the troth, ſauing Gigis, whome Queene mother kept cloſe in her chamber a long time, & would neuer ſuffer the king to haue her: who earneſtly requeſted her to deliuer her vnto him. Notwithſtanding, Gigis her ſelfe at length prayed Quene mother to giue her leaue one night to go home to her houſe. The king vnderſtanding it, layed waite for her, and intercepted her by the way: and when ſhe was taken, he condemned

A ned her to suffer the paynes of death ordeyned for poysoners, the which in PERSIA is executed in this manner. They make them put their head vpon a great plaine stone, and with an other stone they presse and strike it so long, till they haue dashed the braynes of the malefactor out of their head. After this sort was Gigis put to death. Now for Parysatis his mother, the king did her no other hurt, nor sayd no more vnto her, but confined her vnto BABYLON according to her desire, & sware, that whilest she liued, he would neuer see BABYLON. In this state stoode the affaires of the king. But now, Artaxerxes hauing done the vtmost he could to haue ouercomen the GRÆCIANS which came to make warre with him in the hart of his Realme, and would haue bene as glad of that, as he was to haue ouercome Cyrus, & to keepe his crowne & Realme: he could neuer preuaile against them. For though they had lost Cyrus that gaue them

B entertainment, & all their priuate Captaines that led them: they saued them selues notwithstanding, being in the hart of his Realme, and shewed the PERSIANS by experience, that all their doings was nothing but gold & siluer, curiositie, & fayer women, & otherwise, nothing but pompe & vanity. Hereuppon al the GRÆCIANS became couragious, & despised the barbarous people: insomuch that the LACEDÆMONIANS thought it a great shame & dishonor vnto them, if they did not deliuer the GRÆCIANS that dwelt in ASIA, from the slauery & bōdage of the PERSIANS, & kept them from the open violence & cruelty of the barbarous people. For they hauing at other times attempted to doe it by their Captaine Thimbron, & afterwards also by Dercyllidas, whom they sent thither with an army, & hauing done nothing worthy memory: at lēgth they determined to send their king Agesilaus thither in person, who pas-

C sing through ASIA with his shipps, began presently to make hot warre against the PERSIANS as soone as euer he had landed his army. For, at the first cōflict he ouerthrew Tisaphernes (the king of PERSIAES Lieuetenant) in battel, and made the most part of the cities of GRÆCE that are in ASIA, to rebel against him. Artaxerxes loking into this warre, & wisely cōsidering what way & meanes he was to take, to make warre with the GRÆCIANS: he sent into GRÆCE one Hermocrates a RHODIAN, (of great credit about him) with a maruelous sūme of gold & siluer, bountifully to bestow in gifts among the nobilitie & chiefe rulers of the cities of GRÆCE, to make all the other GRÆCIANS to rise against the LACEDÆMONIANS. Hermocrates wisely executed his cōmission, for he made the chiefest cities of GRÆCE to rebel against LACEDÆMON: so that all PELOPONNESVS being vp in armes, and in great garboyle, the Ephori at LACEDÆ-

D MON were inforced to send for Agesilaus home again. Agesilaus being sory to depart out of ASIA, said vnto his friends: that the king of PERSIA had driuen him out of his Realme with thirty thowsand archers: bicause that the PERSIAN coyne is stāped with an archer, hauing a bow in his hand. Artaxerxes also draue the LACEDÆMONIANS out of all their iurisdiction by sea, by the meanes of Conon, general of the ATHENIANS, whō Pharnabazus (one of his Lieuetenants) had wonne to take his part. For Conon, after he was ouerthrowen in battel at a place called the goates riuer, kept euer after in the Ile of CYPRVS, not so much for the safetie of his person, as also for that it was a mete place to stay in, vntil the wars of GRÆCE were appeased. He knowing that the deuise he had in his head, lacked power to put it in execution, & on the contrary side, that the power of the king lacked a man of deepe iudgemēt to be imployed: he wrote let-

E ters vnto him of his deuise what he thought to doe, straightly charging him whom he deliuered his letters vnto, that if he could possibly, he should cause the same to be deliuered vnto the king by Zenon the CRETAN, one of the kings dauncers, or by one Polycritus his Phisition, born in the city of MENDE: & in both their absences, then to giue it vnto Ctesias, to deliuer vnto the king. It chaunced so that this letter came to the hands of Ctesias: who (as it is reported) added moreouer vnto the cōtents of the letter, that the king should send him vnto Conon, bicause he was a necessary man to be employed in his seruice, but specially by sea. Ctesias sayth not so, but writeth that the king of his owne voluntary motion gaue him this charge. Now, after Artaxerxes had through the leading of Conon & Pharnabazus, won the battell by sea neare to the Ile of GNIDVS, & that therby he had driuen all the LACEDÆMONIANS from their iurisdiction by

F sea, all GRÆCE had him in maruelous great estimation: so that he gaue vnto the GRÆCIANS with such cōditions as he would, that so famous peace, called Antalcidas peace. This Antalcidas was a citizē of SPARTA, the sonne of one Leon, who fauoring king Artaxerxes affaires, procured by the treatie of this peace, that the LACEDÆMONIANS left vnto Artaxerxes all the cities of GRÆCE in ASIA, & all the Iles conteined in the same, to enioy quietly, making thē pay tribute at his pleasure. This peace being cōcluded with the GRÆCIANS (if so shameful a treason, reproch, & common infamy to all GRÆCE may be called a peace, as neuer warre fell out more dishonorable & infamous for the vanquished) king Artaxerxes that otherwise hated the LACEDÆMONIANS to the death, & that estemed thē (as Dinon writeth) the impudentest men liuing: did notwithstanding loue Antalcidas passingly wel, & enterteined him very honorably, when he came into PERSIA vnto him. It is reported that the king one day tooke a garland of flowers, & did wet it with the most pretious & sweetest oyle of perfume that was prepared for the feast, & sēt the same vnto Antalcidas: insomuch as euery mā maruelled to see the kīg set so much by him. In deed he was a mete man to follow the vanity & curiositie of the PERSIANS, & had wel deserued such a garland to be sent him: who was so bold to daunce a daunce before the PERSIANS, mocking & coūterfeating Leonidas & Callicratidas, two of the valliantest men that euer were in GRÆCE. Therefore one said at that time in the presence of king Agesilaus: O how vnhappy is poore GRÆCE at this day, when the LACEDÆMONIANS come to follow the PERSIANS? But Agesilaus presently aūswered him againe, not so, said he: but rather the PERSIANS followe the LACEDÆMONIANS. Notwithstanding, this wise aunswer Agesilaus made, did not take away the shame of the fact: & shortly after, the LACEDÆMONIANS lost the battell of LEVCTRES, & therewith also the signiorie & principalitie they had kept of long time ouer all GRÆCE, although they had lost their estimatiō before, for cōsenting to so shameful & dishonorable a peace. Whē SPARTA florished most, & was chiefe of all the other cities of GRÆCE so long did Artaxerxes stil cōtinue to make much of Antalcidas, & called him his friēd. But after that the LACEDÆMONIANS had lost the battell of LEVCTRES, hauing receiued so great an ouerthrow, & wanting money: they sent Agesilaus into ÆGYPT, & Altaleidas into PERSIA vnto king Artaxerxes, to pray him to ayde and helpe the LACEDÆMONIANS. Howbeit the king made so smal accompt of him, & disdained him so much, denying him, & his requests: that he returned backe to SPARTA, as a man knocked on the head, without any thing done with the king. And there also seing that his enemies mocked him, & fearing that the Ephori would cōmit him to prison: he killed him self with famine. About that time also, the THEBANS after they had won the battell of LEVCTRES, sent Ismenias & Pelopidas into PERSIA, vnto king Artaxerxes: where Pelopidas did nothing vnworthy of him self. Howbeit Ismenias being commaunded to kneele to the king, he let fall his ringe at his feete, and stowped to take it vp: whereby it was thought of some that he did it to kneele to the king. Another time Artaxerxes liking a secret aduertisement very wel sent him from Timagoras the ATHENIAN: he gaue him ten thowsand daricks by his Secretary called Belluris. And bicause he had a sickly body, & was driuē to drink cowes milke to restore him: the king therfore sent foure score mylche kyne with him to giue milke to the paile, to haue fresh milke euery daye. Furthermore, he sent him a bed throughly furnished with al things necessary, & groomes of the chāber to make his bed, saying, that the GRÆCIANS could not tel how to make it: & did also let him haue men to cary him vpon their armes to the sea side, bicause he was sicke, & whilest he was at the Court, he enterteyned him very honorably & bountifully. So Ostanes, the kings brother, said one day vnto him: Timagoras, remēber how honorably thou art serued at thy bord, for it is not for no small matter thou art thus made of. This word was rather to cut him for his treason, then for any remēbrance of the benefit receiued. So the ATHENIANS afterwards condēned the same Timagoras to dye, bicause he had taken bribes & money of the king of PERSIA. But Artaxerxes in recōpence of so many other thinges that he had done, to despite the GRÆCIANS with, he did one thing that pleased them maruelously: when he did put Tisaphernes to death, who was the dreadfullest enemye the GRÆCIANS had. Paryſatis the Queene mother did helpe to bringe this to passe, aggrauating the accusations brought in against him. For the king kept not his anger longe against his mother, but fell in againe with her, and sent for her, knowing that she had an excellent witte and noble courage to gouerne a great kingdome: and besides, that there was nothing nowe to let them to come together as much as they would, to giue any occasion of iclousie or malice to any person. So euer after, his mother Paryſatis endeuored her selfe

A to ſeede the king her ſonnes humor euery manner of way, ſeeming to miſlike nothing that he did: Whereby ſhe grewe in great credit with him, that he denied her nothing whatſoeuer ſhe asked him. So ſhe perceyued that the king was extreamely in loue with one of his owne Daughters, that was called Atoſſa: howbeit that he diſſembled his loue the beſt he could, and kept it ſecret, chiefly for feare of her, although ſome write, that in deede he had already had her maydenhead. Nowe Paryſatis hauing found his loue, ſhe beganne to make more of his Daughter then ſhe did before, and talking with her father, ſometyme ſhe prayſed her beauty, another tyme her grace and good countenaunce, ſaying that ſhe was like a Queene and noble Princeſſe. So that at length by litle and litle ſhe perſwaded him to marye her openly, not paſſing for the lawes and opinions of the GRÆCIANS, conſidering that God had giuen B him vnto the PERSIANS, to ſtabliſhe lawes vnto them, to decyde right from wronge, and the good from the bad. Some Hiſtoriographers doe write, and amongeſt them Heraclides of CVMES: that Artaxerxes did not onely marie the eldeſt of his Daughters, but the ſecond alſo called Ameſtris, of whome we will ſpeake hereafter. Nowe when he had maried the eldeſt, Atoſſa, he loued her ſo entierly well, that though ſhe fell ſicke of the diſſeaſe commonly called Vitiligo, that ranne ouer all her bodie: he loued her not the worſe for it, but prayed continually for her vnto the goddeſſe Iuno, honoring no other goddeſſe but her onely, and fell downe on his knees before her image, and ſent by his friendes and Lieuetenants ſo many offerings, that all the way from his Court gates vnto the temple of Iuno, (which was ſixteene furlong of) was full of gold, ſiluer, riche purple ſilkes, and horſe that were ſent thither. He beganne to C make warre alſo with the ÆGYPTIANS, and made Pharnabazus and Iphicrates ATHENIAN, his Lieuetenants, who did no good, bicauſe they fell at variance thone with thother. But afterwards, Artaxarxes him ſelfe went in perſon to conquer the CADVSIANS with three hundred thowſand footemen, and tenne thowſand horſemen. So he inuaded their contry, which was a very rude contry, alway darke and clowdy: The earth bringeth forth nothing that man ſoweth, but doth onely feede the inhabitants with peares, apples, and ſuch like frute, and yet the men be very ſtronge and valliant notwithſtanding. So when he was entred farre into the contry before he was ware, he fell into great want of vittells, and was alſo in great daunger. For his ſouldiers found nothing in all the contry that was good to eate, and worſt of all, no vittells could come vnto them from any place, bicauſe of the hardnes and naughty wayes of D the contry: So that his campe liued onely with the fleſhe of their beaſtes of cariage, and yet they ſold it dearely: for, an aſſes head was ſold for three skore ſiluer Drachmas. To conclude, the famyne was ſo great, that prouiſion fayled for the kings owne mouth, and there were but fewe horſe left, for all the reſt were eaten. Then Tiribazus, that had oftentimes bene chiefe about the king, bicauſe he was a valliant man, and that through his folly was many tymes alſo out of fauor, as at that preſent tyme, when he had no authoritie nor eſtimation: he deuiſed a ſtratageame, whereby he ſaued the king and all his campe. In this contry of the CADVSIANS, there were two kinges in the field with their armies, both of them camped a ſonder one from the other. Tiribazus, after he had ſpoken with king Artaxerxes, and had tolde him what he ment to doe: he went vnto one of the kinges, and at the ſelfe ſame tyme alſo ſeeretly ſent his E ſonne vnto the other king, and told either of them, that the other king had ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Artaxerxes to make peace with him, vnwitting to his companion, and therefore he counſelled him if they were wiſe, one of them to ſeeke to preuent another with all the poſſible ſpeede he could, and promiſed them both, one after another, to helpe them the beſt he could. Both the one and the other of the kings gaue credit to his wordes, either of them both miſtruſting one another: ſo that the one ſpeedily ſent his Ambaſſadors vnto king Artaxerxes, with Tiribazus, and the other alſo his Ambaſſadors with his ſonne. But Tiribazus tarying long in his iorney, king Artaxerxes beganne ſomewhat to ſuſpect him, his enemies alſo did accuſe him in his abſence, aud the king grewe very chollerycke, and repented him that he had truſted him ſo farre, and was willing to heare euery man that ſpake againſt him. Howbeit F Tiribazus at length returned, and his ſonne alſo, and either of them brought with them the Ambaſſadors of the CADVSIANS, and ſo peace was taken with them both. Then was Tiribazus aloft againe, and in greater credit then euer he was, and ſo departed with the king. The king then shewed plainely, that cowardlines proceedeth not of pompe and curiositie, as some take it, beleuing that it doth effeminate mens harts, but rather of a vile base mind, that commonly followeth euill, and the worst counsell. For nether the iewells of gold, the kingly robe, nor other sumptuous ornaments which the king euer ware about him, worth twelue thousand talents as it is reported, did not hinder him at that tyme to trauaile, and to take as much payne as any man in all his army. For he him selfe marched a foote the foremost man, caryeng his owne truffe in a scarfe vppon his shoulders, and his target on his arme, and trauelled through highe stony mountaines. So that his souldiers seeing the corage and payne the king him selfe tooke, they marched so nymbly, that it seemed they had wings: for he dayly marched aboue two hundred furlongs. Now the king at length by sore trauell, came to one of his owne houses, where there were goodly arbors and parkes, with goodly trees passingly sette forth: but all the contry besides was naked and barren, so that there was not a tree a great way from thence, and it was maruelous cold. The king suffred his souldiers to hewe downe the goodly pynes and cypres trees in his parkes: and bicause they durst not presume to touch them, he him selfe as he was tooke an axe in his hande and beganne to bewe downe the goodlieste tree there. The souldiers seeing that, fell euery man of them also to hewing: so that in a very short tyme they had prouided them selues well with wodde, and made them great fires in euery place, and so past ouer the night quietly by the fires side. This notwithstanding, he lost a great number of valliant men in this voyage, and almost all his horses. Therefore thinking his men would mocke him, bicause he did fayle of his purpose: he beganne to growe mistrustfull, and to suspect the chiefest noble men he had about him: so that in a rage he put many of them to death, but much more of them remayned, whome he mistrusted. For there is nothing more cruell, nor a greater bloud sucker, then a cowardly tyrant: as in contrary manner nothing is more curteous, and lesse suspicious, then a valliant and hardy man. And therefore brute beastes that be neuer made tame nor mastered, are commonly cowardly, and timerous: and the other to the contrary, that are noble and coragious, are bold straight, and doe come to knowe a man, bicause they haue no feare, nether doe they flie from their clapping and making much of them as they doe. Afterwards king Artaxerxes being growen very olde, heard that there was great sturre and contencion betwene his sonnes, which of them should be heire after his death, and that this contencion fell out also amonge his friends and men, of great calling. The wisest of them wished, that as he him self came vnto the crowne, as his fathers eldest sonne: so that he likewise should after his death leaue it vnto his eldest sonne, called Darius. But the younger, which was called Ochus, being a valliant man, and of a whot stirring nature, had some in the Court also that tooke his parte, and hoped to attrayne to his purpose, by the meanes of his sister Atossa, whome he loued and honored, promising to mary her, and to make her Queene, if he might come to be king after his fathers dissease. And besides, there went a report abroad, that in their fathers life time he secretly kept her: howbeit Artaxerxes neuer vnderstoode it. Now, bicause he would betimes put his sonne Ochus out of all hope to succeede him in the kingdom, least this expectacion might make him to goe about to practise that which Cyrus did, and that by this meanes his Realme should growe into faction and ciuill warres: he proclaymed his eldest sonne Darius (beeing fiftye yeare olde) king after his death, and furthermore gaue him leaue from thenceforth to weare the poynt of his hat right vp. In Persia the custom is, that when any commeth to be proclaymed successor and heire apparant to the crowne, he should require a gifte of him that proclaymeth him successor. The which the other doth graunt him, whatsoeuer it be that he asketh, so it be not impossible. Darius then asked his father a concubine called Aspasia, who was first with Cyrus, & in greatest fauor with him aboue all the rest, but then was for the kings own bodye. She was borne in the contry of Ionia, of free parents: and being vertuously brought vp, she was brought one night vnto Cyrus as he was at supper with other women, who late them downe, without too curious bidding, hard by him, and were verie glad when Cyrus offered to play and be merie with them, geuing euerie one of them some pleasaunt word, and they made it not coy. But Aspasia stoode on her feete by the table, and sayd neuer a word: and notwithstanding that Cyrus called her, she woulde not come at him. Moreouer, when one of

A the groomes of his chamber would haue taken her to haue brought her to him: the first saith she, that layeth hands on me, shall repent it. Thereuppon all those that were present, said she was a foolish thing, and simply brought vp, and could not tell what was comely for her. Howbeit Cyrus being glad of it, passed it ouer with laughing, and told him that had brought them vnto him: doest thou not see, that of all these thou hast brought me, there is not an honest woman but she? After that, Cyrus began to make muche of her, and loued her better continually then all the rest, & called her Aspasia the wise. This Aspasia was taken among the spoiles of Cyrus campe after he was ouerthrowen, and Darius as we haue told ye, did begge her of his father, who was verie angrie with it in his mind. For the barbarous people of all other things are maruelous gealous of their women, so that not onely he should be put to death, that durst B but speake to, or touch any concubine of the kings but in sport: but also whosoeuer came nere them, or neere their coches as they trauelled. The kings daughter Atossa, whom he had maried against all lawe, was yet liuing, and besides her he had also three hundred and three score passing fayer concubines: and yet when his sonne Darius asked Aspasia of him, the king answered, she was a free woman borne, and therefore if she woulde, he was content he should haue her: but if she were vnwilling to goe to him, then he would not haue him force her by no meanes. So Aspasia was sent for, and she was asked with whom she had rather be. She answered, with Darius: contrarie to king Artaxerxes expectacion, who both by the custome, and also the law, was compelled to let him haue her. But shortly after he tooke her from him againe, saying that he woulde place her in a Nunrie of Diana, in the contrie of ECBATANE, C where they call her Anitis, there to serue the goddesse, and to liue chast all the daies of her life: supposing by this meanes to punish his sonne, not rigorously, but moderatly, with griefe mixt with sporte and earnest. Howebeit his sonne tooke it not so pacientlie, either bicause he was deepelie in loue with Aspasia, or else for that he saw his father mocked him in that point. Tiribazus finding this, and perceiuing that Darius tooke it verie grieuouslie: he aggrauated his anger against his father, knowing the passion of loue in Darius, by his owne, vpon the like occasion. King Artaxerxes had many daughters, and had promised Pharnabazus one of them, called Apama: vnto Orontes, Rodogoune: and to Tiribazus, Amestris. The king performed the other two mariages, & did put Tiribazus by his wife. For the king himselfe maried his owne daughter Amestris, and for her, he promised Tiribazus the younger, Atossa: with whom also D he himselfe fell in loue, and maried her. Tiribazus hereupon was in such a rage with the king, that he hated him to the death: not bicause he was any traitor or seditious man in nature, but a madde harebrained fellow. For sometime he was aloft, and in as good credit and authoritie as the best: sodainly againe he woulde play some madde parte to anger the king, and then he was in as much disgrace, and out of countenaunce: and could not away with neither fortune. For when he was in authoritie, he made euerie man hate him for his pride: and being in disgrace, he could not humble himselfe, but looke bigger then before. Nowe there was fire and brimstone met, when Tiribazus tooke parte with Darius. For he dayly blewe into his eares, that it was to no purpose for him to weare his hat right vp, if his affaires also went not rightly forward: and that he deceiued himselfe much, if he did not know that his brother (by meanes E of the women he kept) secretlie aspired to the crowne: and that his father being so vnconstant as he was, he must not trust in any sorte to succeede his father in the kingdome, what proclamation soeuer he hath made in his behalfe to the contrarie. For, sayd he, he that for a GRÆCIAN woman hath broken and violated the holiest lawe that was in PERSIA: thou must not looke that he will performe that he hath promised thee. And furthermore he perswaded him, that it was not a like repulse vnto Ochus, to be denied that which he looked for: as it was for him to be turned out of all that euer he had gotten. For sayd he, if it please Ochus to liue like a priuate man, he may safelie doe it, and no man will trouble him: but for him selfe that was alreadie proclaimed king, he must of necessitie make him selfe king, or else he must not liue. So the Poet Sophocles his saying most commonly proueth true:

For the way is large and plaine for a man to beleeue as he lyst, and men commonly are giuen rather to beleue the euill then the good, bicause most men know not what goodnes mea-gainſt his father Artaxerxes, together with Tiribazus. Now, they hauing gotten many conſpirators to ioyne with them, one of the kings Euenukes perceiuing it, ranne and told the king of it, and howe they had ſodainly determined to aſſaile him, knowing certainly that it was agreed among them ſelues, that they ſhould kill him in his bedde in the night. Artaxerxes re-ceiuing this aduertiſement, thought it was not good to be careleſſe of a matter of ſo great importaunce as his life: and alſo that it were too great lightnes in him ſo ſodainly to beleue his Euenuke, without better proofe or knowledge. So he tooke this way with him ſelfe. He com- B conſpirators, & to follow them whereſoeuer they went, to ſee their doings: and in the meane time he bet downe his wall behind his bed, and made a dore thorowe, and ſet vp a hanging of tapiſtrie before it. When the time was come, as the Euenuke had aduertiſed the king, that the traitors ment to doe their feate: Artaxerxes being layed on his bedde, roſe not vp till he had ſeene euerie traitor of them in the face that came to kill him. Then when he ſawe them com-ming towards him with their ſwords drawen, he ſodainly lift vp the hanging, and got in to his inner chamber, & ſhut the dore after him, making an outcrie, murder, murder. So the traitors being plainly ſeene and knowen by the king, fled the ſame way they came, and failed of their priſoner with his ſonnes: and the king referred him to be iudged by his peeres. For the king him ſelfe would not be preſent to geue iudgement of him, but deputed others in his place to accuſe him: howbeit he commaunded his ſecretaries to ſet downe in writing the opinion and ſentence of euerie one of the Iudges and to bring it him. In fine, they all caſt him, and con-the priſon, where the hangman came with a raſer in his hande with the which he vſed to cut ſaw it was Darius, he was affrayed, and came out of the chamber againe, his hart failing him, and durſt not lay handes vpon the perſon of the king. But the Iudges that ſtoode without the chamber, bad him goe and doe it, vnleſſe he would haue his owne throate cut. So the hangman then came in, and tooke Darius by the heare of the head, and made him hold downe his head, and ſo cut his necke with his raſer he had in his other hand. Others doe write, that this ſentence was geuen in the preſence of king Artaxerxes ſelfe, and that Darius ſeeing him ſelfe conuicted by manifeſt proofes brought in againſt him, he fell downe at his fathers feete, and beſought him to pardon him: and then that his father being angrie, roſe vp, and drew out his curtelax and wounded him in ſo many places withall, that at length he ſlue him. Then returning into the Court, he worſhipped the ſunne, and turning him to his Lords that were a- E bout him, he ſayd vnto them. My Lordes, God be with you, and be merie at home in your houſes, and tell them that were not here, how the great Oromazes hath taken reuenge of them that practiſed treaſon againſt me. This was the end of Darius treaſon. Now Darius being dead, Ochus his brother ſtoode in good hope to be next heire to the crowne, & the rather, through nature, the PERSIANS deſired he might be their king. On the other ſide, Arſames was wiſe, and valliant: and Ochus ſawe that his father loued him dearely. So he determined to intrappe them both. Now Ochus being a ſuttle and malicious natured man, he firſt ſhewed his crueltie F vpon Arſames, and his malice vpon Ariaſpes his legitimate brother. For, bicauſe he knewe he was but ſimple and plaine, he ſent dayly ſome of the kings Euenukes vnto him, who brought him

him threatning words and messages, as from the king: telling him that he had determined to put him to a shamefull and cruell death. So, forging these newes continuallie as things verie secret, they did so terrifie poore Ariaspes, telling him that the king was fullie bent to put some of his threats in execution out of hand: that he was put in such feare and dispaire of his life, that he prepared him selfe a poyson, and dranke it, to ridde him selfe of his life. King Artaxerxes vnderstanding of his death, tooke it very heauily, & began to mistrust the cause that made him to make him selfe away: howebeit he coulde not seeke the proofe of it, for his extreame age. But this chaunce made him loue Arsames better then before, shewing plainly that he trusted him better then Ochus, and did make him priuie to all things. Ochus could no lenger abide to deferre his intent, and therefore entised Harpates, Tiribazus sonne, to kill his bastard brother Arsames: the which he did. Now Artaxerxes was so extreame olde, that he was as good as done with age: but after he heard his sonne Arsames was murdered, he coulde beare it no lenger, but tooke it so to his hart for sorow, that when he had liued foure score and foureteene yeares, and raigned three score and two, he dyed. When he was dead, they then found that he had bene a gratious & curteous Prince, and one that loued his people and subiectes: when they saw the proofe of his successor Ochus, that passed all men liuing, in cruelte and seuerity.

THE LIFE OF Dion.

LIke as Simonides, & Sossius Senecio, saith that the city of ILIVM was not offended with the CORINTHIANS, for that they came to make warre with them with other GRÆCIANS, bicause Glaucus (whose first auncesters came from CORINTH) had taken armes, & louingly fought for the same: euen so me thinkes, that neither the GRÆCIANS nor ROMANES haue cause to complaine of the Academy, sith they be both alike praised of the same in this present booke, in the which are conteined the liues of Dion and Brutus. Of the which, the one of them hauing bene verie familiar with Plato him selfe, and the other from his childhoode brought vp in Platoes doctrine: they both (as it were) came out of one selfe schoolehouse, to attempt the greatest enterprises amongest men. And it is no maruell if they two were muche like in many of their doinges, prouing that true which their schoolemaister Plato de virtute. How mens acts ſhould be famous in the cõmon wealth.

Plato wrote of vertue: that to do any noble act in the gouernment of a common wealth, which A ſhould be famous, and of credit, authoritie, and good fortune, muſt both meete in one ſelfe perſon, ioined with iuſtice and wiſedom. For, as a certaine fenſer called Hippomachus ſaid, that he knewe his ſchollers farre of, if he did but ſee them comming from the market with meate in their handes: ſo it muſt needes follow, that men hauing bene vertuouſly brought vp, muſt nedes be wiſe in all their doings, and beſide that it bringeth them to ciuilitie and honeſty, euen ſo it frameth their condicions muche like one vnto an other. Furthermore, their fortunes hauing alſo fallen out both alike, more by chaunce then by any reaſon, do make their liues verie like to eache other. For, they were both of them ſlaine, before they coulde bring their enterpriſes to paſſe which they had determined. But the greateſt wonder of all is this: that their deathes were foreſhewed vnto them both, by a wicked ſpirit that viſiblie appeared vnto either B of them: albeit there be ſome that can not abide thoſe opinions, and doe maintaine that theſe ſights and euill ſpirits doe neuer appeare to any man that hath his right wits, but that they are fancies of litle children, or old women, or of ſome men that their wits are weakened by ſickenes, and ſo haue a certaine imagination of ſuche ſtraunge ſightes, being of this ſuperſtitious minde, that they haue a wicked ſpirit, and an euill angell in them. But if Dion and Brutus, both of them graue and learned Philoſophers, and verie conſtant men, not ouercome by any ſodaine paſſion or imagination of minde, haue bene moued by ſuch ſights and ſpirits, and haue alſo tolde it vnto their frendes: I can not tell whether we ſhall be inforced, to graunt the moſt ſtraungeſt and oldeſt opinion of this, which ſayth: that there be euill ſpirites which enuying the vertue of good men, to withdraw them from their godly mindes, doe make them affrayed C with theſe feareſull ſights, intiſing them to forſake their godlynes, leaſt that perſiſting therein, they ſhould be rewarded with better life in the world to come, then theirs is. But let vs referre this diſputacion to ſome other booke, and now in this twelfth couple of theſe famous mens liues compared, let vs firſt begin to write the life of him that is the elder of theſe two men we ſpeake of.

A wicked ſpirite appeared vnto Dion & Brutus.

Dionyſius wiues, Doride, of Locres: Ariſtomaché, of Syracuſa, Hipparinus daughter, and Dions ſiſter.

gether, the one a ſtraunger of the citie of LOCRES, called Doride: and the other of the contrie it ſelfe, called Ariſtomaché, the daughter of Hipparinus the chiefeſt man of all SYRACVSA, and that had bene companion with Dionyſius, the firſt time he was choſen Generall. It was ſayd that Dionyſius maried them both in one day, and that they could neuer tell which of them he knewe firſt: but otherwiſe, that he made as much of the one, as he did of the other. For they commonly ſate together with him at his table, and did either of them lye with him by turnes: though the SYRACVSANS would haue their owne contrywoman preferred before the ſtraunger. Howebeit the ſtraunge woman had this good happe, to bring foorth Dionyſius his eldeſt ſonne, which was a good countenaunce to defend her, being a forreiner. Ariſtomaché in contrarie maner, continued a long time with Dionyſius, without frute of her wombe, although he E was verie deſirous to haue children by her: ſo that he put the LOCRIAN womans mother to death, accuſing her that ſhe had with ſorceries and witchcraft, kept Ariſtomaché from being with child. Dion being the brother of Ariſtomaché, was had in great eſtimation at the firſt, for his ſiſters ſake: but afterwards the tyran finding him to be a wiſe man, he loued him thē for his owne ſake. Inſomuch, that among many ſundrie things & pleaſures he did for him: he commaunded his Treaſorers to let him haue what money he asked of them, ſo they made him acquainted withall the ſelfe ſame day they gaue him any. Nowe though Dion had euer before a noble minde in him by nature, yet muche more did that magnanimitie increaſe, when Plato by good fortune arriued in SICILE. For his comming thither ſurelie was no mans deuiſe, as I take it, but the verie pronidence of ſome god: who (bringing farre of the firſt beginning F and fundation of the libertie of the SYRACVSANS, and to ouerthrow the tyrannicall ſtate) ſent Plato out of ITALIE vnto the citie of SYRACVSA, and brought him acquainted with Dion, who was

A was but a young man at that time, but yet had an apter witte to learne, and redier good-will to follow vertue, then any young man elſe that followed Plato: as Plato him ſelfe writeth, and his owne doinges alſo doe witneſſe. For Dion hauing from a child bene brought vp with humble conditions vnder a tyran, and acquainted with a ſeruile timerous life, with a prowde and inſolent reigne, with all vanity and curioſitie, as placing chiefe felicity in couetouſnes: neuertheleſſe, after he had felt the ſweete reaſons of Philoſophie, teaching the broad way to vertue, his hart was enflamed ſtraight with earneſt deſire to follow the ſame. And bicauſe he found that he was ſo eaſelie perſwaded to loue vertue and honeſtie, he ſimplie thinking (being of an honeſt plaine nature) that the ſelfe ſame perſwaſions would moue a like affection in Dionyſius: obteined of Dionyſius, that being at leaſure, he was contented to ſee Plato, and to ſpeake with him. Dion, Platoes ſcholler.

B When Plato came to Dionyſius, all their talke in maner was of vertue, and they chiefely reaſoned what was fortitude: where Plato proued that tyrans were no valliant men. From thence paſſing further into iuſtice, he told him that the life of iuſt men was happy, and contrarily the life of vniuſt men vnfortunate. Thus the tyran Dionyſius perceiuing he was ouercomen, durſt no more abide him, and was angrie to ſee the ſtanders by to make ſuche eſtimacion of Plato, and that they had ſuch delight to heare him ſpeake. At length he angrily asked him, what buſineſſe he had to doe there? Plato aunſwered him, he came to ſeeke a good man. Dionyſius then replied againe: what, in Gods name, by thy ſpeache then it ſeemeth thou haſt founde none yet. Now Dion thought that Dionyſius anger would proceede no further, and therefore at Platoes earneſt requeſt, he ſent him away in a galley with three bankes of owers, the which Plato and Dionyſius the elder talke together.

C Pollis a Laced æmonian Captaine caried backe againe into Græce. Howbeit Dionyſius ſecretlie requeſted Pollis to kill Plato by the way, as euer he would doe him pleaſure: if not, yet that he would ſell him for a ſlaue, howſoeuer he did. For ſaid he, he ſhall be nothing the worſe for that: bicauſe if he be a iuſt man, he ſhall be as happie to be a ſlaue, as a freeman. Thus, as it is reported, this Pollis caried Plato into the Ile of Ægina, and there ſold him. For the Æginetes hauing warre at that time with the Athenians, made a decree, that all the Athenians that were taken in their Ile, ſhould be ſold. This notwithſtanding, Dionyſius refuſed not to honor and truſt Dion, as much as euer he did before, and did alſo ſende him Ambaſſador in matters of great weight. As when he ſent him vnto the Carthaginians, where he behaued him ſelfe ſo well, that he wan great reputacion by his iorney: and the tyran coulde well away Dionyſius malice vnto Plato. Plato ſolde in the Ile of AEgina.

D with his plaine ſpeach. For no man but he, durſt ſay their mindes ſo boldly vnto him, to ſpeake what he thought good: as on a time he reproued him for Gelon. One day when they mocked Gelons gouernment before the tyrans face, and that Dionyſius him ſelfe ſayd (finely deskanting of his name, which ſignifieth laughture) that he was euen the verie laughing ſtocke him ſelfe of Sicile: the Courtiers made as though they liked this encounter and interpretacion of laughture paſſingly well. But Dion not being well pleaſed withall, ſayd vnto him: for his ſake, men truſted thee, whereby thou cameſt to be tyran: but for thine owne ſake they will neuer truſt any man. For, to ſay truly, Gelon ſhewed by his gouernment, that it was as goodly a thing as coulde be, to ſee a citie gouerned by an abſolute Prince: but Dionyſius by his gouernment on thother ſide, made it appeare as deteſtable a thing. This Dionyſius had by his Locrian Dions boldnes in ſpeaking plainly to the tyran. Gelon ſignifieth laughture.

E wife three children, and by Ariſtomaché foure: of the which, two were daughters, the one called Sophroſynè, and the other Areté. Of them, Dionyſius eldeſt ſonne maried Sophroſynè, and Areté was maried vnto his brother Thearides, after whoſe death Dion maried her, being his Nece. Now when Dionyſius her father fell ſicke, not likely to eſcape: Dion would haue ſpoken with him for his children he had by his ſiſter Ariſtomaché. Howbeit the Phiſitions about him, to currie fauor with the next heire and ſucceſſor of the tyrannie, would neuer let him haue any time or oportunitie to ſpeake with him. For, as Timæus writeth, they gaue Dionyſius the elder (as he had commaunded them) a ſtrong opiat drinke to caſt him in a ſleepe, and ſo thereby they tooke from him all his ſences and ioyned death with his ſleepe. Notwithſtanding, in the firſt counſell and aſſemblie holden by his frendes, to conſult about the ſtate and affaires of Sophroſynè, and Areté: the daughters of Dionyſius by Ariſtomaché. Dion marieth his Nece Areté the daughter of Dionyſius & of his ſiſter Ariſtomaché. The death of Dionyſius the elder.

F the younger Dionyſius: Dion moued matter ſo neceſſarie and profitable for that preſent time, that by his wiſedom he ſhewed they were all but children, and by his bold and franke ſpeach, made them know that they were but ſlaues of the tyranny: bicauſe they beaſtly and cowardly gaue ſuche counſell and aduiſe, as might beſt pleaſe and feede the young tyrannes humor. But he made them moſt to wonder at him, when they fearing aboue all other thinges, the daunger Dionyſius ſtate was in, by reaſon of CARTHAGE, he did promiſe them, that if Dionyſius would haue peace, he would then goe foorthwith into AFRICKE, and finde the meanes honorablie to quenche the warres: or if otherwiſe he better liked of warre, that he woulde furniſhe him at his owne proper coſtes and charges, fiftie gallies readie to rowe. Dionyſius wondered greatlie at the noble minde of Dion, and thanked him muche for the good will he bare vnto him, touching his eſtate. But all men elſe taking Dions noble offer to be a reproach of their auarice, and his credit and authoritie, and impaire vnto theirs: they preſentlie vpon this liberall offer tooke occaſion to accuſe him, not ſparing any reproachefull wordes againſt him, to moue Dionyſius to be offended with him. For they complayned of him, and ſayd that he cunninglie practiſed to poſſeſſe the tyrannie, making him ſelfe ſtrong by ſea, going about by his gallies to make the tyrannie fall into the handes of the children of Ariſtomachè his ſiſter. But the chiefeſt cauſe of all why they did malice and hate him, was his ſtraunge manner of life: that he neither woulde keepe companie with them, nor liue after their manner. For they that from the beginning were crept in fauour and frendſhippe with this younge euill brought vp tyranne, by flattering of him, and feeding him with vaine pleaſures: ſtudied for no other thing, but to enterteine him in loue matters, and other vaine exerciſes, as to riot and bancket, to keepe light women companie, and all ſuche other vile vicious paſtimes and recreacions, by the which the tyrannie became like iron ſoftened by fire, and ſeemed to be verie pleaſaunt vnto the ſubiectes, bicauſe the ouergreat Maieſtie and ſeueritie thereof was ſomewhat milder, not ſo muche by the bountie and goodneſſe, as by the follie and rechleſnes of the Lorde. Thus, this litle care and regarde increaſing more and more, ſtill winning way with the young tyran: did at length melt and breake a ſunder thoſe ſtrong diamond chaines, with the whiche Dionyſius the elder made his boaſt that he left his Monarchie and tyrannie chained to his ſonne. For ſometime he would be three dayes together without intermiſſion, ſtill banketing and being dronke: and all that time his Court gates were kept ſhut vnto graue and wiſe men, and for all honeſt matters, and was then full of dronkards, of common playes, dauncinges, maskes, and mommeries, and full of all ſuche tromperie and diſſolute paſtimes. And therefore Dion vndoubtedlie was muche enuied of them, bicauſe he gaue him ſelfe to no ſport nor pleaſure: whereupon they accuſed him, and miſnamed his vertues, vices, being ſomwhat to be reſembled vnto them. As in calling his grauetie, pride: his plainnes and boldneſſe in his Oration, obſtinacie: if he did perſwade them, that he accuſed them: and bicauſe he would not make one in their fonde paſtimes: that therefore he deſpiſed them. For to ſay truelie, his manners by nature had a certeine hawtineſſe of minde and ſeueritie, and he was a ſower man to be acquainted with: whereby his companie was not onely troubleſome, but alſo vnpleſaunt to this younger Dionyſius, whoſe eares were ſo fine, that they could not away to heare any other thing but flatterie. And furthermore, diuers of his verie frendes and familiars, that did like and commend his plaine manner of ſpeache and noble minde: they did yet reproue his ſternenes, and auſtere conuerſation with men. For it ſeemed vnto them, that he ſpake too roughlie, and delt ouerhardlie with them that had to doe with him, and more then became a ciuill or curteous man. And for proofe hereof, Plato him ſelfe ſometime wrote vnto him (as if he had prophecied what ſhoulde happen) that he ſhould beware of obſtinacie, the companion of ſolitarineſſe, that bringeth a man in the ende to be forſaken of euerie one. This notwithſtanding, they did more reuerence him at that time, then any man elſe: bicauſe of the ſtate and gouernment, and for that they thought him the onely man that coulde beſt prouide for the ſafetie and quietneſſe of the tyrannie, the which ſtoode then in tickle ſtate. Now Dion knew well enough, that he was not ſo well taken and eſteemed through the good will of the tyran, as againſt his will, and for the neceſſitie of the ſtate and time. So Dion ſuppoſing that ignoraunce, and want of knowledge in Dionyſius was the cauſe: he deuiſed to put him into ſome honeſt trade or exerciſe, and to teache him the liberall ſciences, to frame him to a ciuill life, that thencefoorth he ſhoulde no more be affrayed of vertue, and ſhoulde alſo take pleaſure and delight in honeſt thinges. For Dionyſius of his owne nature, was none of the

A the worſt ſort of tyrans, but his father fearing that if he came once to haue a feeling and conceite of him ſelfe, or that he companied with wiſe and learned men, he would go neere to enter into practiſe, and put him out of his ſeate: he euer kept him locked vp in a chamber, and woulde ſuffer no man to ſpeake with him. Then the younger Dionyſius hauing nothing elſe to do, gaue himſelfe to make litle chariots, candleſticks, chaires, ſtooles, and tables of wodde. For his father Dionyſius was ſo fearefull and miſtruſtfull of euerie bodie, that he woulde ſuffer no man with a paire of barbers ſiſſers to polle the heares of his head, but cauſed an image maker of earth to come vnto him, and with a hotte burning cole to burne his goodly buſh of heare rounde about. No man came into his chamber where he was, with a gowne on his backe, no not his owne brother nor ſonne, but he was driuen before he coulde come in, to put of his B gowne, and the garde of his chamber to ſtrippe him naked whatſoeuer he was: and then they gaue him an other gowne to caſt vpon him, but not his owne. One day his brother Leptines, going about to deſcribe vnto him the ſcituacion of ſome place, he tooke a halberd from one of the garde, and with the point thereof beganne to drawe out a platte of the ſame vpon the ground. Dionyſius was terriblie offended with him, and did put the ſouldier to death that gaue him his halberd. He ſayed he was affrayed of his frendes, yea and of the wiſeſt of them: bicauſe he knewe that they deſired rather to rule, then to be ruled, and to commaunde, then to obey. He ſlewe one of his Captaines called Marſyas, whome he had preferred, and had geuen him charge of men: bicauſe he dreamed that he killed him: ſaying that he dreamed of this in the night, bicauſe that waking in the day he had determined to kill him. Now Dionyſius C that was ſo timerous, and whoſe mind through feareſulnes was ſtill miſerablie occupied: he was notwithſtanding maruelouſlie offended with Plato, bicauſe he did not iudge him to be the nobleſt and valliantest man aliue. Dion therefore ſeeing (as we haue ſayd) the younger Dionyſius cleane marred, and in manner caſt away for lacke of good education: perſwaded him the beſt he coulde to geue him ſelfe vnto ſtudie, and by the greateſt intreatie he coulde poſſiblie make, to pray the Prince of all Philoſophers to come into Sicill. And then when through his intreatie he were come, that he woulde referre him ſelfe whollie vnto him, to thende that reforming his life by vertue and learning, and knowing God thereby: (the beſt example that can be poſſible, and by whom all the whole world is ruled and gouerned, which otherwiſe were out of all order and confuſed) he ſhoulde firſt obteine great happines to him D ſelfe, and conſequently vnto all his citizens alſo, who euer after through the temperance and iuſtice of a father, would with good will doe thoſe thinges, which they preſentlie vnwillingly did for the feare of a Lorde, and in doing this, from a tyran he ſhould come to be a king. For, the chaines of a diamant to keepe a realme in ſafetie, were not force, and feare, as his father Dionyſius helde opinion: neither the great multitude of young ſouldiers, nor the garde of ten thowſand barbarous people: but in contrarie manner, that they were the loue and good will of their ſubiectes, which the Prince obteineth through vertue and iuſtice: the which chaines though they be ſlacker then the other that are ſo hard and ſtiffe, yet are they ſtronger, and will laſt longer time, to keepe a realme and kingdom in ſafetie. And furthermore, the Prince (ſayd he) is not deſirous of honor, neither is a man that deſerueth greatly to be praiſed and com- E mended, that onely ſtudieth to weare ſumptuous apparell, and that glorieth to ſee his Court richelie furniſhed, and him ſelfe curiouſlie ſerued: and in the meane time doth not frame him ſelfe to ſpeake better, to be wiſer, and to carie a greater maieſty then any other meane or common perſon, not eſteeming to adorne and beawtifie the Princely pallace of his minde, as becommeth the royall maieſtie of a king. Dion oftentimes rehearſing theſe exhortacions vnto Dionyſius, and otherwhile enterlacing betwene, ſome reaſons he had learned of Plato: he graffed in him a wonderfull, and as it were a vehement deſire to haue Plato in his companie, and to learne of him. So ſundry letters came from Dionyſius vnto Athens, diuers requeſtes from Dion, and great intreaty made by certaine Pythagorian Philoſophers, that prayed and perſwaded Plato to come into Sicill, to bridle the light diſpoſition of this young man, by his graue F and wiſe inſtructions: who without regard of reaſon, led a diſſolute and licentious life. Therefore Plato, as him ſelfe reporteth, bluſhing to him ſelfe, and fearing leaſt he ſhould geue men cauſe to thinke that it was but the opinion men had of him, and that of him ſelfe he was vn-

willing to do any worthie act: and further, hoping that doing good but vnto one man alone, who was the only guide of all the reſt, he ſhould as it were recouer all SICILIA from her corruption and ſickenes: he performed their requeſts that ſent vnto him. But Dions enemies fearing the chaunge and alteracion of Dionyſius, they perſwaded him to call Philiſtus the Hiſtoriographer home againe from baniſhment, who was a learned man, and had bene brought vp and acquainted with the tyrans facions: to thend he ſhould ſerue as a counterpeace, to withſtande Plato and his Philoſophie. For this Philiſtus, from the firſt time that the tyrannie beganne to be eſtabliſhed, did ſhew him ſelfe verie willing and conformable to the ſtabliſhment thereof, and had of long time kept the caſtell: and the voyce went, that he kept the mother of Dionyſius the elder, and as it was ſuppoſed, not altogether without the tyrans knowledge. But afterwardes, Leptines hauing had two daughters by one woman, whom he intiſed to follie being an other mans wife: he maried one of theſe his daughters vnto Philiſtus, and made not Dionyſius priuie to it before. The tyranne therewith was ſo offended, that he put Leptines woman in priſon faſt locked vp, and draue Philiſtus out of SICILIA. He being baniſhed thus, repayred vnto ſome of his frendes that dwelt about the Adriaticke ſea, where it ſeemeth he wrote the moſt parte of all his hiſtorie, being then at good leaſure. For he was not called home againe during the life of Dionyſius the elder: but after his death, the malice the Courtiers bare vnto Dion, cauſed them to procure Philiſtus calling home againe, as we haue told you, as the man they thought would ſticke ſtowtly in defenſe of the tyranny. So Philiſtus no ſooner returned, but he ſtowtly began to defend the tyranny: & others in contrary maner, deuiſed accuſations to the tyran againſt Dion, accuſing him that he had practiſed with Theodotes and Heraclides, to ouerthrowe the tyrannie of Dionyſius. For Dion, in my opinion, hoped by Platoes comming to bridle and leſſen a litle the ouerlicentious and imperious tyrannie of Dionyſius, and thereby to frame Dionyſius a wiſe and righteous gouernor. But on the other ſide, if he ſaw he would not follow his counſell, and that he yeelded not to his wiſe inſtructions: he then determined to put him downe, & to bring the gouernment of the common wealth into the handes of the SYRACVSANS: not that he allowed of Democratia (to wit, where the people gouerne) but yet certainly thinking that Democratia was much better then the tyrannie, when they could not come vnto Ariſtocratia, to wit, the gouernment of a few of the nobilitie. Now things being in this ſtate, Plato arriued in SICILE, where he was maruelouſly receiued and honored by Dionyſius. For when he landed on the ſhoare, leauing his galley that brought him: there was readie for him one of the kings rich and ſumptuous chariots to conuey him to the caſtell: and the tyran made ſacrifice to geue the goddes thankes for his comming, as for ſome wonderfull great good happe chaunced vnto his ſeigniory. Furthermore, the wonderfull modeſtie and temperaunce that was begon to be obſerued in feaſts and bankets, the Court cleane chaunged, and the great goodnes and clemencie of the tyran in all thinges, in miniſtring iuſtice to euerie man: did put the SYRACVSANS in great good hope of chaunge, and euerie man in the Court was verie deſirous to geue him ſelfe to learning and Philoſophie. So that, as men reported, the tyrannes pallace was full of ſande and duſt, with the numbers of ſtudentes that drewe plattes and figures of Geometrie. Shortlie after Plato was arriued, by chaunce the time was comen about to doe a ſolemne ſacrifice within the caſtell, at whiche ſacrifice the Heraulde (as the manner was) proclaimed alowde the ſolemne prayer accuſtomed to be done, that it woulde pleaſe the goddes long to preſerue the ſtate of the tyrannie: and that Dionyſius being harde by him, ſayd vnto him, what, wilt thou not leaue to curſe me? This worde grieued Philiſtus and his companions to the harte, thinkinge that with time, by litle and litle, Plato woulde winne ſuche eſtimacion and greate authoritie with Dionyſius, that afterwardes they ſhoulde not be able to reſiſt him: conſidering that in ſo ſhort a time as he had bene with Dionyſius, he had ſo altered his minde and courage. And therefore they nowe beganne, not one by one, nor in hugger mugger, but all of them with open mowth together to accuſe Dion: and ſayed, that it was eaſie to be ſeene, howe he charmed and inchaunted Dionyſius through Platoes eloquence, to make him willing to reſigne his gouernment, bicauſe he woulde transferre it to the handes of the children of his ſiſter Ariſtomachē. Others ſeemed to be offended, for that the ATHENIANS hauing comen before into

A Sicilia with a great armie, both by ſea and land, they were all loſt and caſt away, and could not win the city of Syracvsa: & that now by one only Sophiſter, they vtterly deſtroyed and ouerthrewe the Empire of Dionyſius, perſwading him to diſcharge the ten thowſand ſouldiers he had about him for his garde, to forſake the foure hundred gallies, the ten thowſand horſemen, and as many moe footemen, to goe to the Academy to ſeeke an vnknowen happines neuer heard of before, and to make him happy by Geometry, reſigning his preſent happines and felicitie to be a great Lord, to haue money at will, and to liue pleaſauntlie, vnto Dion and his Neuewes. By ſuch like accuſations and wicked tongues, Dionyſius began firſt to miſtruſt Dion, and afterwardes to be openly offended with him, and to frowne vpon him. In the meane time they brought letters Dion wrote ſecretlie vnto the Gouernors of the citie of Carthage, wil- Dions letters vnto Carthage.
B ling them that when they would make peace with Dionyſius, they ſhoulde not talke with him vnleſſe he ſtoode by: aſſuring them that he would helpe them to ſet things in quietnes, & that all ſhould be well againe. When Dionyſius had red theſe letters with Philiſtus, & had taken his aduiſe & counſel what he ſhould do, as Timæus ſaid: he deceiued Dion vnder pretence of recõciliaciõ, making as though he ment him no hurt, & ſaying that he would become frends again with him. So he brought Dion one day to the ſea ſide vnder his caſtell, and ſhewed him theſe letters, burdening him to haue practiſed with the Carthaginians againſt him. And as Dion went about to make him anſwere, to cleere himſelf: Dionyſius would not heare him, but cauſed him to be taken vp as he was, and put into a pinnaſe, & commaunded the mariners to ſet him a lande vpon the coaſt of Italie. After this was done, and that it was knowen abroad in the Dion ſent away by Dionyſius into Italie.
C citie, euerie man thought it a cruell parte of Dionyſius: inſomuche that the tyrans pallace was in a maruelous pecke of troubles, for the great ſorowe the women made for the departure of Dion. Moreouer, the citie ſelfe of Syracvsa began to looke about them, looking for ſome ſodaine great chaunge & innouation, for the tumult & vprore that would happen by meanes of Dions baniſhment, and for the miſtruſt alſo that all men would haue of Dionyſius. Dionyſius conſidering this, and being affrayed of ſome misfortune, he gaue his frendes and the women of his pallace comfortable words, telling them that he had not baniſhed him, but was contented that he ſhould abſent him ſelfe for a time: being affrayed, that in his ſodaine angry moodes he might peraduenture be compelled to do him ſome worſe turne if he remained, bicauſe of his obſtinacie and ſelfewill. Furthermore, he gaue vnto Dions frends two ſhippes, to carie as D much goodes, money, and as many of Dions ſeruauntes as they woulde, and to conuey them vnto him vnto Peloponnesvs. Dion was a maruelous rich man, & for the pompe of his ſer- Dions wealth.
uice, and ſumptuous moueables of his houſe, they were like vnto the perſon of a tyrant. All theſe riches Dions frendes brought abord vpon thoſe ſhippes, and caried them vnto him, beſides many other rich gifts, which the women and his frends ſent vnto him. So that by meanes of his great riches, Dion was marueloulſie eſteemed among the Græcians: who by the riches of a baniſhed citizen, coniectured what the power of a tyranne might be. But now concerning Plato: when Dion was exiled, Dionyſius cauſed him to be lodged in his caſtell, and by this meanes craftilie placed, vnder cloke of frendſhippe, an honorable garde about him; bicauſe he ſhoulde not returne into Græce to ſeeke Dion, to tell him of the iniurie he had done E vnto him. Howbeit Dionyſius often frequenting his companie, (as a wilde beaſt is made tame by companie of man) he liked his talke ſo well, that he became in loue with him, but it was a tyrannicall loue. For he woulde haue Plato to loue none but him, and that he ſhoulde eſteeme him aboue all men liuing, being readie to put the whole realme into his handes, and all his forces: ſo that he woulde thinke better of him, then of Dion. Thus was this paſſionate affection of Dionyſius grieuous vnto Plato. For he was ſo drowned with the loue of him, as men extreamelie gealous of the women they loue: that in a moment he woulde ſodainly fall out with him, and ſtraight againe become frendes, and pray him to pardon him. And to ſay truelie, he had a maruelous deſire to heare Platoes Philoſophie: but on the other ſide, he reuerenced them that did diſſwade him from it, and told him that he woulde ſpoyle him ſelfe, F if he entred ouerdeepelie into it. In the meane time fell out warre, and thereupon he ſent Plato againe away, promiſing him that the next ſpring he woulde ſende for Dion home. But he brake promiſe therein, and yet ſent him his reuenues: and prayed Plato to pardon him, Dionyſius ſent Plato from him.

though he had not kept promiſe at his time appointed. For he alleaged the warre was the cauſe, and that ſo ſoone as he had ended his warre, he woulde ſende for Dion: whome in the meane time he prayed to haue pacience and not to attempt any ſturre or alteracion againſt him, nor to ſpeake euill of him among the GRÆCIANS. This Plato ſought to bring to paſſe, and brought Dion to ſtudie Philoſophie, and kept him in the Academy at ATHENS. Dion lay in the citie of ATHENS with one Callippus, whome he had knowen of long time, howbeit he bought him a houſe in the contrie, to lye there ſometime for his pleaſure, the which he gaue afterwards (at his returne into SICILIA) vnto Speuſippus that kept him company, and was continually with him, more then with any other frend he had in ATHENS, through Platoes counſell: who to ſoften and recreate Dions maners, gaue him the company of ſome pleaſaunt conceited man, knowing that this Speuſippus coulde modeſtlie obſerue time and place to be pleaſaunt and merie: for which reſpect, Timon in his Satyricall ieaſts, calleth Speuſippus a good ieaſter. Nowe Plato him ſelfe hauing vndertaken to defray the charges of common playes in the dauncings of young children: Dion tooke the paines to teache and exerciſe them, and moreouer was him ſelfe at the whole charge of theſe playes, Plato ſuffering him to beſtowe that liberality and curteſie vpon the ATHENIANS: the which wanne Dion a great deale more good will, then Plato honor. Dion kept not ſtill at ATHENS, but went alſo to ſee the other good cities of GRÆCE, paſſing his time away. He being at common feaſtes and aſſemblies with the chiefeſt men, and beſt learned in matters of ſtate and gouernment, & neuer ſhewing any light partes, nor ſigne of tyrannicall pride in his maner of life, nor of a man that had bene brought vp with all pompe and pleaſure, but like a graue vertuous man, and well ſtudied in Philoſophie, whereby he grew to be generallie beloued and eſteemed of all men: the cities graunted him publike honors, and ſent him decrees of his glorie, made in their counſells & aſſemblies. Furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS made him a SPARTAN & burges of the city, not paſſing for Dionyſius diſpleaſure, though at that time he had geuen them great aide, in the warre they made againſt the THEBANS. Some report, that Dion on a time was intreated by Pædorus MEGARIAN, to come and ſee him at his houſe: and Dion went thither. This Pædorus was a marueilous great rich man, & therefore Dion ſeeing a great number of people ſtanding at his gates, and that it was a hard thing to come and ſpeake with him he had ſuch great buſines: he turned vnto his frends that did accompanie him, who were angrie they made him tarie ſo long at the gate, and ſayd vnto them: what cauſe haue we to thinke euill of him, ſith we did the like when we were at SYRACVSA? But Dionyſius being incenſed with enuie againſt him, and fearing the good will the GRÆCIANS bare him: he kept backe his reuenue, and would no more ſende it him, and ſeaſed all his goodes, the which he gaue to his receiuers to keepe. Furthermore, bicauſe he woulde cleere him ſelfe of the infamie he had gotten amongeſt the Philoſophers for Platoes ſake, he ſent for diuers wiſe and learned men, and vainly coueting to excell them all in wiſedome, he was driuen improperlie, and out of time, to alleage many wiſe ſayinges he had learned of Plato. Thereuppon he beganne againe to wiſh for him, and to condemne him ſelfe, for that he had no wit to vſe him well when he had him at his commaundement, and that he had not heard ſo muche as he ſhould haue done of him: and like a tyranne as he was, madlie caried away with light deſires, and eaſilie chaunging minde from time to time, a ſodaine vehement deſire tooke him in the heade, to haue Plato againe. So he ſought all the meanes and waies he could deuiſe, to pray Archytas the Pythagorian Philoſopher to tel him, that he might boldly come, and to be his ſurety vnto him for that he would promiſe him: for firſt of all, they were acquainted together by his meanes. Therefore Archytas ſent thither Archidamus the Philoſopher. Dionyſius alſo ſent certeine gallies, and ſome of his frendes thither, to pray Plato to come to him: and he him ſelfe wrote ſpeciallie, and plainly, that it ſhould not goe well with Dion, if Plato came not into SICILIA: but if he woulde be perſwaded to come, that then he would doe what he would haue him. Many letters and requeſts came vnto Dion from his wife and ſiſter, inſomuche as Dion ſo vſed the matter, that Plato obeyed Dionyſius, without making any excuſe at all. So Plato wryteth him ſelfe, that he was driuen to come againe the third time into the ſtraight of SICILIA:

Now

A Nowe Plato being arriued in SICILIA, he made Dionyſius a great ioyfull man, and filled all SICILIA againe with great good hope: for they were all verie deſirous, and did what they could, to make Plato ouercome Philiſtus and the tyrannie, with his Philoſophie. The women of Dionyſius Court did entertaine Plato the beſt they could: but aboue all, Dionyſius ſeemed to haue a maruelous truſt and affiance in him, and more then in any other of all his frendes. For he ſuffred Plato to come to him without ſearching of him, and oftentimes offred to geue him a great ſumme of money: but Plato would take none of it. Therefore Ariſtippus CYRENIAN being at that time in the tyrannes Court in SICILIA, ſayd that Dionyſius beſtowed his liberalitie ſurelie. For, to vs that aske much he geueth litle, and much vnto Plato that requireth nothing. After Dionyſius had geuen Plato his welcome, he beganne to moue him againe of Dion. Ariſtippus ſaying of Dionyſius.

B Dionyſius on the other ſide, at the firſt did vſe him with fine delayes, but afterwards he ſhewed him ſelfe angrie in deede: and at length fell out with Plato, but yet ſo couertlie, that others ſaw it not. For Dionyſius diſſembled that, and otherwiſe in all other things he did him as much honor as he could deuiſe, practiſing thereby to make him to forſake Dions frendſhippe. Now Plato found him at the firſt, that there was no truſt to be geuen to his wordes, and that all were but lyes and deuiſes he either ſayd or did: howebeit he kept it to him ſelfe, and euer paciently bare all things, hoping for the beſt, and made as though he beleued him. They two thus finelie diſſembling with eache other, thinking to deceiue all men, and that none ſhoulde vnderſtande their ſecrets: Helycon CYZICENIAN, one of Platoes frendes, did prognoſticate the eclipſe of the ſunne. The ſame falling out as he had prognoſticated, the tyran eſteemed mar- Helycon a Mathematician.

C uelouſly of him, and gaue him a ſiluer talent for his labor. Then Ariſtippus ſporting with other Philoſophers, ſayd he could tell them of a ſtraunger thing to happen then that. So when they prayed him to tell them what it was: I do prognoſticate, ſayd he, that Plato and Dionyſius will be enemies ere it be long. In thend it came to paſſe, that Dionyſius made porte ſale of all Dions goodes, and kept the money to him ſelfe, and lodged Plato that before lay the next Court to his pallace, among the ſouldiers of his gard, whom he knewe maliced him of long time, and ſought to kill him: bicauſe he did perſwade Dionyſius to leaue his tyranny and to liue without his gard. Plato being in this inſtant daunger, Archytas ſent Ambaſſadors foorthwith vnto Dio- Ariſtippus diuination. Architas requireth Plato of Dionyſius.

D nyſius, in a galley of thirtie owers, to demaund Plato againe: declaring that Plato came againe to SYRACVSA, vppon his worde and caution. Dionyſius to excuſe him ſelfe, and to ſhewe that he was not angrie with him at his departure from him: he made him all the great cheere and feaſtes he coulde, and ſo ſent him home with great ſhewes of good will. One day among the reſt, he ſayd vnto Plato: I am affrayed Plato, ſayd he, that thou wilt ſpeake euill of me, when thou art among thy frendes and companions in the Academy. Then Plato ſmiling, aunſwered him againe: the goddes forbidde that they ſhoulde haue ſuche ſcarcetie of matter in the Academy, as that they muſt needes talke of thee. Thus was Platoes returne, as it is reported, although that which he him ſelfe wryteth agreeth not much with this reporte. Theſe things went to Dions harte, ſo that ſhortly after he ſhewed him ſelfe an open enemie vnto Dionyſius, but ſpecially when he heard how he had handled his wife. Plato vnder couert words, ſent Dio- nyſius worde of it by his letters. And thus it was. After Dion was exiled Dionyſius returning Dionyſius maried Dions wife to an other man.

E Plato backe againe, he willed him ſecretlie to feele Dions minde, whether he woulde not be angrie that his wife ſhould be maried to an other man: bicauſe there ranne a rumor abroade (whether it were true, or inuented by Dions enemies) that he liked not his mariage, and coulde not liue quietlie with his wife. Therefore when Plato was at ATHENS, and had tolde Dion of all thinges, he wrote a letter vnto Dionyſius the tyranne, and did ſette all other thinges downe ſo plainelie, that euerie man might vnderſtande him, but this one thing only ſo darkelie, that he alone, and none other coulde vnderſtande him, but him to whom he had wrytten: declaring vnto him, that he had ſpoken with Dion about the matter he wote of, and that he did lette him vnderſtande he woulde be maruelous angrie, if Dionyſius did it. So at that time, bicauſe there was great hope of reconciliacion betwene them, the tyranne did no-

F thing latelie touching his ſiſter, but ſuffered her ſtill to remaine with Dions ſonne. But when they were ſo farre out, that there was no more hope to returne in fauour againe, and that he had alſo ſent home Plato in diſgtace and diſpleaſure: then he maried his ſiſter Aretè

(Dions wife) against her will, vnto one of his frends called Timocrates, not following therin his fathers iustice and lenitie. For Polyxenus that had maried his fathers sister Thesta, being also become his enemie: he fled out of SICILIA. Dionysius the elder sent for his sister Thesta, and tooke her vp verie sharpely, for that she knowing her husbande would flie, she did not come and tell him of it. Thesta noblie aunswered him againe, and neuer was affrayed nor abashed: why, Dionysius, doest thou thinke me a woman so faint harted and beastlie, that if I had knowen my husband would haue gone his way, and left me: that I would not haue taken the sea with him, and both haue runne one fortune together? Truely I knew not of his departure till he was gone: for it had bene more for mine honor to haue bene called the wife of the banished Polyxenus, then the sister of thee a tyran. Dionysius maruelled to heare his sister speake thus boldly, and the SYRACVSANS wondred at her noble corage: insomuch that when the tyrannie was vtterly destroyed, they did not refuse to doe her all the honor they could deuise, as vnto a Queene. And when she was deade also, all the citizens of SYRACVSA by a common decree, did accompanie her bodie at her buriall. This litle digression from our historie, is not altogether vnprofitable. But now againe to our matter. Dion from thenceforth disposed him selfe altogether vnto warre, against Platoes counsell and aduise: who did his best endeuour to dissuade him from it, both for the respect of Dionysius good enterteinment he had geuen him, as also for that Dion was of great yeares. Howbeit on the other side, Speusippus, and his other frendes did prouoke him vnto it, and did perswade him to deliuer SICILIA from the slauerie and bondage of the tyran, the which helde vp her handes vnto him, and woulde receiue him with great loue and good will. For whileſt Plato lay at SYRACVSA, Speusippus keeping the citizens companie more then Plato did, he knew their minds better then he. For at the first they were affrayed to open them selues vnto him, and frankelie to speake what they thought, mistrusting he was a spie vnto the tyran, sent amongest them to feele their mindes: but within a short time they beganne to trust him, and were all of one minde, for they prayed and perswaded Dion to come, and not to care otherwise for bringing of shippes, souldiers, nor horses with him, but onely to hyre a shippe, and to lend the SICILIANS his bodie and name against Dionysius. Speusippus reporting these newes vnto Dion, did put him in good hart againe: wherupon he began secretly to leauie men by other mens meanes, to hide his purpose and intent. The Philosophers doe set forward Dions warres. Many citizens dealing in the affaires of the common wealth did aide him, and diuers of them also that onely gaue their mindes to the studie of Philosophie: and among them, Eudemus CYPRIAN (on whose death Aristotle wrote his dialogue of the soule) and Timonides LEVCADIAN went with him. Furthermore, there ioyned also with him Miltas THESSALIAN, a Soothsayer, and that had bene his companion in studie in the Academy. Nowe of all them whom the tyran had banished, (which were no lesse then a thowsande persons) there were but onely fiue and twentie that durst accompanie him in this warre. For all the other were suche dastardes, that they forsooke him, and durst not goe with him. The place where they appointed to meete, was the Ile of ZACYNTHE, where they leauied all their souldiers, that were not aboue eight hundred in all, but all of them braue souldiers, and valliant men, and excellentlie well trained in warres: and to conclude, such lustie men, as would incorage all the armie Dion hoped of at his ariuall in SICILE, to fight like valliant men with them. These hyered souldiers, the first time that they vnderstoode it was to go into SICILIA, to make warre with Dionysius: they were amased at the first, and misliked the iorney, bicause it was vndertaken rather of malice and spite that Dion had to be reuenged, then otherwise of any good cause or quarrell, who hauing no better hope, tooke vppon him desperate and impossible enterprises. Therefore the souldiers were offended with their Captaines that had pressed them, bicause they had not told them of this warre before. But after that Dion by a notable Oration had told them, how tyrannies haue euill fundacions, & are subiect vnto ruine, & that he led them not into SICILIA so much for souldiers, as he did to make thē Captaines of the SYRACVSANS, & the other SICILIANS, who of long time desired nothing more then occasion to rise. And, when after him also Alcimenes, (a cōpanion with him in this warre, and the chiefest man of all the ACHAIANS, both for nobility & estimacion) did speake vnto them in like maner, then they were all contented to goe whether they would lead

A lead them. It was then in the hart of ſommer, and the wind blew called the GRÆCIAN wind, the Moone being at the full, and Dion hauing prepared to make a ſumptuous ſacrifice vnto the god Apollo, he led all his men armed with white corſelets in proceſſion into the temple: and after the ſacrifice done, he made them a feaſt in the parke or ſhewe place of the ZACYNTHIANS. There the tables were layed, and the ſouldiers wondred to ſee the great ſtate & magnificence of the great number of pots of gold and ſiluer, and ſuch other furniture and preparation, as paſſed a priuate mans wealth: then they thought with them ſelues, that a man being ſo olde, and Lord of ſo great a good, would not attempt things of ſuch daunger, without good ground, and great aſſurance of his friends ayde & helpe. But after his oblations of wine, and common prayers made to the gods at feaſts: ſodainly the Moone eclipſed. Dion thought Dions ſumptuous fare in feaſting.

The eclipſe of the Moone, and cauſe of the eclipſe.

B it not ſtraunge to ſee an eclipſe, conſidering the reuolutions of the eclipſes, and knowing very well it is a ſhadowe that falleth vpon the body of the Moone, bicauſe of the direct interpoſition of the earth betwixt her and the Sunne. But bicauſe the ſouldiers that were affrayd and aſtonied withall, ſtoode in neede of ſome comfort and encoragement: Miltas the Soothſayer ſtanding vp in the middeſt amongeſt them, ſayd vnto them. My fellowe ſouldiers, be of good cheere, and aſſure your ſelues that we ſhall proſper: for God doth foreſhewe vs by this ſight we ſee, that ſome one of the chiefeſt thinges nowe in higheſt place and dignitie ſhall be eclipſed. And at this preſent time what thing carieth greater glory and fame, than the tyrannie of Dionyſius? Therefore you muſt thinke, that ſo ſoone as you arriue in SICILIA, your ſelues ſhall put out his light and glory. This interpretacion of the eclipſe of the Moone, did

C Miltas the Soothſayer make, before all the whole companye. But touching the ſwarme of bees that lighted on the poope of Dions ſhippe, he told him, and his friends priuately: that he was affrayd his acts which ſhould fall out famous and glorious, ſhould laſt but a while, & floriſhing a few dayes, would ſtraight cõſume away. It is reported alſo, that Dionyſius in like manner had many ſtraunge ſignes and wonderfull tokens from aboue. Among others, there came an Eagle that ſnatched the partiſan out of the ſouldiers handes, and caried it quite away with her, and then let it fall into the ſea. The ſea alſo beating againſt the walls of the caſtell, was as ſweete to drinke a whole day together, as any conduite or running water: as thoſe that taſted of it, found it true. Furthermore, a ſowe farrowed pygges that lacked no parts of the body, but onely their eares. This the Soothſayers ſayd did ſignifie rebellion, and diſobedience of his

D ſubiects: & that the Citizens would no more heare him, nor obey his tyranny. Furthermore, they told alſo, that the ſweetenes of the ſalt water prognoſticated to the SYRACVSANS, chaſig of cruell and euill time, vnto good and ciuil gouernment: and that the Eagle, Iupiters miniſter, and the partiſan, the marke and token of the kingdom and Empire, did betoken that Iupiter the chiefe of all gods had determined to deſtroy and put downe the tyranny. Theopompus reporteth this matter thus. So Dions ſouldiers were imbarked into two great ſhippes of burden, and another third ſhippe that was not very great, and two pynnaſes with thirtye owers followed them. For their armor and weapon, beſide thoſe the ſouldiers had: he caried two thowſand targets, a great number of bowes and arrowes, of darts, of pykes, and plenty of vittells: that they ſhould lacke nothing all the time they were vpon the ſea, conſidering that

E their iorney ſtoode altogether at the curteſie of the windes and ſea, and for that they were affrayd to lande, vnderſtanding that Philiſtus roade at anker in the coaſt of APVLGLIA, with a fleete of ſhippes that lay in wayte for their comming. So hauing a pleaſant gale of wind, they ſayled the ſpace of twelue dayes together, and the thirtene day they came to the foreland of SICILIA called Pachynus. There the Pilot thought it beſt they ſhould land preſently: for if they willingly looſed into the ſea, and loſt that poynt, they were ſure they ſhould loſe alſo many nights and dayes in vaine in the middeſt of the ſea, being then ſommer time, and the wind at the South. But Dion being affrayd to land ſo neare his enemies, he was deſirous to goe further, and ſo paſt by the foreland of Pachynus. Then the Northwind roſe ſo bigge and great,

A tempeſt on the ſea againſt Dion.

F ligthning and thunder mingled withall (bicauſe it was at that time when the ſtarre Arcturus beginneth to ſhewe) it made ſo terrible a tempeſt, and powred downe ſuch a ſore ſhower of rayne vpon them, that all the Mariners were amazed withall, and knew not whether the wind would driue them: till that ſodainly they ſaw the ſtorme had caſt them vpon the Ile of Cercina, (which is on the coaſt of Libya) and ſpecially where it is moſt daungerous to arriue for the rocks, for their ſhippes were like to haue runne vpon them, and to haue made ſhippe-wracke. But with much a doe they bare of the ſhippes with their great longe poles, and wandred vp and downe the ſea, not knowing whether they went, vntill the ſtorme ceaſed. Then they met a ſhippe, whereby they knew that they were in the flat, which the Marriners call the heads of the great Syrte. Thus they wandring vp and downe, being maruelous angry that the ſea was calme, there roſe a litle South wind from the land, although they leaſt looked for any ſuch wind at that time, and litle thinking it would ſo haue chaunged: but ſeeing the wind riſe bigger and bigger, they packed on all the ſayles they had, and making their prayers vnto the gods they croſſed the ſea, and ſayled from the coaſt of Libia, directly vnto Sicile, and had the winde ſo lucky, that at the fift daye they were neare vnto a litle village of Sicilia, called Minoa, the which was ſubiect to the Carthaginians. Synalus Carthaginian, being at that time Captaine and gouernor of the towne of Minoa, and Dions friende, was there by chaunce at that preſent, who being ignorant of his enterpriſe & comming, did what he could to keepe Dions ſouldiers from landing. But they notwithſtanding ſodainly lept a land armed, but ſlue no man. For Dion had commaunded them the contrary, for the friendſhip he bare the Captaine: and they following the townes men hard that fled before them, entred the towne, hand ouer head amongeſt them, and ſo wanne the market place. When both the Captaines met, and that they had ſpoken together, Dion redeliuered the towne into Synalus hands again, without any hurt or violence offred him. Synalus on the other ſide did indeuor him ſelfe all he could to make much of the ſouldiers, and holpe Dion to prouide him of all things neceſſary. But this did moſt of all encorage the ſouldiers, bicauſe Dionyſius at their arriuall, was not then in Sicilia: for it chaunced ſo, that not many dayes before he went into Italy, with foure ſcore ſayle. Therefore when Dion willed them to remayne there a fewe dayes to refreſh them ſelues, bicauſe they had bene ſo ſore ſea beaten a long time together: they them ſelues would not, they were ſo glad to imbrace the occaſion offred them, and prayed Dion to leade them forthwith to Syracvsa. Dion leauing all his ſuperfluous armor and prouiſion in the hands of Synalus, and praying him to ſende them to him when time ſerued: he tooke his way towardes Syracvsa. So by the way, two hundred horſemen of the Agrigentines, which dwell in that part called Ecnomvs, came firſt to ioyne with him, and after them, the Geloians. The rumor of their comming ranne ſtraight to Syracvsa. Thereuppon Timocrates that had maried Aretè, Dions wife, and Dionyſius the fathers ſiſter, and vnto whom Dionyſius the yonger had left the charge and gouernment of all his men and friends in the citie: he preſently diſpatched a poſt with letters, to aduertiſe Dionyſius of Dions comming. He him ſelfe alſo in the meane time had taken ſuch order, that there roſe no tumult nor mutinie in the citie, though they all of them lacked no good will to rebell: but bicauſe they were vncerteine whether this rumor was true or falſe, being affrayd, euery man was quiet. Now there chaunced a ſtraunge misfortune vnto the Meſſenger, that caried the letters vnto Dionyſius. For after he had paſſed the ſtraight, and that he was arriued in the citie of Rheggio of Italyes ſide, making haſte to come to the citie of Cavlonia, where Dionyſius was: he met by the way one of his acquaintance that caried a mutton but newly ſacrificed. This good fellow gaue him a peece of it, and the Meſſenger ſpurred away with all the ſpeede he could poſſible. But when he had ridden the moſt part of the night, he was ſo weary and drowſie for lacke of ſleepe, that he was driuen to lye downe. So he lay downe vpon the ground, in a wodde hard by the high way. The ſauor of this fleſhe brought a woulfe to him, that caried away the fleſhe and the portmantew it was wrapt in, and in the which alſo were his letters of aduertiſement, which he caried vnto Dionyſius. When he awoke out of his ſleepe, and ſaw that his portmantew was gone: he enquired for it, and went wandring vppe and downe a long time to ſeeke it: howbeit all in vaine, for he could neuer find it. Therefore he thought it was not good for him to goe to the tyranne without his letters, but rather to flie into ſome vnknowen place where no body knew him. Thus ouerlate receiued Dionyſius aduertiſement by others of this warre, which Dion made in Sicilia. In the meane time, the Camarinians came and ioyned with Dions army, in the highe way

A woulfe caried away the Meſſengers portmanteau.

A way towards SYRACVSA: and ſtill there came vnto him alſo a great number of the SYRACVSANS that were vppe in armes, which were gotten into the field. On the other ſide, certaine CAMPANIANS and LEONTINES, which were gotten into the caſtell of EPIPOLES with Timocrates, of purpoſe to keepe it: Vpon a falſe rumor Dion gaue out (and which came vnto them) that he would firſt goe againſt their townes: they forſooke Timocrates, and went to take order to defend their owne goods. Dion vnderſtanding that, being lodged with his armie in a place called MACRÆ: he preſently remoued his campe being darke night, and marched forward till he came vnto the riuer of Anapus, which is not from the citie aboue tenne furlongs of: and there ſtaying a while, he ſacrificed vnto the riuer, and made his prayer, and worſhipped the riſing of the Sunne. At the ſelfe ſame inſtant alſo, the Soothſayers came and told him, that B the gods did promiſe him aſſured victorie. And the ſouldiers alſo ſeeing Dion weare a garland of flowers on his head, which he had taken for the ceremonie of the ſacrifice: all of them with one ſelfe good will, tooke euery man one of them, (beeing no leſſe then fiue thowſande men that were gathered together by the way, and but ſlenderly armed with ſuch thinges as came firſt to hand, howbeit ſupplying with good will their want of better furniture and armor) and when Dion commaunded them to marche, for ioy they ranne, and incoraged one another with great cryes, to ſhew them ſelues valliant for recouerye of their libertie. Nowe for them that were within the citie ſelf of SYRACVSA, the noble men & chief Citizens went to receiue them at the gates in their beſt gownes. The common people on the other ſide ranne and ſet vpon them that tooke part with the tyranne, and ſpoyled them that were called the PROSA- C GOGIDES (as much to ſay, the common Promoters of men) the deteſtableſt villaines, hateful to the gods and men. For they like Sicophants and buſie tale bearers, would iet vp and downe the citie, and mingle amonge the Citizens, hauing an oer in euery mans matter, being full of prittle prattle, and buſie headed, to know what euery man ſayd and did, and then to goe cary it to the tyranne. Theſe men were they that had their payment firſt of all, for they killed them with dry blowes, beating them to death with ſtaues. When Timocrates could not enter into the caſtell with them that kept it, he tooke his horſe backe, and fled out of the citie, and flying made all men affrayd and amaſed where he came, enlarging Dions power by his report, bicauſe it ſhould not ſeeme that for feare of a triſle, he had forſaken the citie. In the meane time, Dion came on towards the citie with his men, and was come ſo neare, that they might ſee him D plainly from the citie, marching foremoſt of all, armed with a fayer bright white corſelet, hauing his brother Megacles on his right hande of him, & Callippus ATHENIAN on the left hand, crowned with garlands of flowers: and after him alſo there followed a hundred ſouldiers that were ſtraungers, choſen for his gard about him, and the reſt came marching after in good order of battel, being led by their Captaines. The SYRACVSANS ſaw him comming, and went out and receiued him as a holy and bleſſed proceſſion, that brought them their libertie & popular ſtate againe, the which they had loſt the ſpace of eight and fortye yeares. When Dion was come into the citie by the gate called Menitide, he cauſed his trompetter ſownd to appeaſe the rumor and tumult of the people. Then he commaunded a Herawld to proclayme alowd, that Dion and Megacles, who were come to put downe the tyranny, did ſet all the SYRA- E CVSANS at libertie, and all the other SICILIANS alſo, from the bondage and ſubiection of the tyranne: and bicauſe Dion him ſelfe was deſirous to ſpeake vnto the people, he went to the vpper part of the towne called ACRADINA. The SYRACVSANS all the ſtreetes thorough as he paſſed by, had on either hand of him prepared ſacrifices, and ſet vp tables, and cuppes vppon them: and as he paſſed by their houſes, they caſt flowers and frutes on him, and made prayers vnto him, as if he had bene a god. Now vnder the caſtell there was a place called Pentapyla, a clocke to know by the Sunne how the day went, the which Dionyſius had cauſed to be made, and it was of a good prety height. Dion got vp vpon it, and from thence made his oration to the people that were gathered round about him, exhorting and perſwading his contrymen to doe their endeuor to recouer their libertie againe, and to mainteyne it. They being in a F maruelous ioy withall, and deſirous to pleaſe Dion: did chooſe him and his brother Megacles their Lieuetenants generall, with abſolute power and authoritie. Afterwards alſo, by the conſent of Dion him ſelfe and his brother, and at their requeſtes in like manner, they choſe twenty other Captaines, of the which the moſt part of them had bene baniſhed by the tyran, and were returned againe with Dion. The Soothſayers and Prognoſticators liked it well, and ſayd it was a good ſigne for Dion, that he trode that ſumptuous building and workemanſhip of the tyranne vnder his feete, when he made his oration: but bicauſe the hande of the diall did ſhewe the courſe of the Sunne, which neuer leaueth going, vpon the which he got vppe when he was choſen Lieuetenant generall with abſolute power and authoritie: they were affrayd againe, that it was a ſigne Dions affayres ſhould haue a ſodaine chaunge of fortune. After this, Dion hauing taken the caſtell of EPIPOLES, he ſet all the Citizens at libertie which were kept there as priſoners in captiuitie by the tyranne, and enuyroned the caſtell round about with a wall. Within ſeuen dayes after, Dionyſius returned by ſea to the caſtell of SYRACVSA, and therewithall alſo came the carts loden with armor and weapon to SYRACVSA, the which Dion had left with Synalus: the which Dion cauſed to be diſtributed amonge the Citizens of SYRACVSA that had none. Others did furniſhe them ſelues as well as they could, and ſhewed that they had corage and good will to fight for the maintenance and defence of their libertie. In the meane time, Dionyſius ſent Ambaſſadors, firſt vnto Dion priuately, to ſee if he would yeld to any compoſition. But Dion would not heare them, but bad them tell the SYRACVSANS openly what they had to ſay, being men that were free, and enioyed libertie. Then the Ambaſſadors ſpake in the behalfe of the tyranne, vnto the people of SYRACVSA, promiſing them with mild and gentle wordes, that they ſhould paye no more ſubſedies and taxes, but very litle, and ſhould be no more troubled with warres, other then ſuch as they them ſelues ſhould like of. The SYRACVSANS made a mockery at thoſe offers, and Dion alſo aunſwered the Ambaſſadors, and willed Dionyſius to ſend no more to the SYRACVSANS, before he had diſpoſſeſt him ſelfe of his tyranny: & ſo that he would leaue it, he would be his meane to obtayne all things iuſt and reaſonable of the people. Dionyſius liked very well of this good offer, and therefore ſent his Ambaſſadors againe to praye the SYRACVSANS that they would appoynte ſome amongeſt them to come to the caſtell, to talke with him for the benefit and commoditie of the common wealth, that he might heare what they would alleage, and they alſo what aunſwer he would make. Dion choſe certaine whome he ſent vnto him. Now there ranne a rumor in the citie amonge the SYRACVSANS, which came from the caſtell: that Dionyſius would willingly of him ſelfe, rather then by reaſon of Dions comming, depoſe him ſelfe of the tyrannie. But this was but a falſe alarom, and crafty fetche of Dionyſius, to intrappe the SYRACVSANS by. For thoſe that were ſent him from the citie, he kept them priſoners euery man of them: and one morning hauing made his ſouldiers drinke wine luſtely, which he kept in pay to gard his perſon, he ſent them with great furie to aſſault the wall the SYRACVSANS had built againſt the caſtell. Nowe, bicauſe the SYRACVSANS looked for nothing leſſe then for the ſodaine aſſault, and for that theſe barbarous people with a wonderfull corage & great tumult ouerthrew the wal, and others of them alſo did ſet vpon the SYRACVSANS: there was not a man of them that durſt make head to fight with them, ſauing the ſouldiers that were ſtraungers, whome Dion had brought with him. Who, when they heard the noyſe, ranne ſtraight to repulſe them, and yet they them ſelues could not well tell what they ſhould doe vpon that ſodaine. For they could heare nothing, for the great noyſe and hurly burley of the SYRACVSANS which fled with great diſorder, and came and mingled them ſelues amongeſt them. Til at length, Dion perceiuing he could not be heard, to ſhew them by deede what they ſhould doe: he went firſt him ſelfe againſt theſe barbarous people, and about him there was a cruell and bloody fight. For his enemies knewe him as well as his owne men, and they all ranne vpon him with great cryes. Now for Dion him ſelfe, in deede bicauſe of his age, he was heauier then was requiſite for one that ſhould away with the paynes of ſuch battells: but he had ſuch a valliant corage in him, that he went thorough withall luſtely, and ſlue them that did aſſaile him. Yet he had his hand alſo thruſt thorough with a pyke, and very hardly did his curaces holde out the blowes of the darts and thruſts by hande which he receiued on them; they were ſo mangled and hacked with ſuch a number of darts and pykes paſſed thorough his ſhield and broken on him, that in the ende he was beaten downe: howbeit his ſouldiers reſcued him ſtraight. Then he made Timonides their Captaine, and he him ſelfe tooke his horſe backe,

A backe, and went vp and downe the citie, ſtaying and quieting the flying of the SYRACVSANS. Then he ſent for his ſouldiers the ſtraungers, which he had put in garriſon in that part of the citie called the ACRADINE to keepe it, and brought them being freſhe, againſt the barbarous people of the caſtell that were wearied, and almoſt all of them diſcoraged to attempt any further enterpriſe. For they had made this ſalye out, in hope to haue taken all the citie at the firſt onſet, onely running vp and downe: but when contrary to their expectacion, they met theſe valliant ſouldiers and freſhe ſupply, they then beganne to retyre againe vnto the caſtell. And the GRÆCIAN ſouldiers on the other ſide, perceiuing they gaue backe, they came the faſter vpon them, ſo that they were compelled to turne their backes, and were driuen within their walls, after they had ſlayne three ſcore and foureteene of Dions men, and loſt a great number B of their owne. This was a noble victorie and therefore the SYRACVSANS gaue the ſouldiers that were ſtraungers, an hundred ſiluer Minas, in reward for their good ſeruice: & they gaue Dion their generall, a crowne of gold. After this, there came letters to Dion by a trompet from the caſtell, written from the women of his houſe: and among the packet of letters, there was one of them directed: to my father: the which Hipparinus wrote vnto him. For that was Dions ſonnes name, though Timæus writeth he was called Aretæus, after his mothers name Areta. But in ſuch matters, me thinkes Timonides is better to be credited, becauſe he was his friend and companion in armes. All the other letters that were ſent, were openly red before the aſſembly of the SYRACVSANS, and did only concerne requeſts of theſe women vnto Dion. The SYRACVSANS would not haue the ſuppoſed letter of his ſonne to be openly red: but Dion a-C gainſt their mindes opened it, and found that it was Dionyſius letter, who by wordes, made the direction of it vnto Dion, but in effect, he ſpake vnto the SYRACVSANS. For in ſight, it ſeemed a manner of requeſt and iuſtification of him ſelfe: but in truth, it was written of purpoſe to accuſe Dion. Firſt of all he remembred him of the thinges he had done before, for the eſtabliſhing and preſeruation of the tyrannie: and afterwards of cruell threats againſt thoſe whome he ſhould loue beſt, as his wife, his ſonne and ſiſter: and laſt of all, full of moſt humble requeſts and intreaties with ſorowe and lamentacion. But that which moſt moued Dion of all other was, that he required him not to deſtroye the tyrannye, but rather to take it for him ſelfe, and not to ſet them at libertie that hated him, and would alwayes remember the miſchiefe he had done vnto them: & that he would him ſelfe take vpon him to be Lord, ſauing by that meanes D the liues of his parents and friends. When theſe letters had bene red before the whole aſſembly of the people, the SYRACVSANS thought not how to reuerence (as they ought) with admiration, the inflexible conſtancy and magnanimitie of Dion, that ſtoode firme and faſt for iuſtice and vertue, againſt ſuch vehement intreatie and perſwaſion of his kinſfolke and friends: but they contrarily began to be affrayd, and to miſtruſt him, as he that of neceſſitie ſhould be forced to pardon the tyranne, for the great pledges and oſtages he had of him. Wherefore, they began to chooſe them new gouernors, and the rather, becauſe they heard that Heraclides was comming vnto them, whome they loued ſingularly well. This Heraclides was one of them that had bene baniſhed, a good ſouldier and Captaine, and well eſteemed of for the charge and office he bare vnder the tyrannes: howbeit a very vnconſtant man in euery thing, E & would not continue long in a mind, & leaſt conſtant in warres, where he had great charge of honor in hand. He had fallen out with Dion in PELOPONNESVS, wherefore he determined to come with a power by him ſelfe, and with his owne fleete againſt the tyranne. So he atriued at length at SYRACVSA, with ſeuen gallies, and three other ſhippes, where he found Dionyſius againe ſhut vp into his caſtell with a wall, and the SYRACVSANS alſo to haue the better hand of him. Then he began to curry fauor with the common people all the wayes he could poſſibly deuiſe, hauing by nature a certaine pleaſing manner to winne the common people, which ſeeke nothing els but to be flattered. Furthermore, he found it the eaſier for him to winne them, becauſe the people did already miſlike Dions ſeueritie, as a man too ſeuere and cruell to gouerne a common wealth. For they had now their will ſo much, and were growen F ſo ſtronge headed, becauſe they ſawe them ſelues the ſtronger: that they would be flattered (as commonly the people be in free cities, where they onely be Lordes, and doe rule) before they were fully ſet at libertie. Therefore firſt of all, not being called together by the authoritie of the gouernors: they all ranne in a furye, of their owne light heads, vnto the place of common aſſemblies, and there choſe Heraclides Admirall. Then Dion vnderſtanding this, came to complaine of the iniurie they had done him, declaring vnto them, that to giue this power now vnto Heraclides, was to take that away which they had firſt giuen vnto him: bicauſe he ſhould no more be generall, if they choſe any other Admirall by ſea then him ſelfe. The SYRACVSANS then, as it were againſt their willes, did reuoke the power they had giuen vnto Heraclides: but afterwards Dion ſent for Heraclides, to pray him to come home to him. When he came, he rebuked him a litle, and tolde him that it was not honeſtly, nor profitably done of him, to ſue to the people, & to contend for honor againſt him in ſo daungerous a tyme, when the leaſt occaſion in the world was enough to haue marred all. Afterwards Dion him ſelfe called an aſſembly againe of the citie, and eſtabliſhed Heraclides Admirall: and perſwaded the Citizens to giue him ſouldiers, as he had in deede. Heraclides outwardly ſeemed to honor Dion, and confeſſed openly that he was greatly bound vnto him, and was alway at his heeles very lowly, being ready at his commaundement: but in the meane time, ſecretly he inticed the common people to rebell, & to ſtirre vp thoſe whom he knew meete men to like of chaunge. Whereby he procured Dion ſuch trouble, and brought him into ſuch perplexitie, that he knew not well what way to take. For if he gaue them aduiſe to let Dionyſius quietly come out of the caſtell: then they accuſed him, and ſayd he did it to ſaue his life. If on the other ſide, bicauſe he would not trouble them, he continued ſeege ſtill, and did eſtabliſhe nothing: then they thought he did it of purpoſe to draw out the warres in length, bicauſe he might the lenger time remaine their chiefetaine generall, and ſo to keepe the Citizens lenger in feare. At that time there was one Soſis in SYRACVSA, a man of no name, but noted amonge the SYRACVSANS for his villany and wickednes, eſteeming that full and ample libertie, when he might vnchecked licentiouſly ſpeake what he would, as in deede he did. For he ſeeking to doe Dion a diſpleaſure: firſt of all one day at a common counſel he ſtoode vp on his feete, and called the SYRACVSANS beaſtes, (amongeſt many other vile wordes he gaue them) if they did not perceiue, that being come from a fond and droncken tyrannie, they had nowe receiued a ſober maſter, and a wiſe and ware tyranne. So when he had thus openly ſhewed him ſelfe an enemy vnto Dion, he came no more that daye into the market place: but the next morning he was ſeene ronning vp and downe the citie naked, his head and face all of a gore bloud, as if he had bene followed by men to haue ſlayne him. Thus Soſis comming in this manner into the middeſt of the market place, cryed out, that Dions ſtraungers had lyen in wayte for him, and had handled him in this ſort, ſhewing his wound on his head. Many of the people tooke this matter very grieuouſly, and cried out vpon Dion, and ſayd it was vilely and tyrannically done of him: by feare of murther and daunger, to take away the libertie from the Citizens to ſpeake. Nowe though the whole aſſembly hereuppon fell into an vprore withall, Dion notwithſtanding came thither to cleare him ſelfe of theſe accuſations, and made them preſently ſee, that this Soſis was brother to one of Dionyſius gard: who had put into his head, in this ſort to put the citie of SYRACVSA in an vprore, bicauſe Dionyſius had no other hope nor meanes to eſcape, but by ſtirring vp faction and ſedition amonge them, to make one of them fall out with another. The Surgions were ſent for forthwith to ſearche the wounde of this Soſis: who founde that it was rather a litle ſcratche, then any violent wound giuen him. For the woundes or cuts of a ſword, are euer deepeſt in the middeſt: and Soſis cut was but very litle, and not deepe, hauing had many beginnings, and giuen him (as it ſeemed) at ſundry times, that for very paine, the party that cut him was driuen to leaue of, & ſo came to cut him at diuers times. Furthermore, there came certaine of his friends in the meane time, that brought a raſer before the aſſembly, and reported that as they came, they met Soſis by the way all bloudied: who ſayd, that he fled from Dions ſouldiers, which had but newly hurt him. Whereuppon they preſently followed them, but found no man, and onely they ſaw a raſer, which ſome bodye had caſt vpon a hollow ſtone thereabout, where they firſt ſaw him comming vnto them. Thus Soſis deuiſe had but euill ſucceſſe. For beſide all theſe prooſes and tokens, Dions houſhold ſeruaunts came to be a witnes againſt him: that very earely in the morning he went abroad alone with a raſer in his hand. Then they that before did burden and accuſe Dion, knewe not what to ſay

A the matter, but shroncke away: whereuppon the people condēning Sosis to death, they were quiet againe with Dion. Yet were they alwaies affraid of these souldiers that were straungers, specially when they saw the greatest conflicts they had with the tyranne, was by sea, after that Philistus was come from the coast of Aetolia with a great number of gallies to ayde the tyranne. For then they thought, that these souldiers the straungers being armed at all partes to fight by land, they would do them no more seruice by sea: bicause the Citizens them selues were they that kept them in safetie, for that they were men practised to fight by sea, and were also the stronger by meanes of their ships. But beside all this, the onely thing that made them to be coragious again, was the good fortune they had at the battel by sea, in the which when they had ouercome Philistus, they cruelly and barbarously vsed him. Truely Ephorus saith, that Sosis condemned to death.

Philistus slain

B Philistus slue him selfe, when he sawe his galley taken. Howbeit Timonides (who was alway with Dion from the first beginning of this warre) writing vnto Speusippus the Philosopher, saith that Philistus was taken aliue, bicause his galley ranne a land: and that the Syracvsans first tooke of his curaces, and stripped him naked, and after they had done him all the villanie and spight they could, they cut of his head, and gaue his body vnto boyes, commaunding them to dragge it into that part of the citie called Acradine, and then to cast it into the common priuie. Timæus also to spight him the more, sayth that the boyes tyed the deade bodye by his lame legge, and so dragged him vp and downe the citie, where all the Syracvsans did what villanie to it they could, being glad to see him dragged by the legge, that had sayd Dionysius should not flie from the tyranny vpon a light horse, but that they should pull him out by the C legge against his will. Now Philistus reporteth this matter thus, not as spoken to Dionysius by him selfe, but by some other. But Timæus taking a iust occasion and culler to speake euil of the good will, fidelitie, and care that Philistus had alwayes seemed to shew in the confirmation & defence of the tyrannie: doth liberally bestow iniurious wordes on him in this place. Nowe for them whome he had in deede offended, if they of malice and spight to be reuenged, did offer him crueltie, peraduenture they were not much to be blamed: but for them that since his death haue written the ieasts, who were neuer offended by him in his life time, and who ought to shewe them selues discreete in their writing, me thinkes that if they had regarded their owne credit and estimation, they should not so fondly and outragiously haue reproued the aduersities and misfortunes, which by fortune may as well chaunce to the honestest man, Timæus, and Ephorus the Historiographers reproued.

D as vnto him. Thus fondely doth Ephorus prayse Philistus, who though he haue an excellent fine wit to counterfeate goodly excuses, and cunningly to hide wicked and dishoneſt partes, and eloquently to deuise by honest words to defend an euill cause: yet can not he with all the fiue wits he hath excuse him self, that he hath not bene the onely man of the world that hath most fauored tyrannes, and that hath euer loued, and specially desired power, wealth, and alliance with tyrannes. But he in my opinion taketh the right course of an Historiographer, that nether doth commend Philistus doings, nor yet casteth his aduersities in his teeth to his reproche. After Philistus death, Dionysius sent vnto Dion, to make him an offer to deliuer him the castell, armor, munition, and souldiers that were in it, with money also to paye them for fiue monethes space. For him selfe, he prayed that he might be suffered to goe safely into Ita-

E ly, and to lye there, to take the pleasure of the frutes of the contry called Gyarta, which was within the territorie of Syracvsa, and lyeth out from the sea towardes the mayne land. Dion refused this offer, and aunswered the Ambassadors that they must moue the Syracvsans in it. They supposing they should easily take Dionysius aliue, would not heare the Ambassadors speake, but turned them away. Dionysius seeing no other remedie, left the castell in the handes of his eldest sonne Apollocrates, and hauing a lusty gale of winde, he secretly imbarked certaine of his men he loued best, with the richest thinges he had, and so hoysed sayle, vnwares to Heraclides, the Admirall of Syracvsa. The people were maruelously offended with Heraclides for it, and beganne to mutine against him. But Heraclides, to pacifie this tumult of the all downe before him that ſtoode in his way, he ranne through as much of the citie, as the enemies afterwards wanne of them. This notwithſtanding, the SYRACVSANS making light accompt of all theſe ſignes, they choſe fiue and twenty Captaines, of the which Heraclides was one: and ſecretly they ſent to feele the hiered ſouldiers, to ſee if they could entice them from deſpiſing them for their ſmal number, & bicauſe they did not firſt ſet vpon them, but truſting on the other ſide to them ſelues for that they were the greater number: they came to aſſayle them, ſuppoſing they ſhould eaſily ouercome them in the citie, & kil euery man of them. Dion being thus at a ſtraight, that of neceſſitie he muſt fight againſt his owne contry men, or els be ſlaine him ſelfe with his ſouldiers: he held vp his hands to the SYRACVSANS & very earneſtly praied them to be content, pointing them with his finger to the caſtell that was full of their enemies, which ſhewed them ſelues vpon the wals, & ſaw what they did. In the ende, when he D ſaw that he could not pacifie their furie & tumult, and that all the citie was in an vprore with the prittle prattle of theſe ſeditious people, who like the ſea were caried with the wind: he did yet forbid his ſouldiers to giue any charge vpon them, who notwithſtanding made a coun-

Then the SYRACVSANS durſt not abide by it, but ranne away like ſheepe through the ſtreets, women laughed them to ſcorne: bicauſe they would recouer the ſhame they had loſt, they armed their men a new againe, & did marche after Dion to fight with him, whome they ouertooke at a riuer, as he was ready to paſſe ouer. Then began their horſemen a litle to skirmiſhe E zens with them: & ſent Ambaſſadors alſo vnto the SYRACVSANS, to wil them to let the ſtraū-gers haue their pay. The SYRACVSANS on their ſide alſo, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the LEON-TINES to accuſe Dion. So all their confederats were aſſembled in the citie of the LEONTINES; & in that aſſembly, after both parties had bene heard, to heare what they would ſay: it was iudged that the SYRACVSANS were to blame. Howbeit they would not ſtand to the iudgement of F their confederats, for they were now growen proud & careles, bicauſe they were gouerned by no man, but had Captaines that ſtudied to pleaſe them, & were affraid alſo to diſpleaſe them.

After

A After that, there arriued certain gallies of Dionysius, at SYRACVSA, of the which, Nypsius NEAPOLITAN was captaine: which brought vittels & money, to help thē that were beleged within the castel. These gallies were fought with, & the SYRACVSANS obtained victorie, and tooke foure of the tyrannes gallies with three bancks of owers a peece: howbeit they fondly abused their victorie. For they hauing no body to commaund nor rule them, imployed all their ioy, in ryoting and bancketting, and in fond and dissolute meetings, taking so litle care and regard to their busines, that now when they thought the castel was sure their owne, they almost lost their citie. For Nypsius perceiuing that euery part of the citie was out of order, and that the common people did nothing all day long vnto darke night, but bybbe and drinke drunke, dauncing after their pypes and howboyes, and that the gouernors them selues were very B glad also to see such feasting, or els for that they dissembled it, and durst not commaund and compell them that were droncke: he wisely tooke the occasion offered him, and scaled the wall which had shut vp the castell, and wanne it, and ouerthrewe it. Then he sent the barbarous souldiers into the citie, and commaunded them to doe with them they met, what they would or could. The SYRACVSANS then too late found their fault, and hardly gaue present remedie, they were so amazed and sodainely set on: for in deede they made a right sacke of the citie. Here men were killed, there they ouerthrewe the wall, in another place they caried away women and litle children prisoners into the castell, weeping and crying out: and lastly, they made the Captaines at their wits ende, who could giue no present order, nor haue their men to serue them against their enemies, that came hand ouer head on euery side amongest C them. The citie being thus miserably in garboyle, and the ACRADINE also in great hazard of taking, in the which they put all their hope and confidence to rise againe: euery man thought then with him selfe that Dion must be sent for, but yet no man moued it notwithstanding, being ashamed of their vnthankefulnes and ouergreat folly they had committed, in driuing him away. Yet necessitie inforcing them vnto it, there were certaine of the horsemen and of their confederats that cryed, they must send for Dion, and the PELOPONNESIANS his souldiers, which were with him in the territorie of the LEONTINES. Assoone as the first worde was heard, and that one had the hart to tell it to the people, all the SYRACVSANS cryed out, there was the poynt: and they were so glad of it, that the water stoode in their eyes for ioy, and besought the gods it would please them to bringe him vnto them, they were so D desirous to haue him againe. For they called to minde howe valliant and resolute he was in daunger, and how that he was neuer affrayde, but did encorage them with his manhood in such sort, that being led by him, they were not affrayd to set vpon their enemies. So the confederats for them, sent presently Archonides and Telesides vnto him: and the noble men that serued on horsebacke, they sent him also fiue amongest them, beside Hellanicus. Who tooke their horses, and posted for life, so that they came to the citie of the LEONTINES about Sunne set, and lighting from their horses, they went first of all and kneeled downe at Dions feete, and weeping, tolde him the miserable state of the SYRACVSANS. Straight there came diuers of the LEONTINES, and many of the PELOPONNESIAN souldiers vnto Dion, mistrusting then that there was some newes in hand, to see the earnest and humble sute the Ambas- E sadors of SYRACVSA made vnto him. Wherefore Dion tooke them presently with him, and brought them him selfe vnto the Theater, where the common counsells and assemblies of the citie were holden. Thither ranne euery man to heare what the matter was. Then Archonides and Hellanicus brought in by Dion, tolde openly before the whole assemblie, the greatnes of their miserie, and requested the hyered souldiers to come and ayde the SYRACVSANS, forgetting the iniurie they had receiued: considering that they had more dearely payd for their follye, then they them selues whome they had so iniured, would haue made them to haue suffered. When they had sayd their mindes, there was a great silence through all the Theater: and then Dion rose vp, and beganne to speake. But the great teares that fell from his eyes would not suffer him to speake: wherefore the hyered souldiers being sory to F see him weepe, prayed him not to trouble him selfe, but to be of good corage. Then Dion letting goe the sorowe and griefe he had conceiued, he beganne to speake vnto them in this manner. My Lordes of PELOPONNESVS, and you also the confederats: I haue called you together to conſult with you, what you ſhould doe. For my ſelfe, it were no honeſty for me to conſult what I ſhould do now, when the city of SYRACVSA ſtandeth in peril of deſtruction: & therefore if I can not ſaue it from deſtruction, yet at the leaſt I wil bury my ſelfe in the fire and ruine of my contry. But for you, if it pleaſe you once more to helpe vs, vnaduiſed & more vnfortunate people: you ſhal by your meanes ſet the poore diſtreſſed city of SYRACVSA againe a foote, which is your deede. Or if it be ſo, that remẽbring the iniuries the SYRACVSANS haue offred you, you wil ſuffer it to be deſtroyed: yet I beſech the gods that at the leaſt they will requite your valliantnes, fidelity, & good loue you haue borne me vntil this preſent, beſeeching you to remẽber Dion, who nether forſooke you at any time when you haue bene iniuried, nor his cõtry men, when they were in trouble. So, going on ſtil with his tale, the mercenary ſtraũgers ſtepped forth with great noiſe, & praied him to leade them to ayde SYRACVSA. Then the Ambaſſadors alſo that were ſent from the SYRACVSANS, ſaluted & imbraced them, & prayed the gods to bleſſe Dion & them, with al the good hap that might be. So when al was whiſht & quiet, Dion willed them forthwith to goe & prepare them ſelues, & that they ſhould be there ready armed after ſupper, determining the very ſame night to go to aide SYRACVSA. But now at SYRACVSA, while day light laſted, Dionyſius ſouldiers & captaines did al the miſchief & villany they could in the city: & when night came, they retired again into their caſtel, hauing loſt very few of their men. Then the ſeditious gouernors of the SYRACVSANS tooke hart againe vnto them, hoping that the enemies would be contẽted with that they had done: & therfore began a new to perſwade the citizens to let Dion alone, & not to receiue him with his mercenary ſouldiers if they came to aide him, ſaying, that they them ſelues were honeſter men then the ſtraungers, to ſaue their city, & to defend their liberty without help of any other. So other Ambaſſadors were ſent again vnto Dion, ſome from the captaines & gouernors of the city, to ſtay them that they ſhould not come: & others alſo from the horſemen, & noble Citizens his friends to haſtẽ his iorney. Whereuppõ by reaſon of this variance, Dion marched very ſoftly at his eaſe. Now by night, Dions enemies within the city got to the gates, & kept thẽ that Dion ſhould not come in. Nyſius on the other ſide made a ſaly out of the caſtel with his mercenary ſouldiers, being better appointed, & a greater nũber of thẽ then before: & with thẽ he ſtraight plucked downe all the wal which they had built before the caſtel, & ran & ſacked the city. At this ſaly out of the caſtel, they did not only kill the men they met, but women & litle children alſo, & ſtaied no more to ſpoile, but to deſtroy & put all to hauock. For, bicauſe Dionyſius ſaw that he was brought to a ſtraight & deſperat caſe, he bare ſuch mortal malice againſt the SYRACVSANS, that ſith there was no remedy but that he muſt needes forgo his tyranny: he determined to burye it, with the vtter deſtruction & deſolation of their citie. And therefore, to preuent Dions ayde, & to make a quick diſpatch to deſtroy all: they came with burning torches in their hands, & did ſet fire of all things they could come to: & further of, they fiered their darts & arrowes, & beſtowed them in euery place of the city. So, they that fled for the fire, were met withall, & ſlayne in the ſtreetes by the ſouldiers, and others alſo that ranne into their houſes, were driuen out againe by force of fire. For there were a number of houſes that were afire, and fel downe vpon them that went and came. This miſery was the chiefeſt cauſe why all the SYRACVSANS agreed together, to ſet open the gates vnto Dion. For when Dion heard by the way, that Dionyſius ſouldiers were gone againe into the caſtell, he made no great haſte to marche forward: but when day was broken, there came certaine horſemen from SYRACVSA vnto Dion, who brought him newes that the enemies had once againe taken the city. Then alſo came other of his enemies vnto him, and prayed him to make haſte. Now their miſerie increaſing ſtill, and they being brought into hard ſtate: Heraclides firſt ſent his brother vnto Dion, and then Theodotes his Vncle, to pray him to come quickly, and helpe them. For now there was no man left to reſiſt the enemies, bicauſe he him ſelfe was hurt, and the citie alſo was in manner cleane burnt & deſtroyed. When theſe newes came to Dion, he was yet about three ſcore furlong from the towne. So he told his mercenary ſouldiers the daunger the towne was in, & hauing encoraged them, he led them no more fayer & ſoftly, but running towards the city, & meeting Meſſengers one of anothers neck as he went, that prayed him to make all the poſſible ſpede he could. By this meanes, the ſouldiers marching with wõderful ſpede & good will

A together, he entred the gates of the city at a place called HECATOMPEDON. First of all, he sent the lightest armed he had, against the enemies, to thende that the SYRACVSANS seeing them, they might take a good hart again to them: whilest he himself in the meane time did set al the other heauy armed souldiers and Citizens that came to ioyne with him, in battell raye, & did cast them into diuers squadrons, of greater length then breadth, and appointed them that should haue the leading of them, to thend that setting vpon the enemies in diuers places together, they should put them in the greater feare & terror. When he had set all things in this order, & had made his prayers vnto the gods, & that they saw him marching through the citie against their enemies: then there rose such a common noyse & reioycing, & great showte of the souldiers, mingled with vowes, prayers, and perswasions of all the SYRACVSANS: that B they called Dion their god & sauior, & the mercenary souldiers their brethren & fellow Citizens. Furthermore, there was not a SYRACVSAN that so much regarded his owne life & person, but he seemed to be more affraid of the losse of Dion only, then of all the rest. For they saw him the foremost man ronning through the daũger of the fire, treading in bloud, & vpon dead bodies that lay slaine in the middest of the streets. Now, in deede to charge the enemies, it was a maruelous daungerous enterprise: for they were like mad beasts, & stoode beside in battell ray alongst the wal which they had ouerthrowen, in a very daungerous place, & hard to win. Howbeit the daunger of the fire did most of all trouble & amaze the straungers, & did stoppe their way. For, on which side soeuer they turned them, the houses round about them were all of a fire, and they were driuen to marche ouer the burnt timber of the houses, and to ronne in C great daunger of the walls of the house sides that fell on them, & to passe through the thicke smoke mingled with dust, & beside, to keepe their rancks with great difficultie. And whē they came to assaile the enemies, they could not come to fight hand to hand, but a few of them in number, bicause of the straightnes of the place: howbeit the SYRACVSANS with force of cries & showtes did so animat, & encorage their men, that at length they draue Nypsius & his men to forsake the place. The most part of them got into the castell, being very neare vnto them: the other that could not get in in time, fled straglingly vp and downe, whom the GRÆCIAN souldiers slue, chasing of them. The extremitie of the time did not presently suffer the Conquerors to reape the frute of their victory, nether the ioyes & imbracings meete for so great an exployte. For the SYRACVSANS went euery man home to his owne house, to quenche the D fire, the which could scarcely be put out all the night. When daye brake, there was none of these seditious flatterers of the people that durst tary in the citie, but cōdemning them selues, they fled to take their fortune. Heraclides and Theodotes came together of their owne good wills to yeld them selues vnto Dion, confessing that they had done him wronge, and humbly praying him to shew him selfe better vnto them, then they had shewed them selues vnto him: & that it was more honorable for him, being euery way vnmatchable for his vertues, to shew him selfe more noble to conquer his anger, then his vnthankfull enemies had done: who contending with him before in vertue, did now confesse themselues to be farre inferior vnto him. This was the summe & effect of Heraclides & Theodotes submission vnto Dion. But his friends did perswade him not to pardon two such wicked men, who did malice & enuy his honor: and E as he would doe the straungers his souldiers any pleasure, that he should put Heraclides into their hands, to roote out of the common wealth of SYRACVSA, his vile manner to flatter and curry fauor with the people, the which was as daungerous and great a plague to a citie, as the tyranny. Dion pacifying them, aunswered. Other generals of armies, said he, do imploy al their wits in marshall exercise & warres: but for him selfe, that he had of long time studied, & learned in the schole of the Academy, to ouercome anger, enuy, & all malice & contencion. The noble proofe whereof is most seene, not in vsing honest men and his friends moderately, but shewing mercy also vnto his enemies, & forgetting his anger against them that haue offended him: and that for his part, he had rather ouercome Heraclides, not in riches and wisedom, but in clemency & iustice, for therein chiefly consisted excellencie, sith no man els in warres can F challenge power & gouernment, but fortune, that ruleth most. And though Heraclides, sayd he, through enuy hath done like a wicked man: must Dion therefore through anger bleamish his vertue? In deede by mans law it is thought meeter, to reuenge an iniurie offered, then to buried the dead bodies, & redeemed them that were taken priſoners, (which were not much B leſſe then two thowſand perſons) he called a common counſel of the citie, in the which Heraclides made a motion, that Dion ſhould be choſen general of SYRACVSA, with abſolute power & authoritie, both by ſea & land. The chiefeſt men of the citie liked very well of it, and would haue had the people to haue paſt it. But the rabble of theſe mariners, and other mechanicall people liuing by their labor, would not ſuffer Heraclides to be put from his Admiralſhip, but new practiſes again, & to flatter the ſouldiers & ſea fairing men he had brought thether with him, & to ſtirre them vp to rebel againſt Dion, ſaying, that he would make him ſelfe tyranne: & him ſelfe in the meane time ſecretly practiſed with Dionyſius, by meanes of a SPARTAN called Pharax. The nobleſt men of the SYRACVSANS miſtruſted it, & thereuppon there fell out great mutinie in their campe, whereby alſo followed great famine in SYRACVSA: ſo that Dion was at ſuch a ſtraight, that he could not tell what to ſay to it, & was reproued of all his friends for that he had againe preferred to great authoritie againſt him ſelfe, ſo vntractable a man, & ſo malicious & wicked a perſon as Heraclides was. Now, when Pharax laye in campe with an army neare vnto the citie of NAPLES, in the marches of the AGRIGENTINES: Dion did bringe D the army of the SYRACVSANS into the field, being yet determined not to fight with him til another time. But through Heraclides, & the ſea mens crying out, that ſaid he would not try this warre by battel, but would draw it out in length bicauſe he would be ſtill generall: he was forced to giue battell, and loſt it. Howbeit the ouerthrow was not great, and happened rather bicauſe his men were at a iarre among them ſelues, by reaſon of their faction and diuiſion, then otherwiſe. Dion therefore prepared to fight another battell, and gathered his men together againe, incoraging them, when euen at twylight word was brought him that Heraclides with al his fleete was vnder ſaile towards SYRACVSA, meaning to take the citie, & to ſhut Dion & his army out of it. Wherefore he preſently tooke with him the chiefeſt men of authoritie in the citie, and the moſt willingeſt men, and rode all night with them in ſuch haſte, that they were E at the gates of SYRACVSA the next morning by nyne of the clocke, hauing ridden ſeuen hundred furlong. Heraclides that had ſayled with all the poſſible ſpeede he could to preuent him boaſted of it vnto the friends & confederats of SYRACVSA, and ſent a Herauld before vnto the SYRACVSANS, sũmoning them to receiue Gæſylus LACEDÆMONIAN, who was ſent to be their

he went vnto SYRACVSA, & came to Dion, & there made Heraclides & him friends againe, by A the great and ſolemne othes he made: & bicauſe Gæſylus alſo ſware, that he him ſelfe would be reuenged of him for Dions ſake, & puniſhe Heraclides, if euer after he did once more conſpire againſt him. After that, the SYRACVSANS brake vp their army by ſea, bicauſe it did them then no ſeruice, and was beſide chargeable keeping of it, and further did alſo breede ſedition and trouble amongeſt their gouernors: and ſo went to lay ſtraighter ſiege to the caſtell then euer they did, and built vp the wall againe, which the enemies had ouerthrowen. Then Dionyſius ſonne ſeeing no aide to come to him from any parte, and that vittels failed them, and further, that the ſouldiers began to mutine, being vnable to keepe them: he fel to a compoſition with Dion, and deliuered vp the caſtell into his hands, with all the armor and munition in it: and ſo tooke his mother & his ſiſters of Dion, and put them abord vpon fiue gallies, with the which The caſtell of Syracuſe ſurrendred vnto Dion.

B he went vnto his father, through the ſafe conduit of Dion. There was not a man at that time in all SYRACVSA, but was there to ſee this ſight, or if by chaunce there were any abſent, the other that were there called them thither as lowde as they could crie, ſaying, that they did not ſee the goodlieſt day and ſunne ſhine, which the citie of SYRACVSA might ſee then at her riſing, the ſame being now reſtored againe to her former libertie. If vntill this preſent day they doe reckon the flying of Dionyſius, for one of the rareſt examples of fortunes chaunge, as one of the greateſt and notableſt thing that euer was: what ioy thinke we had they that draue him out, & what pleaſure had they with them ſelues, that with the leaſt meane that could be poſſible, did deſtroy the greateſt tyrannie in the world? So, when Apollocrates Dionyſius ſonne was imbarked, and that Dion was entred into the caſtell: the women within the caſtell would not

C tary till he came into the houſe, but went to meete him at the gates, Ariſtomaché leading Dions ſonne in her hand, and Areta following her weeping, being verie fearefull how ſhe ſhould call and ſalute her husband, hauing lyen with an other man. Dion firſt ſpake to his ſiſter, and afterwards to his ſonne: and then Ariſtomaché offering him Areta, ſaid vnto him. Since thy baniſhment, O Dion, we haue led a miſerable and captiue life: but now that thou art returned home with victorie, thou haſt ridde vs out of care and thraldom, and haſt alſo made vs againe bolde to lift vp our heades, ſauing her here, whom I wretched creature haue by force (thy ſelfe aliue) ſeene maried vnto an other man. Now then, ſith fortune hath made thee Lord of vs all, what iudgement giueſt thou of this compulſion? Howe wilt thou haue her to ſalute thee, as her Vncle, or husbande? As Ariſtomaché ſpake theſe wordes, the water ſtoode in Dions eyes: ſo, The words of Ariſtomaché vnto Dion, at his entry into the caſtell of Syracuſa.

D he gently and louingly taking his wife Areta by the hand, he gaue her his ſonne, and willed her to goe home to his houſe where he then remained, and ſo deliuered the caſtell to the SYRACVSANS. He hauing this proſperous ſucceſſe and victorie, would not reape any preſent benefite or pleaſure thereby, before he had ſhewed him ſelfe thankefull to his frends, geuen great gifts alſo vnto the confederats of SYRACVSA, and ſpeciallie, before he had geuen euerie one of his frends in the citie, and his mercenarie ſouldiers the ſtraungers, ſome honorable reward according to their deſerts, exceeding his abilitie with magnanimitie of minde: when he him ſelfe liued ſoberly, and kept a moderate dyet, contenting him with any thing that came firſt to hand. Euery man that heard of it, wondered at him, conſidering that not only all SICILIA and CARTHAGE, but generallie all GRÆCE looked vpon his great proſperitie and good for-

E tune, thinking no man liuing greater then him ſelfe, nor that any Captaine euer attained to ſuch fame and wonderfull fortune, as he was come vnto. This notwithſtanding, Dion liued as temperatly and modeſtly in his apparell, and alſo in his number of ſeruaunte, and ſeruice at his bord, as if he had liued with Plato in the Academy at ATHENS, and had not bene conuerſant amongeſt ſouldiers and Captaines, which haue no other comfort nor pleaſure for all the paines and daungers they ſuffer continuallie, but to eate and drinke their fill, and to take their pleaſure all day long. Plato wrote vnto him, that all the world had him in admiration. But Dion, in my opinion, had no reſpect but to one place, and to one citie (to wit, the Academy) and would haue no other Iudges nor lookers into his doinges, but the ſchollers of the ſame: who neither wondered at his great exploytes, valliantnes, nor victorie, but only conſidered if he

F did wiſelie and modeſtlie vſe this fortune he had, and could ſo keepe him ſelfe within modeſt boundes, hauing done ſo great thinges. Furthermore, touching the grauetie he had when he ſpake to any bodie, and his inflexible ſeueritie which he vſed towards the people, he determined neuer to alter or chaunge it: notwithſtanding that his affaires required him to ſhew curteſie and lenitie, and that Plato alſo reproued him for it, and wrote, that ſeueritie and obſtinacie (as we ſayd before) was the companion of ſolitarines. But it ſeemeth to me that Dion did vſe it for two reſpectes. The firſt, bicauſe nature had not framed him curteous and affable to winne men: ſecondly, he did what he could to drawe the SYRACVSANS to the contrarie, who were ouerlicentious, & ſpoyled with too much flattery: for Heraclides began againe to be buſie with him. Firſt of all, Dion ſending for him to come to counſell, he ſent him word he would not come: and that being a priuate citizen, he woulde be at the common counſell amongeſt others when any was kept. Afterwards he accuſed him, for that he had not ouerthrowen and raſed the caſtell: and alſo bicauſe he would not ſuffer the people to breake open the tombe of Dionyſius the elder, to caſt out his bodie: & bicauſe he ſent for counſellers to CORINTHE, and diſdained to make the citizens his companions in the gouernment of the common wealth. In deede to confeſſe a troth, Dion had ſent for certaine CORINTHIANS, hoping the better to ſtabliſh the forme of a common wealth, which he had in his minde, when they were come. For his minde was vtterly to breake the gouernment of Democratia, (to wit, the abſolute gouernment and authoritie of the people in a citie, not being as it were a common wealth, but rather a fayer and market where thinges are ſolde, as Plato ſayth) and to ſtabliſhe the LACONIAN or CRETAN common wealth, mingled with a Princely, and popular gouernment: & that ſhould be, Ariſtocratia, to wit, the number of a fewe noble men that ſhoulde gouerne and direct the chiefeſt and waightieſt matters of ſtate. And for that purpoſe, he thought the CORINTHIANS the meteſt men to help him to frame this cõmon wealth, cõſidering that they gouerned their affaires more by chooſing a few number of the nobilitie, then otherwiſe, and that they did not referre many thinges to the voyce of the people. And bicauſe he was aſſured that Heraclides would be againſt him in it all that he could, and that otherwiſe he knewe he was a ſeditious, a troubleſome, and light headed fellow: he then ſuffered them to kill him who had long before done it, if he had not kept them from it, & ſo they went home to his houſe, and ſlue him there. The murther of Heraclides was much miſliked of the SYRACVSANS: howbeit Dion cauſed him to be honorablie buried, and brought his bodie to the grounde, followed with all his armie. Then he made an Oration him ſelfe to the people, and told them, that it was impoſſible to auoyde ſedition and trouble in the citie, ſo long as Dion and Heraclides did both gouerne together. At that time there was one Callippus an ATHENIAN, a familiar of Dions, who (as Plato ſayth) came not acquainted with Dion through the occaſion of his ſtudie in Philoſophie: but bicauſe he had bene his guide to bring him to ſee the ſecret miſteries and ceremonies of the ſacrifices, and for ſuch other like common talke and companie. This notwithſtanding, Callippus did accompanie him in all this warre, and was verie muche honored of him, and was one of the firſt of all his frendes that entred into SYRACVSA with him, and did valliantlie behaue him ſelfe in all the battells and conflicts that were fought. This Callippus ſeeing that Dions beſt & chiefeſt frends were all ſlaine in this warre, & that Heraclides alſo was dead, that the people of SYRACVSA had no more any heade, and beſides, that the ſouldiers which were with Dion did loue him better then any other man: he became the vnfaithfulleſt man and the verieſt villan of all other, hoping that for reward to kill his frend Dion, he ſhould vndoubtedly come to haue the whole gouernment of all SICILIA, and as ſome doe reporte, for that he had taken a bribe of his enemies of twentie talentes for his labor to commit this murther. So he began to practiſe, to bribe, and to ſubborne certaine of the mercenarie ſouldiers againſt Dion, and that by a maruelous craftie and ſuttle fetch. For, vſing commonly to report vnto Dion certeine ſeditious wordes, ſpoken peraduenture by the ſouldiers in deede, or elſe deuiſed of his owne head: he wan ſuch a libertie and boldnes by the truſt Dion had in him, that he might ſafely ſay what he would to any of the ſouldiers, and boldly ſpeake euill of Dion by his owne commaundement: to thend he might thereby vnderſtand the better whether any of the ſouldiers were angry with him, or wiſhed his death. By this pollicy, Callippus ſtraight foũd out thoſe that bare Dion grudge, & that were already corrupted, whom he drew to his conſpiracy. And if any man vnwilling to geue eare vnto him, went and told Dion, that Callippus would haue intiſed him to conſpire againſt him: Dion was not angrie with him for it, thinking that he did, but as he had commaunded

A commaunded him to doe. Now as this treaſon was practiſing againſt Dion, there appeared a great and monſtruous ghoſt or ſpirit vnto him. By chaunce ſitting late one euening all alone, in a gallerie he had, and being in a deepe thought with him ſelfe, ſodainly he heard a noyſe: and therewith caſting his eye to thend of his gallery, (being yet day light) he ſaw a monſtrous great woman, like vnto one of the furies ſhewed in playes, and ſaw her ſweeping of the houſe with a broome. This viſion ſo amazed and affrighted him, that he ſent for his frends, and told them what a ſight he had ſeene: and prayed them to tarie with him all night, being as it were a man beſide him ſelfe, fearing leaſt the ſpirite woulde come to him againe if they left him alone, of the which notwithſtanding he neuer heard more afterwards. Howbeit ſhortly after, his ſonne being growen to mans ſtate, for a certaine light anger he had taken when he was B but a boy, he caſt him ſelfe hedlong downe from the toppe of the houſe, and ſo was ſlaine. Dion being in this ſtate, Callippus went on ſtill with his treaſon, and ſpred a rumor abroade among the SYRACVSANS, that Dion ſeeing him ſelfe nowe deſtitute of children, was determined to ſend for Apollocrates, Dionyſius ſonne, to make him his heire and ſucceſſor, being coſin germaine to his wife, and his ſiſters daughters ſonne. Then began Dion, his wife, and ſiſter to miſtruſt Callippus practiſes, and they were told of it by diuers ſundrie and manifeſt proofes. But Dion being ſorie (as I ſuppoſe) for Heraclides death, and inwardlie taking that murther in very euill part, as a fowle blot to his life and doings: he ſayd he had rather dye a thowſand deaths, and to offer his throate to be cut to any that would, rather then he would liue in that miſerie, to be compelled to take heede as well of his frends, as of his enemies. Callippus then ſeeing the C women ſo buſie and inquiſitiue of his doings, & fearing leaſt he ſhould be bewrayed: he came weeping vnto them, and told them it was nothing, and that he was readie to aſſure them of it by any maner of way they would deuiſe. The women then willed him to ſweare by the great othe, which was in this maner. He that muſt take this othe, commeth into the temple of the goddeſſes Theſmophores, which are, Ceres and Proſerpina. And after certaine ſacrifices done, he putteth on the purple chaplet of the goddeſſe Proſerpina, holding a burning torch in his hand and ſweareth in this maner. Callippus hauing done all theſe ceremonies, and made the oth in forme as I haue told you: he made ſo light accompt of the goddeſſes, that he taried no lenger to do the murther he had determined, but till the very feaſt day of the goddeſſe ſhould come, by whom he had ſworne: and ſlue him on the day of the feaſt of Proſerpina. Nowe, I doe not D thinke that he choſe that day of ſette purpoſe, knowing right well that he did alwayes ſinne againſt her, what time ſoeuer he had killed his brother, being by his meanes ſpeciallie admitted to the ſocietie and brotherhoode with him, of the fraternity and miſteries of Ceres & Proſerpina. Of this conſpiracie there were diuers. For, as Dion was ſet in his chamber talking with his frends where there were many beddes to ſit on: ſome compaſſed the houſe round about, others came to the dores and windowes of his chamber, and they that ſhould doe the deede to diſpatche him, which were the ZACYNTHIAN ſouldiers, came into his chamber in their coates without any ſword. But when they were come in, they that were without did ſhut the dores after them, and locked them in, leaſt any man ſhoulde come out: and they that were within, fell vpon Dion, and thought to haue ſtrangled him. But when they ſaw they could not, E they called for a ſworde. Neuer a man that was within, durſt open the dores, though there were many with Dion. For they thought euery man to ſaue their owne liues, by ſuffering him to be killed, and therefore durſt not come to helpe him. So the murtherers taried a long time within, and did nothing. At length there was one Lycon a SYRACVSAN, that gaue one of theſe ZACYNTHIAN ſouldiers a dagger in at the window, with the which they cut Dions throate, as a weather they had holden a long time in their handes, euen dead for feare. The murther being executed, they caſt his ſiſter, and wife, great with childe, into priſon, and there the poore Ladie was pitiefullie brought to bedde of a goodly boy: the which they rather determined to bring vp, then otherwiſe to doe any thing with the childe. Their keepers that had the charge of them, were contented to let them do it, bicauſe Callippus began then a litle to grow to ſome F trouble. For at the firſt, after he had ſlaine Dion, he bare all the whole ſway for a time, and kept the citie of SYRACVSA in his hands: & wrote vnto ATHENS, the which next vnto the immortall goddes he was moſt affrayed of, hauing defiled his handes in ſo damnable a treaſon. And therefore, in my opinion, it was not euill ſpoken, that ATHENS is a citie of all other that bringeth forth the beſt men when they geue them ſelues to goodnes, & the wickedeſt people alſo, when they doe diſpoſe them ſelues to euill: as their contrie alſo bringeth foorth the beſt honnie that is, and hemlocke in like maner that quickely diſpatcheth a man of his life. Howbeit the gods, and fortune, did not ſuffer this treaſon and wicked man to raigne long, hauing comen to the gouernment of a realme by ſo damnable a murther: but ſhortly after they gaue him his payment he had deſerued. For Callippus going to take a litle towne called CATANA, he loſt the citie of SYRACVSA: whereupon he ſayd that he had loſt a citie, and got a * cheeſe-knife. Afterwards he went to aſſaile the MESSENIANS, and there he loſt a great number of his men, and amongeſt them were ſlaine thoſe that killed Dion. Now Callippus finding no citie in all SICILIA, that woulde receiue him, but that they all did hate and abhorre him: he went to take the citie of RHEGIO in ITALIE. There being in great diſtreſſe and neede of all thinges, and not able to maintaine his ſouldiers: he was ſlaine by Leptines, and Polyperchon, with the ſelfe ſame dagger wherewith Dion before was ſlaine: the which was knowen by the facion, being ſhort after the LACONIAN daggers, and alſo by the workemanſhippe vpon it, that was very excellently wrought. And thus was the end and death of Callippus. Now for Ariſtomaché and Areta, they were taken out of priſon: and Icetes SYRACVSAN, that ſomtimes had bene one of Dions frends, tooke them home to his owne houſe, and vſed them verie well and faithfully for a certaine time, but afterwards was wonne and corrupted by Dions enemies. So he cauſed a ſhippe to be prouided for them, and bare them in hande that he would ſende them into PELOPONNESVS: but he gaue them charge that caried them away, to kill them as they went, and to throw them ouer bord into the ſea. Some ſay, that the two women, and the litle young boy, were caſt aliue into the ſea. But this reward of the ſinfull act that he committed, returned againe vppon him ſelfe, as it had done before vnto others. For he was taken by Timoleon that put him to death: and beſides, the SYRACVSANS did alſo kill two of his daughters in reuenge of the vnfaithfulnes he had ſhewed vnto Dion.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Brutus.

A Marcus Brutus came of that Iunius Brutus, for whome the auncient Romanes made his ſtatue of braſſe to be ſet vp in the Capitoll, with the images of the kings, holding a naked ſword in his hand: bicauſe he had valliantly put downe the Tarqvines from their kingdom of Rome. But that Iunius Brutus being of a ſower ſtearne nature, not ſoftned by reaſon, being like vnto ſword blades of too hard a temper: was ſo ſubiect to his choller and malice he bare vnto the tyrannes, that for their ſakes he cauſed his owne ſonnes to be executed. But this Marcus Brutus in contrarie maner, whoſe life we preſently wryte, hauing framed his manners of life by the rules of vertue and ſtudie of Philoſophie, and hauing imployed his B wit, which was gentle and conſtant, in attempting of great things: me thinkes he was rightly made and framed vnto vertue. So that his verie enemies which wiſh him moſt hurt, bicauſe of his conſpiracy againſt Iulius Cæſar: if there were any noble attempt done in all this conſpiracie, they referre it whollie vnto Brutus, and all the cruell and violent actes vnto Caſſius, who was Brutus familiar frend, but not ſo well geuen, and condicioned as he. His mother Seruilia, it is thought came of the blood of Seruilius Hala, who, when Spurius Melius went about to make him ſelfe king, and to bring it to paſſe had entiſed the common people to rebell: tooke a dagger and hid it cloſe vnder his arme, and went into the market place. When he was come thither, he made as though he had ſomewhat to ſay vnto him, and preſſed as neere him as he could: wherefore Melius ſtowping downe with his head, to heare what he would ſay, Brutus C ſtabbed him in with his dagger, and ſlue him. Thus muche all writers agree for his mother. Now touching his father, ſome for the euil wil & malice they bare vnto Brutus, bicauſe of the death of Iulius Cæſar, doe maintaine that he came not of Iunius Brutus that draue out the Tarqvines: for there were none left of his race, conſidering that his two ſonnes were executed for conſpiracie with the Tarqvines: and that Marcus Brutus came of a meane houſe, the which was raiſed to honor and office in the common wealth, but of late time. Poſidonius the Philoſopher wryteth the contrarie, that Iunius Brutus in deede ſlue two of his ſonnes which were men growen, as the hiſtories doe declare: howebeit that there was a third ſonne, being A but a litle childe at that time, from whom the houſe and family afterwardes was deriued: and furthermore, that there were in his time certeine famous men of that familie, whoſe ſtature and countenaunce reſembled much the image of Iunius Brutus. And thus much for this mat-Seruilia Catoes ſiſter. ter. Marcus Cato the Philoſopher was brother vnto Seruilia M. Brutus mother: whom Brutus Brutus ſtudies ſtudied moſt to follow of all the other ROMANES, bicauſe he was his Vncle, and afterwards he maried his daughter. Now touching the GRÆCIAN Philoſophers, there was no ſect nor Philoſopher of them, but he heard and liked it: but aboue all the reſt, he loued Platoes ſect beſt, Brutus followed the olde Academyke. & did not much geue him ſelfe to the new nor meane Academy as they call it, but altogether to the old Academy. Therefore he did euer greatly eſteeme the Philoſopher Antiochus, of the citie of ASCALON: but he was more familiar with his brother Ariſton, who for learning and B knowledge was inferior to many other Philoſophers, but for wiſedom & curteſie, equall with the beſt and chiefeſt. Touching Empylus, whom Marcus Brutus him ſelfe doth mencion in his Empylus an Orator, wrote a booke of Cæſars death, and intituled it, Brutus. Epiſtells, and his frends alſo in many places: he was an Orator, and left an excellent booke he wrote of the death of Iulius Cæſar, and tituled it Brutus. He was properly learned in the Latine tongue, and was able to make long diſcourſe in it, beſide that he could alſo plead verie well in Latine. But for the Græke tongue, they do note in ſome of his Epiſtells, that he counterfea-to CYPRVS with his Vncle Cato, who was ſent againſt Ptolomy king of ÆGYPT, who hauing ſlaine him ſelfe, Cato ſtaying for certaine neceſſarie buſines he had in the Ile of RHODES, had

* Or Canidius. alreadie ſent * Caninius, one of his frends before, to keepe his treaſure and goods. But Cato fearing he woulde be light fingered, wrote vnto Brutus foorthwith to come out of PAMPHYLIA, D (where he was but newlie recouered of a ſickeneſſe) into CYPRVS, the which he did. The which iorney he was ſorie to take vpon him, both for reſpect of Caninius ſhame, whome Cato as he thought wrongfullie ſlaundered: as alſo bicauſe he thought this office too meane and vnmeete for him, being a young man, and geuen to his booke. This notwithſtanding, he be-haued him ſelfe ſo honeſtlie and carefullie, that Cato did greatly commende him: and after all the goodes were ſold and conuerted into readie money, he tooke the moſt parte of it, and returned withall to ROME. Afterwards when the Empire of ROME was deuided into factions, and that Cæſar and Pompey both were in armes one againſt the other, and that all the Empire of ROME was in garboyle and vprore: it was thought then that Brutus woulde take parte with though oftentimes meting him before, he thought ſcorne to ſpeake to him, thinking it a great ſinne and offence in him, to ſpeake to the murtherer of his father. But then ſubmitting him ſelfe vnto Pompey, as vnto the head of the common wealth: he ſailed into SICILIA, Lieutenant vnder Seſtius that was Gouernor of that prouince. But when he ſaw that there was no way to riſe, nor to do any noble exployts, and that Cæſar & Pompey were both camped together, and fought for victory: he went of him ſelfe vnſent for into MACEDON, to be partaker of the daunger. It is reported that Pompey being glad, and wondering at his comming when he ſawe him come to him: he roſe out of his chaire, and went and imbraced him before them all, and vſed F in Pompeys campe, did nothing but ſtudie all day long, except he were with Pompey, & not only

A the dayes before, but the ſelfe ſame day alſo before the great battell was fought in the fieldes of PHARSALIA, where Pompey was ouerthrowen. It was in the middeſt of ſommer, and the ſunne was verie hotte, beſides that the campe was lodged neere vnto mariſhes, and they that caried his tent, taried long before they came: whereuppon, being verie wearie with trauell, ſcant any meate came into his mouth at dinner time. Furthermore, when others ſlept, or thought what woulde happen the morrowe after: he fell to his booke, and wrote all day long till night, wryting a breuiarie of Polybius. It is reported that Cæſar did not forgette him, and that he gaue his Captaines charge before the battell, that they ſhoulde beware they killed not Brutus in fight, and if he yeelded willinglie vnto them, that then they ſhoulde bring him vnto him: but if he reſiſted, and woulde not be taken, then that they ſhoulde lette him goe, B and doe him no hurte. Some ſaye he did this for Seruiliaes ſake, Brutus mother. For when he was a young man, he had bene acquainted with Seruilia, who was extreamelie in loue with him. And bicauſe Brutus was borne in that time when their loue was hotteſt, he perſwaded him ſelfe that he begat him. For proofe hereof the reporte goeth, that when the waightieſt matters were in hande in the Senate, about the conſpiracie of Catiline, which was likelie to haue vndone the citie of ROME, Cæſar and Cato ſate neere together, and were both of contrarie mindes to eache other: and then, that in the meane time one deliuered Cæſar a letter. Cæſar tooke it, and red it ſoftlie to him ſelfe: but Cato cried out vpon Cæſar, and ſayd he did not well to receiue aduertiſementes from enemies. Whereuppon the whole Senate beganne to murmure at it. Then Cæſar gaue Cato the letter as it was ſent him, who red C it, and founde that it was a loue letter ſent from his ſiſter Seruilia: thereuppon he caſt it againe to Cæſar, and ſayde vnto him, holde, dronken ſoppe. When he had done ſo, he went on with his tale, and maintayned his opinion as he did before: ſo commonlie was the loue of Seruilia knowen which ſhe bare vnto Cæſar. So, after Pompeys ouerthrowe at the battell of PHARSALIA, and that he fledde to the ſea: when Cæſar came to beſeege his campe, Brutus went out of the campe gates vnſeene of any man, and lept into a mariſhe full of water and reedes. Then when night was come, he crept out, and went vnto the citie of LARISSA: from whence he wrote vnto Cæſar, who was verie glad that he had ſcaped, and ſent for him to come vnto him. When Brutus was come, he did not onelie pardon him, but alſo kept him alwayes about him, and did as muche honor and eſteeme him, any man he had in D his companie. Nowe no man coulde tell whether Pompey was fledde, and all were maruelous deſirous to knowe it: wherefore Cæſar walking a good waye alone with Brutus, he did aske him which way he thought Pompey tooke. Cæſar perceiuing by his talke that Brutus geſſed certainlie whether Pompey ſhoulde be fledde: he left all other wayes, and tooke his iorney directlie towardes ÆGYPT. Pompey, as Brutus had conjectured, was in deede fledde into ÆGYPT, but there he was villanouſlie ſlayne. Furthermore, Brutus obteyned pardon of Cæſar for Caſſius: and defending alſo the king * of LYBIAES cauſe, he was ouerlayed with a worlde of accuſacions againſt him, howebeit intreating for him, he ſaued him the beſt parte of his realme and kingdome. They ſay alſo that Cæſar ſayd, when he hearde Brutus pleade: I knowe not, ſayd he, what this young man woulde, but what he woulde, he willeth it vehe-
E mentlie. For as Brutus grauetie and conſtant minde woulde not graunt all men their requeſts that ſued vnto him, but being moued with reaſon and diſcretion, did alwayes encline to that which was good and honeſt: euen ſo when it was moued to followe any matter, he vſed a kinde of forcible and vehement perſwaſion that calmed not, till he had obteyned his deſire. For by flattering of him, a man coulde neuer obteyne any thing at his handes, nor make him to doe that which was vniuſt. Further, he thought it not meete for a man of calling and eſtimacion, to yeelde vnto the requeſtes and intreaties of a ſhameleſſe and importunate ſuter, requeſting thinges vnmeete: the which notwithſtanding, ſome men doe for ſhame, bicauſe they dare deny nothing, And therefore he was wont to ſay, that he thought them euill brought vp in their youth, that coulde deny nothing. Nowe when Cæſar tooke ſea to goe F into AFRICKE, againſt Cato and Scipio, he left Brutus Gouernour of GAVLE in ITALIE, on this ſide of the Alpes, which was a great good happe for that prouince. For where others were ſpoyled and polled by the inſolencie and couetouſneſſe of the Gouernours, as if it had Iulius Cæſar carefull of Brutus ſafety.

Iulius Cæſar loued Seruilia, Brutus mother.

Brutus ſaued by Iulius Cæſar, after the battell of Pharſalia.

* This king was Iuba: howbeit it is true alſo, that Brutus made interceſſion for Deiotarus king of Galatia: who was deprined notwithſtanding of the moſt parte of his contrie, by Cæſar and therefore this place were beſt to be vnderſtanded, by Deiotarus.

Cæſar made Brutus Gouernour of Gaule on this ſide the mountaines.

bene a contrie conquered: Brutus was a comforte and reſt vnto their former troubles and miſeries they ſuſteyned. But he referred it whollie vnto Cæſars grace and goodneſſe. For, when Cæſar returned out of AFRICKE, and progreſſed vp and downe ITALIE: the things that pleaſed him beſt to ſee, were the cities vnder Brutus charge and gouernment, and Brutus him ſelfe: who honored Cæſar in perſon, and whoſe companie alſo Cæſar greatlie eſteemed. Now there were diuers ſortes of Prætorſhippes at ROME, and it was looked for, that Brutus or Caſſius would make ſute for the chiefeſt Prætorſhippe, which they called the Prætorſhippe of the citie: bicauſe he that had that office, was as a Iudge to miniſter iuſtice vnto the citizens. Therfore they ſtroue one againſt the other, though ſome ſay that there was ſome litle grudge betwext them for other matters before, and that this contencion did ſette them further out, though they were allyed together. For Caſſius had maried Iunia, Brutus ſiſter. Others ſay, that this contencion betwext them came by Cæſar himſelfe, who ſecretly gaue either of them both hope of his fauour. So their ſute for the Prætorſhippe was ſo followed and laboured of either partie, that one of them put an other in ſute of lawe. Brutus with his vertue and good name contended againſt many noble exploytes in armes, which Caſſius had done againſt the PARTHIANS. So Cæſar after he had heard both their obiections, he told his frendes with whom he conſulted about this matter: Caſſius cauſe is the iuſter, ſayd he, but Brutus muſt be firſt preferred. Thus Brutus had the firſt Prætorſhippe, and Caſſius the ſecond: who thanked not Cæſar ſo much for the Prætorſhippe he had, as he was angrie with him for that he had loſt. But Brutus in many other thinges taſted of the benefite of Cæſars fauour in any thing he requeſted. For if he had liſted, he might haue bene one of Cæſars chiefeſt frendes, and of greateſt authoritie and credit about him. Howebeit Caſſius frendes did diſſwade him from it (for Caſſius and he were not yet reconciled together ſithence their firſt contencion and ſtrife for the Prætorſhip) and prayed him to beware of Cæſars ſweete intiſements, and to flie his tyrannicall fauors: the which they ſayd Cæſar gaue him, not to honor his vertue, but to weaken his conſtant minde, framing it to the bent of his bowe. Now Cæſar on the other ſide did not truſt him ouermuch, nor was not without tales brought vnto him againſt him: howbeit he feared his great minde, authority, & frends. Yet on the other ſide alſo, he truſted his good nature, & fayer condicions. For, intelligence being brought him one day, that Antonius and Dolabella did conſpire againſt him: he aunſwered, that theſe fat long heared men made him not affrayed, but the leane and whitely faced fellowes, meaning that, by Brutus and Caſſius. At an other time alſo when one accuſed Brutus vnto him, and bad him beware of him: What, ſayd he againe, clapping his hand on his breſt: thinke ye that Brutus will not tarie till this bodie dye? Meaning that none but Brutus after him was meete to haue ſuche power as he had. And ſurelie, in my opinion, I am perſwaded that Brutus might in dede haue come to haue bene the chiefeſt man of ROME, if he could haue contented him ſelfe for a time to haue bene next vnto Cæſar, & to haue ſuffred his glorie and authoritie, which he had gotten by his great victories, to conſume with time. But Caſſius being a chollericke man, and hating Cæſar priuatlie, more then he did the tyrannie openlie: he incenſed Brutus againſt him. It is alſo reported, that Brutus coulde euill away with the tyrannie, and that Caſſius hated the tyranne: making many complayntes for the iniuries he had done him, and amongeſt others, for that he had taken away his Lyons from him. Caſſius had prouided them for his ſportes, when he ſhould be Ædilis, and they were found in the citie of MEGARA, when it was wonne by Calenus, and Cæſar kept them. The rumor went, that theſe Lyons did maruelous great hurt to the MAGARIANS. For when the citie was taken, they brake their cages where they were tied vp, and turned them looſe, thinking they would haue done great miſchiefe to the enemies, and haue kept them from ſetting vppon them: but the Lyons contrarie to expectacion, turned vpon them ſelues that fled vnarmed, & did ſo cruelly tare ſome in peces, that it pitied their enemies to ſee them. And this was the cauſe, as ſome do report, that made Caſſius conſpire againſt Cæſar. But this holdeth no water. For Caſſius euen frō his cradell could not abide any maner of tyrans, as it appeared when he was but a boy, & went vnto the ſame ſchoole that Fauſtus, the ſonne of Sylla did. And Fauſtus bragging among other boyes, highly boaſted of his fathers kingdom: Caſſius roſe vp on his feete, and gaue him two good whirts on the eare. Fauſtus gouernors would haue put this matter in ſute againſt Caſſius: But

A But Pompey woulde not ſuffer them, but cauſed the two boyes to be brought before him, and asked them howe the matter came to paſſe. Then Caſſius, as it is wrytten of him, ſayd vnto the other: goe to Fauſtus, ſpeake againe and thou dareſt, before this noble man here, the ſame wordes that made me angrie with thee, that my fiſtes may walke once againe about thine eares. Suche was Caſſius hotte ſtirring nature. But for Brutus, his frendes and contrie men, both by diuers procurementes, and ſundrie rumors of the citie, and by many bills alſo, did openlie call and procure him to doe that he did. For, vnder the image of his aunceſter Iunius Brutus, that draue the kinges out of Rome, they wrote: O, that it pleaſed the goddes thou wert nowe aliue, Brutus: and againe, that thou wert here amonge vs nowe. His tribunall (or chaire) where he gaue audience durings the time he was Prætor, was full of ſuche B billes: Brutus, thou art a ſleepe, and art not Brutus in deede. And of all this, Cæſars flatterers were the cauſe: who beſide many other exceeding and vnſpeakeable honors they dayly deuiſed for him, in the night time they did put Diadeames vppon the heades of his images, ſuppoſinge thereby to allure the common people to call him kinge, inſteade of Dictator. Howebeit it turned to the contrarie, as we haue wrytten more at large in Iulius Cæſars life. Nowe when Caſſius felt his frendes, and did ſtirre them vp againſt Cæſar: they all agreed and promiſed to take parte with him, ſo Brutus were the chiefe of their conſpiracie. For they told him, that ſo high an enterpriſe and attempt as that, did not ſo muche require men of manhoode, and courage to drawe their ſwordes: as it ſtoode them vppon to haue a man of ſuche eſtimacion as Brutus, to make euerie man boldlie thinke, that by his onelie preſence the fact C were holie, and iuſt. If he tooke not this courſe, then that they ſhoulde goe to it with fainter hartes, and when they had done it, they ſhoulde be more fearefull: bicauſe euerie man woulde thinke that Brutus woulde not haue refuſed to haue made one with them, if the cauſe had bene good and honeſt. Therefore Caſſius conſidering this matter with him ſelfe, did firſt of all ſpeake to Brutus, ſince they grewe ſtraunge together for the ſute they had for the Prætorſhippe. So when he was reconciled to him againe, and that they had imbraced one an other: Caſſius asked him if he were determined to be in the Senate houſe, the firſt day of the moneth of Marche, bicauſe he heard ſay that Cæſars frendes ſhoulde moue the counſell that day, that Cæſar ſhoulde be called king by the Senate. Brutus aunſwered him, he would not be there. But if we be ſent for ſayd Caſſius: howe then? For my ſelfe then ſayd Brutus, I meane D not to holde my peace, but to withſtande it, and rather dye then loſe my libertie. Caſſius being bolde, and taking holde of this worde: why, q he, what Romane is he aliue that will ſuffer thee to dye for the libertie? What, knoweſt thou not that thou art Brutus? Thinkeſt thou that they be cobblers, tapſters, or ſuche like baſe mechanicall people, that wryte theſe billes and ſcrowles which are founde dayly in thy Prætors chaire, and not the nobleſt men and beſt citizens that doe it? No, be thou well aſſured, that of other Prætors they looke for giftes, common diſtribucions amongeſt the people, and for common playes, and to ſee fenſers fight at the ſharpe, to ſhew the people paſtime: but at thy handes, they ſpecially require (as a due det vnto them) the taking away of the tyranny, being fully bent to ſuffer any extremity for thy ſake, ſo that thou wilt ſhew thy ſelfe to be the man thou art taken for, and that they hope thou art. E Thereuppon he kiſſed Brutus, and imbraced him: and ſo each taking leaue of other, they went both to ſpeake with their frendes about it. Nowe amongeſt Pompeys frendes, there was one called * Caius Ligarius, who had bene accuſed vnto Cæſar for taking parte with Pompey, and Cæſar diſcharged him. But Ligarius thanked not Cæſar ſo muche for his diſcharge, as he was offended with him for that he was brought in daunger by his tyrannicall power. And therefore in his hearte he was alway his mortall enemie, and was beſides verie familiar with Brutus, who went to ſee him beinge ſicke in his bedde, and ſayed vnto him: O Ligarius, in what a time art thou ſicke? Ligarius riſinge vppe in his bedde, and taking him by the right hande, ſayed vnto him: Brutus, ſayed he, if thou haſt any great enterpriſe in hande worthie of thy ſelfe, I am whole. After that time they beganne to feele all their acquain- F taunce whome they truſted, and layed their heades together conſultinge vppon it, and did not onelie picke out their frendes, but all thoſe alſo whome they thought ſtowt enough to attempt any deſperate matter, and that were not affrayed to loaſe their liues.

They do hide the conſpiracy againſt Cæſar, from Cicero.

For this cauſe they durſt not acquaint Cicero with their conſpiracie, although he was a man whome they loued dearelie, and truſted beſt: for they were affrayed that he being a coward by nature, and age alſo hauing increaſed his feare, he woulde quite turne and alter all their purpoſe, and quenche the heate of their enterpriſe, the which ſpeciallie required hotte and earneſt execucion, ſeeking by perſwaſion to bring all thinges to ſuche ſafetie, as there ſhould be no perill. Brutus alſo did let other of his frendes alone, as Statilius EPICVRIAN, and Faonius, that made profeſſion to followe Marcus Cato. Bicauſe that hauing caſt out wordes a farre of, diſputing together in Philoſophie to feele their mindes: Faonius aunſwered, that ciuill warre was worſe then tyrannicall gouernment vſurped againſt the lawe. And Statilius tolde him alſo, that it were an vnwiſe parte of him, to put his life in daunger, for a ſight of ignoraunt fooles and aſſes. Labeo was preſent at this talke, and maintayned the contrarie againſt them both. But Brutus helde his peace, as though it had bene a doubtfull matter, and a harde thing to haue decided. But afterwardes, being out of their companie, he made Labeo priuie to his intent: who verie readilie offered him ſelfe to make one. And they thought good alſo to bring in an other Brutus to ioyne with him, ſurnamed Albinus: who was no man of his handes him ſelfe, but bicauſe he was able to bring good force of a great number of ſlaues, and fenſers at the ſharpe, whome he kept to ſhewe the people paſtime with their fighting, beſides alſo that Cæſar had ſome truſt in him. Caſſius and Labeo tolde Brutus Albinus of it at the firſt, but he made them no aunſwere. But when he had ſpoken with Brutus him ſelfe alone, and that Brutus had tolde him he was the chiefe ringleader of all this conſpiracie: then he willinglie promiſed him the beſt aide he coulde. Furthermore, the onlie name and great calling of Brutus, did bring on the moſt of them to geue conſent to this conſpiracie. Who hauing neuer taken othes together, nor taken or geuen any caution or aſſuraunce, nor binding them ſelues one to an other by any religious othes: they all kept the matter ſo ſecret to them ſelues, and coulde ſo cunninglie handle it, that notwithſtanding the goddes did reueale it by manifeſt ſignes and tokens from aboue, and by predictions of ſacrifices: yet all this woulde not be beleued. Nowe Brutus, who knewe verie well that for his ſake all the nobleſt, vallianteſt, and moſt couragious men of ROME did venter their liues, waying with him ſelfe the greatneſſe of the daunger: when he was out of his houſe, he did ſo frame and facion his countenaunce and lookes, that no man coulde diſcerne he had any thing to trouble his minde. But when night came that he was in his owne houſe, then he was cleane chaunged. For, either care did wake him againſt his will when he woulde haue ſlept, or elſe oftentimes of him ſelfe he fell into ſuche deepe thoughtes of this enterpriſe, caſting in his minde all the daungers that might happen: that his wife lying by him, founde that there was ſome maruelous great matter that troubled his minde, not beinge wont to be in that taking, and that he coulde not well determine with him ſelfe. His wife Porcia (as we haue tolde you before) was the daughter of Cato, whome Brutus maried being his coſin, not a maiden, but a younge widowe after the death of her firſt husbande Bibulus, by whome ſhe had alſo a younge ſonne called Bibulus, who afterwardes wrote a booke of the actes and ieaſtes of Brutus, extant at this preſent day. This young Ladie being excellentlie well ſeene in Philoſophie, louing her husbande well, and being of a noble courage, as ſhe was alſo wiſe: bicauſe ſhe woulde not aske her husbande what he ayled before ſhe had made ſome proofe by her ſelfe, ſhe tooke a litle raſor ſuche as barbers occupie to pare mens nayles, and cauſinge all her maydes and women to goe out of her chamber, gaue her ſelfe a greate gaſhe withall in her thigh, that ſhe was ſtraight all of a goare bloode, and incontinentlie after, a vehement feuer tooke her, by reaſon of the payne of her wounde. Then perceiuing her husbande was maruelouſlie out of quiet, and that he coulde take no reſt: euen in her greateſt payne of all, ſhe ſpake in this ſorte vnto him. I being, O Brutus, (ſayed ſhe) the daughter of Cato, was maried vnto thee, not to be thy beddefellowe and companion in bedde and at borde onelie, like a harlot: but to be partaker alſo with thee, of thy good and euill fortune. Nowe for thy ſelfe, I can finde no cauſe of faulte in thee touchinge our matche: but for my parte, howe may I ſhowe my duetie towardes thee, and howe muche I woulde doe for thy ſake, if I can not conſtantlie beare a ſecret miſchaunce

A or griefe with thee, which requireth ſecrecy and fidelity? I confeſſe, that a womans wit commonly is too weake to keepe a ſecret ſafely: but yet, Brutus, good educacion, and the companie of vertuous men, haue ſome power to reforme the defect of nature. And for my ſelfe, I haue this benefit moreouer: that I am the daughter of Cato, & wife of Brutus. This notwithſtanding, I did not truſt to any of theſe things before: vntill that now I haue found by experience, that no paine nor griefe whatſoeuer can ouercome me. With thoſe wordes ſhe ſhewed him her wounde on her thigh, and tolde him what ſhe had done to proue her ſelfe. Brutus was amazed to heare what ſhe ſayd vnto him, and lifting vp his handes to heauen, he beſought the goddes to geue him the grace he might bring his enterpriſe to ſo good paſſe, that he might be founde a husband, worthie of ſo noble a wife as Porcia: ſo he then did comfort her the beſt B he coulde. Now a day being appointed for the meeting of the Senate, at what time they hoped Cæſar woulde not faile to come: the conſpirators determined then to put their enterpriſe in execucion, bicauſe they might meete ſafelie at that time without ſuſpicion, and the rather, for that all the nobleſt and chiefeſt men of the citie woulde be there. Who when they ſhould ſee ſuche a great matter executed, would euerie man then ſet to their handes, for the defence of their libertie. Furthermore, they thought alſo that the appointment of the place where the counſell ſhoulde be kept, was choſen of purpoſe by diuine prouidence, and made all for them. For it was one of the porches about the Theater, in the which there was a certaine place full of ſeates for men to ſit in, where alſo was ſet vp the image of Pompey, which the citie had made and conſecrated in honor of him: when he did beawtifie that parte of the C citie with the Theater he built, with diuers porches about it. In this place was the aſſembly of the Senate appointed to be, iuſt on the fifteenth day of the moneth of March, which the ROMANES call, Idus Martias: ſo that it ſeemed ſome god of purpoſe had brought Cæſar thither to be ſlaine, for reuenge of Pompeys death. So when the day was come, Brutus went out of his houſe with a dagger by his ſide vnder his long gowne, that no bodie ſawe nor knewe, but his wife onelie. The other conſpirators were all aſſembled at Caſſius houſe, to bring his ſonne into the market place, who on that day did put on the mans gowne, called Toga Virilis: and from thence they came all in a troupe together vnto Pompeys porche, looking that Cæſar woulde ſtraight come thither. But here is to be noted, the wonderfull aſſured conſtancie of theſe conſpirators, in ſo daungerous and waightie an enterpriſe as they had vndertaken. For D many of them being Prætors, by reaſon of their office, whoſe duetie is to miniſter iuſtice to euerie bodie: they did not onelie with great quietneſſe and curteſie heare them that ſpake vnto them, or that pleaded matters before them, and gaue them attentiue eare, as if they had had no other matter in their heades: but moreouer, they gaue iuſt ſentence, and carefullie diſpatched the cauſes before them. So there was one among them, who being condemned in a certaine ſumme of money, refuſed to pay it, and cried out that he did appeale vnto Cæſar. Then Brutus caſting his eyes vppon the conſpirators, ſayd, Cæſar ſhall not lette me to ſee the lawe executed. Notwithſtanding this, by chaunce there fell out many misfortunes vnto them, which was enough to haue marred the enterpriſe. The firſt and chiefeſt was, Cæſars long tarying, who came verie late to the Senate: for bicauſe the ſignes of the ſacrifices appeared E vnluckie, his wife Calpurnia kept him at home, and the Soothſayers bad him beware he went not abroade. The ſeconde cauſe was, when one came vnto Caſca being a conſpirator, and taking him by the hande, ſayd vnto him: O Caſca, thou kepteſt it cloſe from me, but Brutus hath tolde me all. Caſca being amazed at it, the other went on with his tale, and ſayd: why, howe nowe, howe commeth it to paſſe thou art thus riche, that thou doeſt ſue to be Ædilis? Thus Caſca being deceiued by the others doubtfull wordes, he tolde them it was a thowſand to one, he blabbed not out all the conſpiracie. An other Senator called Popilius Lana, after he had ſaluted Brutus and Caſſius more frendlie then he was wont to doe: he rounded ſoftlie in their eares, and told them, I pray the goddes you may goe through with that you haue taken in hande, but withall, diſpatche I reade you, for your enterpriſe is bewrayed. When he had F ſayd, he preſentlie departed from them, and left them both affrayed that their conſpiracie woulde out. Nowe in the meane time, there came one of Brutus men poſt haſt vnto him, and tolde him his wife was a dying. For Porcia being verie carefull and penſiue for that which was to come, and being too weake to away with so great and inward griefe of minde: she coulde hardlie keepe within, but was frighted with euerie litle noyse and crie she hearde, as those that are taken and possest with the furie of the Bacchantes, asking euery man that came from the market place, what Brutus did, and still sent messenger after messenger, to knowe what newes. At length, Cæsars comming being prolonged as you haue heard, Porciaes weakenesse was not able to holde out any lenger, and thereuppon she sodainlie swounded, that she had no leasure to goe to her chamber, but was taken in the middest of her house, where her speache and sences failed her. Howbeit she soone came to her selfe againe, and so was layed in her bedde, and tended by her women. When Brutus heard these newes, it grieued him, as it is to be presupposed: yet he left not of the care of his contrie and common wealth, neither went home to his house for any newes he heard. Nowe, it was reported that Cæsar was comming in his litter: for he determined not to stay in the Senate all that day (bicause he was affrayed of the vnluckie signes of the sacrifices) but to adiorne matters of importaunce vnto the next session and counsell holden, fayning him selfe not to be well at ease. When Cæsar came out of his litter: Popilius Læna, that had talked before with Brutus and Cassius, and had prayed the goddes they might bring this enterprise to passe: went vnto Cæsar, and kept him a long time with a talke. Cæsar gaue good eare vnto him. Wherefore the conspirators (if so they shoulde be called) not hearing what he sayd to Cæsar, but coniecturing by that he had tolde them a litle before, that his talke was none other but the verie discouerie of their conspiracie: they were affrayed euerie man of them, and one looking in an others face, it was easie to see that they all were of a minde, that it was no tarying for them till they were apprehended, but rather that they should kill them selues with their owne hands. And when Cassius and certeine other clapped their handes on their swordes vnder their gownes to draw them: Brutus marking the countenaunce and gesture of Læna, and considering that he did vse him selfe rather like an humble and earnest suter, then like an accuser: he sayd nothing to his companion (bicause there were many amongest them that were not of the conspiracie) but with a pleasaunt countenaunce encouraged Cassius. And immediatlie after, Læna went from Cæsar, and kissed his hande: which shewed plainlie that it was for some matter concerning him selfe, that he had held him so long in talke. Nowe all the Senators being entred first into this place or chapter house where the counsell should be kept: all the other conspirators straight stoode about Cæsars chaire, as if they had had some thing to haue sayd vnto him. And some say, that Cassius casting his eyes vpon Pompeys image, made his prayer vnto it, as if it had bene aliue. * Trebonius on thother side, drewe Antonius aside, as he came into the house where the Senate sate, and helde him with a long talke without. When Cæsar was come into the house, all the Senate rose to honor him at his comming in. So when he was set, the conspirators flocked about him, & amongst them they presented one * Tullius Cimber, who made humble sute for the calling home againe of his brother that was banished. They all made as though they were intercessors for him, and tooke him by the handes, and kissed his head and brest. Cæsar at the first, simplie refused their kindnesse and intreaties: but afterwardes, perceiuing they still pressed on him, he violently thrust them from him. Then Cimber with both his hands plucked Cæsars gowne ouer his shoulders, and Casca that stoode behinde him, drew his dagger first, and strake Cæsar vpon the shoulder, but gaue him no great wound. Cæsar feeling him selfe hurt, tooke him straight by the hande he held his dagger in, and cried out in Latin: O traitor, Casca, what doest thou? Casca on thother side cried in Græke, and called his brother to helpe him. So diuers running on a heape together to flie vppon Cæsar, he looking about him to haue fledde, sawe Brutus with a sworde drawen in his hande readie to strike at him: then he let Cascaes hande goe, and casting his gowne ouer his face, suffered euerie man to strike at him that woulde. Then the conspirators thronging one vpon an other bicause euerie man was desirous to haue a cut at him, so many swords and daggers lighting vpon one bodie, one of them hurte an other, and among them Brutus caught a blowe on his hande, bicause he would make one in murdering of him, and all the rest also were euery man of them bloudied. Cæsar being slaine in this maner, Brutus standing in the middest of the house, would haue spoken, and stayed the other Senators that were not of the conspiracie, to haue tolde them

A them the reaſon why they had done this facte. But they as men both affrayd and amazed, fled one vpon anothers necke in haſte to get out at the dore, and no man followed them. For it was ſet downe, and agreed betwene them, that they ſhould kill no man but Cæſar onely, and ſhould intreate all the reſt to looke to defend their libertie. All the conſpirators, but Brutus, determining vpon this matter, thought it good alſo to kill Antonius, bicauſe he was a wicked man, and that in nature fauored tyranny: beſides alſo, for that he was in great eſtimation with ſouldiers, hauing bene conuerſant of long time amongeſt them: and ſpecially, hauing a mind bent to great enterpriſes, he was alſo of great authoritie at that time, being Conſul with Cæſar. But Brutus would not agree to it. Firſt, for that he ſayd it was not honeſt: ſecondly, bicauſe he told them there was hope of chaunge in him. For he did not miſtruſt, but that Antonius be-

B ing a noble minded and coragious man (when he ſhould knowe that Cæſar was dead) would willingly helpe his contry to recouer her libertie, hauing them an example vnto him, to follow their corage and vertue. So Brutus by this meanes ſaued Antonius life, who at that preſent time diſguiſed him ſelfe, and ſtale away. But Brutus & his conſorts, hauing their ſwords bloudy in their handes, went ſtraight to the Capitoll, perſwading the Romanes as they went, to take their libertie againe. Now, at the firſt time when the murther was newly done, there were ſodaine outcryes of people that ranne vp & downe the citie, the which in deede did the more increaſe the feare and tumult. But when they ſaw they ſlue no man, nether did ſpoyle or make hauock of any thing: then certaine of the Senators, & many of the people imboldening them ſelues, went to the Capitoll vnto them. There a great number of men being aſſembled toge-

C ther one after another: Brutus made an oration vnto them to winne the fauor of the people, and to iuſtifie that they had done. All thoſe that were by, ſayd they had done well, and cryed vnto them that they ſhould boldly come downe from the Capitoll. Whereuppon, Brutus and his companions came boldly downe into the market place. The reſt followed in trowpe, but Brutus went formoſt, very honorably compaſſed in round about with the nobleſt men of the citie, which brought him from the Capitoll, thorough the market place, to the pulpit for orations. When the people ſaw him in the pulpit, although they were a multitude of rakehells of all ſortes, and had a good will to make ſome ſturre: yet being aſhamed to doe it for the reuerence they bare vnto Brutus, they kept ſilence, to heare what he would ſay. When Brutus began to ſpeake, they gaue him quiet audience: howbeit immediatly after, they ſhewed that

D they were not all contented with the murther. For when another called Cinna would haue ſpoken, and began to accuſe Cæſar: they fell into a great vprore among them, and marueloufly reuiled him. Inſomuch that the conſpirators returned againe into the Capitol. There Brutus being affrayd to be beſeeged, ſent back againe the noble men that came thither with him, thinking it no reaſon, that they which were no partakers of the murther, ſhould be partakers of the daunger. Then the next morning the Senate being aſſembled, and holden within the temple of the goddeſſe Tellus, to wete the earth: and Antonius, Plancus, and Cicero, hauing made a motion to the Senate in that aſſembly, that they ſhould take an order to pardon and forget all that was paſt, and to ſtabliſhe friendſhip and peace againe: it was decreed, that they ſhould not onely be pardoned, but alſo that the Conſuls ſhould referre it to the Senate what honors

Honors decreed for the murtherers of Cæſar.

E ſhould be appoynted vnto them. This being agreed vpon, the Senate brake vp, and Antonius the Conſul, to put them in hart that were in the Capitoll, ſent them his ſonne for a pledge. Vpon this aſſurance, Brutus and his companions came downe from the Capitoll, where euery man ſaluted and imbraced eche other, among the which, Antonius him ſelfe did bid Caſſius to ſupper to him: and Lepidus alſo bad Brutus, and ſo one bad another, as they had friendſhip and acquaintance together. The next day following, the Senate being called againe to counſell, did firſt of all commend Antonius, for that he had wiſely ſtayed and quenched the beginning of a ciuill warre: then they alſo gaue Brutus and his conſorts great prayſes, and laſtly they appoynted them ſeuerall gouernments of prouinces. For vnto Brutus, they appoynted Creta: Africk, vnto Caſſius: Aſia, vnto Trebonius: Bithynia, vnto Cimber: and vnto the o-

and not in hugger mugger, leaſt the people might thereby take occaſion to be worſe offended if they did otherwiſe: Caſſius ſtowtly ſpake againſt it. But Brutus went with the motion, & agreed vnto it: wherein it ſeemeth he committed a ſecond fault. For the firſt fault he did was, when he would not conſent to his fellow conſpirators, that Antonius ſhould be ſlayne: And therefore he was iuſtly accuſed, that thereby he had ſaued and ſtrengthened a ſtronge & grieuous enemy of their conſpiracy. The ſecond fault was, when he agreed that Cæſars funeralls ſhould be as Antonius would haue them: the which in deede marred all. For firſt of all, when Cæſars teſtament was openly red amonge them, whereby it appeared that he bequeathed vnto euery Citizen of Rome, 75. Drachmas a man, and that he left his gardens and arbors vnto the people, which he had on this ſide of the riuer of Tyber, in the place where now the temple of Fortune is built: the people then loued him, and were maruelous ſory for him. Afterwards when Cæſars body was brought into the market place, Antonius making his funerall oration in praiſe of the dead, according to the auncient cuſtom of Rome, and perceiuing that his wordes moued the common people to compaſſion: he framed his eloquence to make their harts yerne the more, and taking Cæſars gowne all bloudy in his hand, he layed it open to the ſight of them all, ſhewing what a number of cuts and holes it had vpon it. Therewithall the people fell preſently into ſuch a rage and mutinie, that there was no more order kept amongeſt the common people. For ſome of them cryed out, kill the murtherers: others plucked vp formes, tables, and ſtalles about the market place, as they had done before at the funeralls of Clodius, and hauing layed them all on a heape together, they ſet them on fire, and thereuppon did put the bodye of Cæſar, and burnt it in the middeſt of the moſt holy places. And furthermore, when the fire was thoroughly kindled, ſome here, ſome there, tooke burning fire brands, and ranne with them to the murtherers houſes that had killed him, to ſet them a fire. Howbeit the conſpirators foreſeeing the daunger before, had wiſely prouided for them ſelues, and fled. But there was a Poet called Cinna, who had bene no partaker of the conſpiracy, but was alway one of Cæſars chiefeſt friends: he dreamed the night before, that Cæſar bad him to ſupper with him, and that he refuſing to goe, Cæſar was very importunate with him, and compelled him, ſo that at length he led him by the hand into a great darke place, where being maruelouſly affrayd, he was driuen to follow him in ſpite of his hart. This dreame put him all night into a feuer, and yet notwithſtanding, the next morning when he heard that they caried Cæſars body to buriall, being aſhamed not to accompany his funerals: he went out of his houſe, and thruſt him ſelf into the preaſe of the common people that were in a great vprore. And bicauſe ſome one called him by his name, Cinna: the people thinking he had bene that Cinna, who in an oration he made had ſpoken very euill of Cæſar, they falling vpon him in their rage, ſlue him outright in the market place. This made Brutus and his companions more affrayd, then any other thing, next vnto the chaunge of Antonius. Wherefore they got them out of Rome, and kept at the firſt in the citie of Antium, hoping to returne againe to Rome, when the furie of the people were a litle aſſwaged. The which they hoped would be quickly, conſidering that they had to deale with a fickle and vnconſtant multitude, eaſye to be caried, and that the Senate ſtoode for them: who notwithſtanding made no enquiery of them that had torne poore Cinna the Poet in peeces, but cauſed them to be ſought for and apprehended, that went with fire brands to ſet fire of the conſpirators houſes. The people growing weary now of Antonius pride and inſolency, who ruled all things in manner with abſolute power: they deſired that Brutus might returne againe, and it was alſo looked for, that Brutus would come him ſelfe in perſon to playe the playes which were due to the people, by reaſon of his office of Prætorſhip. But Brutus vnderſtanding that many of Cæſars ſouldiers which ſerued vnder him in the warres, and that alſo had lands and houſes giuen them in the cities where they lay, did lye in wayte for him to kill him, and that they dayly by ſmall companies came by one and by one into Rome: he durſt no more returne thither, but yet the people had the pleaſure and paſtyme in his abſence, to ſee the games and ſportes he made them, which were ſumptuouſlie ſet foorth and furniſhed with all thinges neceſſarie, ſparing for no coſt. For he had bought a great number of ſtraunge beaſtes, of the which he would not geue one of them to any frende he had, but that they ſhoulde all be employed in his

A his games: and went him ſelfe as farre as BYZANTIVM, to ſpeake to ſome players of comedies and Muſitions that were there. And further he wrote vnto his friends for one Canutius an excellent player, that whatſoeuer they did, they ſhould intreate him to play in theſe playes: For, ſayd he, it is no reaſon to compell any GRÆCIAN, vnles he will come of his owne good will. Moreouer, he wrote alſo vnto Cicero, and earneſtly prayed him in any caſe to be at theſe playes. Now the ſtate of ROME ſtanding in theſe termes, there fell out an other chaunge and alteracion, when the younge man Octauius Cæſar came to ROME. He was the ſonne of Iulius Cæſars Nece, whome he had adopted for his ſonne, and made his heire, by his laſt will and teſtament. But when Iulius Cæſar his adopted father was ſlayne, he was in the citie of APOLLONIA, where he ſtudied tarying for him, bicauſe he was determined to make warre with the

B PARTHIANS: but when he heard the newes of his death, hę returned againe to ROME, where to begin to curry fauor with the common people, he firſt of all tooke vpon him his adopted fathers name, & made diſtribution amonge them of the money which his father had bequeathed vnto them. By this meanes he troubled Antonius ſorely, and by force of money, got a great number of his fathers ſouldiers together, that had ſerued in the warres with him. And Cicero him ſelfe, for the great malice he bare Antonius, did fauor his proceedings. But Brutus marueloufly reproued him for it, and wrote vnto him, that he ſeemed by his doinges not to be ſory to haue a Maiſter, but onely to be affrayd to haue one that ſhould hate him: and that all his doinges in the common wealth did witneſſe, that he choſe to be ſubiect to a milde and curteous bondage, ſith by his words and writings he did commend this young man Octauius

C Cæſar, to be a good and gentle Lorde. For our predeceſſors ſayde he, would neuer abyde to be ſubiect to any Maiſters, how gentle or mild ſoeuer they were: and for his owne part that he had neuer reſolutely determined with him ſelfe to make warre, or peace, but otherwiſe, that he was certenly minded neuer to be ſlaue nor ſubiect. And therefore he wondred much at him, how Cicero coulde be affrayd of the daunger of ciuill warres, and would not be affrayd of a ſhameful peace: and that to thruſt Antonius out of the vſurped tyranny, in recompence he went about to ſtabliſhe younge Octauius Cæſar tyranne. Theſe were the contents of Brutus firſt letters he wrote vnto Cicero. Now, the citie of ROME being deuided in two factions, ſome taking part with Antonius, other alſo leaning vnto Octauius Cæſar, and the ſouldiers making port ſale of their ſeruice to him that would giue moſt: Brutus ſeeing the ſtate of ROME would

D be vtterly ouerthrowen, he determined to goe out of ITALY, and went a foote through the contry of LVKE, vnto the citie of ELEA, ſtanding by the ſea. There Porcia being ready to departe from her husband Brutus, and to returne to ROME, did what ſhe could to diſſemble the griefe and ſorow ſhe felt at her hart: But a certaine paynted table bewrayed her in the ende, although vntill that time ſhe alwayes ſhewed a conſtant and pacient mind. The deuiſe of the table was taken out of the Greeke ſtories, howe Andromachè accompanied her husband Hector, when he went out of the citie of TROY to goe to the warres, and how Hector deliuered her his litle ſonne, and how her eyes were neuer of him. Porcia ſeeing this picture, and likening her ſelfe to be in the ſame caſe, ſhe fell a weeping: and comming thither oftentymes in a day to ſee it, ſhe wept ſtill. Acilius one of Brutus friendes perceiuing that, rehearſed the verſes Andromachè ſpeaketh to this purpoſe in Homer:

Porcias ſorowfull returne to Rome for the abſence of her husband Brutus.

The ſtory of Hector and Andromache ſet forth in painted tables

E Thou Hector art my father, and my mother, and my brother, And husband eke, and in all: I mind not any other.

Then Brutus ſmyling, aunſwered againe: but yet (ſayd he) I can not for my part ſay vnto Porcia, as Hector aunſwered Andromache in the ſame place of the Poet:

Tush, meddle thou vvith vveying dewly ovvt Thy mayds their task, and pricking on a clovvt.

For in deede, the weake conſtitution of her body, doth not ſuffer her to performe in ſhew, the valliant acts that we are able to doe: but for corage and conſtant minde, ſhe ſhewed her ſelfe as ſtowt in the defence of her contry, as any of vs. Bibulus, the ſonne of Porcia, reporteth

F this ſtory thus. Now Brutus imbarking at ELEA in LVKE, he ſayled directly towards ATHENS. When he arriued there, the people of ATHENS receiued him with common ioyes of reioycing, and honorable decrees made for him. He lay with a friend of his, with whome he went daily to heare the lectures of Theomneſtus ACADEMICK Philoſopher, and of Cratippus the PERIPATETICK, and ſo would talke with them in Philoſophie, that it ſeemed he left all other matters, and gaue himſelfe onely vnto ſtudye: howbeit ſecretly notwithſtanding, he made preparation for warre. For he ſent Heroſtratus into MACEDON, to winne the Captaines and ſouldiers that were vpon thoſe marches, & he did alſo enterteyne all the younge gentlemen of the ROMANES, whome he founde in ATHENS ſtudying Philoſophie: amongeſt them he found Ciceroes ſonne, whome he highly prayſed and commended, ſaying, that whether he waked or ſlept, he found him of a noble mind and diſpoſition, he did in nature ſo much hate tyrannes. Shortly after, he began to enter openly into armes: and being aduertiſed that there came out of ASIA a certaine fleete of ROMANE ſhips that had good ſtore of money in them, and that the Captaine of thoſe ſhippes (who was an honeſt man, and his famillier friende) came towards ATHENS: he went to meete him as farre as the Ile of CARYSTOS, and hauing ſpoken with him there, he handled him ſo, that he was contented to leaue his ſhippes in his hands. Whereuppon he made him a notable banket at his houſe, bicauſe it was on his birth day. When the feaſt day came, & that they began to drinke luſtely one to another: the gheſts dranke to the victorie of Brutus, and the libertie of the ROMANES. Brutus therefore to encorage them further, called for a bigger cuppe, & holding it in his hand, before he dranke ſpake this alowd:

Brutus commendeth Ciceroes ſonne.

Brutus prepareth him ſelfe to warre.

My deſtiny and Phœbus are agreede, To bring me to my finall end vvith ſpeede.

And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that the ſame day he fought his laſt battell by the citie of PHILIPPES, as he came out of his tent, he gaue his men for the word and ſignall of battell, Phœbus: ſo that it was thought euer ſince, that this his ſodaine crying out at the feaſt, was a prognoſtication of his misfortune that ſhould happen. After this, Antiſtius gaue him of the money he caried into ITALY, 50. Myriades. Furthermore, all Pompeys ſouldiers that ſtragled vp and downe THESSALY, came with very good will vnto him. He tooke from Cinna alſo, fiue hundred horſemen, which he caried into ASIA, vnto Dolabella. After that, he went by ſea vnto the city of DEMETRIADE, and there tooke a great deale of armor and munition which was going to Antonius: and the which had bene made and forged there by Iulius Cæſars commaundement, for the warres againſt the PARTHIANS. Furthermore, Hortenſius gouernor of MACEDON, did reſigne the gouernment thereof vnto him. Beſides, all the Princes, kings and noble men thereabouts, came and ioyned with him, when it was told him that Caius, (Antonius brother) comming out of ITALY, had paſſed the ſea, & came with great ſpeede towards the citie of DYRRACHIVM, and APOLLONIA, to get the ſouldiers into his hands, which Gabinius had there. Brutus therefore to preuent him, went preſently with a fewe of his men in the middeſt of winter when it ſnewe hard, and tooke his way thorough hard and fowle contries, and made ſuch ſpeede in deede, that he was there long before Antonius ſumpters, that caried the vittells. So that when he came neare vnto DYRRACHIVM, a diſeaſe tooke him which the Phiſitions call Βουλιμία, to ſay, a cormorant and vnſatiable appetite to eate: by reaſon of the cold and paynes he had taken. This ſicknes chaunceth often, both to men & beaſts, that trauaile when it hath ſnowen: Either bicauſe the naturall heate being retyred into the inward parts of the body, by the coldnes of the ayer hardening the skinne, doth ſtraight digeſt and conſume the meate: or els bicauſe a ſharpe ſuttell wind comming by reaſon of the ſnow when it is molten, doth pearce into the body, and driueth out the naturall heate which was caſt outward. For it ſeemeth, that the heate being quenched with the cold, which it meeteth withall comming out of the skinne of the body: cauſeth the ſweates that follow the diſeaſe. But hereof we haue ſpoken at large in other places. Brutus being very faynt, and hauing nothing in his campe to eate: his ſouldiers were compelled to goe to their enemies, & comming to the gates of the citie, they prayed the warders to helpe them to bread. When they heard in what caſe Brutus was, they brought him both meate and drinke: in requitall whereof, afterwards when he wanne the citie, he did not onely intreate and vſe the Citizens thereof curteouſly, but all the inhabitants of the citie alſo for their ſakes. Now, when Caius Antonius was arriued in the citie of APOLLONIA, he ſent vnto the ſouldiers thereabouts to come

A vnto him. But when he vnderſtoode that they went all to Brutus, and furthermore, that the Citizens of Apollonia did fauor him much: he then forſooke that citie, and went vnto the citie of Bvthrotvs, but yet he loſt three of his enſeignes by the way, that were ſlayne euery man of them. Then he ſought by force to winne certaine places of ſtrength about Bylis, & to driue Brutus men from thence, that had taken it before: and therefore to obtayne his purpoſe, he fought a battell with Cicero, the ſonne of Marcus Tullius Cicero, by whome he was ouercome. For Brutus made the younger Cicero a Captaine, and did many notable exployes by his ſeruice. Shortly after, hauing ſtolen vpon Caius Antonius in certein mariſhes farre from the place from whence he fled: he would not ſet on him with furie, but onely road round about him, commaunding his ſouldiers to ſpare him & his men, as reckoning them all his own B without ſtroke ſtriking: and ſo in deede it hapned. For they yelded them ſelues, and their Captaine Antonius, vnto Brutus: ſo that Brutus had now a great army about him. Now Brutus kept this Caius Antonius long time in his office, and neuer tooke from him the markes and ſignes of his Conſulſhip, although many of his friends, & Cicero among others, wrote vnto him to put him to death. But when he ſawe Antonius ſecretly practiſed with his Captaines to make ſome alteracion: then he ſent him into a ſhippe, and made him to be kept there. When the ſouldiers whome C. Antonius had corrupted, were gotten into the citie of Apollonia, and ſent from thence vnto Brutus to come vnto them: he made them aunſwer, that it was not the maner of Romane Captaines to come to the ſouldiers, but the ſouldiers to come to the Captaine, and to craue pardon for their offences committed. Thereuppon they came to him, and C he pardoned them. So Brutus preparing to goe into Asia, newes came vnto him of the great chaunge at Rome. For Octauius Cæſar was in armes, by commaundement and authoritie from the Senate, againſt Marcus Antonius. But after that he had driuen Antonius out of Italy, the Senate then began to be affrayd of him: bicauſe he ſued to be Conſul, which was contrary to the law, and kept a great army about him, when the Empire of Rome had no neede of them. On the other ſide, Octauius Cæſar perceiuing the Senate ſtayed not there, but turned vnto Brutus that was out of Italy, and that they appoynted him the gouernment of certaine prouinces: then he began to be affrayd for his part, and ſent vnto Antonius to offer him his friendſhip. Then comming on with his armye neare to Rome, he made him ſelfe to be choſen Conſul, whether the Senate would or not, when he was yet but a ſtrippling or ſpringal of twenty yeare D old, as him ſelfe reporteth in his owne commentaries. So when he was Conſul, he preſently appoynted Iudges to accuſe Brutus and his companions, for killing of the nobleſt perſon in Rome, and chiefeſt Magiſtrate, without law or iudgement: and made L. Cornificius accuſe Brutus, and M. Agrippa, Caſſius. So, the parties accuſed were condemned, bicauſe the Iudges were compelled to giue ſuch ſentence. The voyce went, that when the Herauld (according to the cuſtom after ſentence giuen) went vp to the chaier or pulpit for orations, & proclaymed Brutus with a lowd voyce, ſummoning him to appeare in perſon before the Iudges: the people that ſtoode by ſighed openly, and the noble men that were preſent honge downe their heads, & durſt not ſpeake a word. Among them, the teares fell from Publius Silicius eyes: who ſhortly after, was one of the proſcripts or outlawes appoynted to be ſlayne. After that, theſe three E Octauius Cæſar, Antonius, and Lepidus, made an agreement betwene them ſelues, and by thoſe articles deuided the prouinces belonging to the Empire of Rome amonge them ſelues, and did ſet vp billes of proſcription and outlary, condemning two hundred of the nobleſt men of Rome to ſuffer death, and among that number, Cicero was one. Newes being brought thereof into Macedon, Brutus being then inforced to it, wrote vnto Hortenſius, that he ſhould put Caius Antonius to death, to be reuenged of the death of Cicero, and of the other Brutus, of the which the one was his friend, and the other his kinſeman. For this cauſe therefore, Antonius afterwards taking Hortenſius at the battell of Philippes, he made him to be ſlayne vpon his brothers tombe. But then Brutus ſayd, that he was more aſhamed of the cauſe for the which Cicero was ſlayne, then he was otherwiſe ſory for his death: and that he could not but greatly F reproue his friendes he had at Rome, who were ſlaues more through their owne fault, then through their valliantnes or manhood which vſurped the tyranny: conſidering that they were ſo cowardly and faynt harted, as to ſuffer the ſight of thoſe things before their eyes, the report whereof ſhould onely haue grieued them to the hart. Nowe when Brutus had paſſed ouer his army (that was very great) into ASIA, he gaue order for the gathering of a great number of ſhippes together, aſwell in the coaſt of BITHYNIA, as alſo in the citie of CYZICVM, bicauſe he would haue an army by ſea: and him ſelfe in the meane time went vnto the cities, taking order for all things, and giuing audience vnto Princes and noble men of the contry that had to doe with him. Afterwards, he ſent vnto Caſſius in SYRIA, to turne him from his iorney into ÆGYPT, telling him that it was not for the conqueſt of any kingdom for them ſelues, that they wandred vp and downe in that ſort, but contrarily, that it was to reſtore their contry againe to their libertie: and that the multitude of ſouldiers they gathered together, was to ſubdue the tyrannes that would keepe them in ſlauery and ſubiection. Wherefore regarding their chiefe purpoſe and intent, they ſhould not be farre from ITALY, as neare as they could poſſible, but ſhould rather make all the haſte they could, to helpe their contry men. Caſſius beleued him, & returned. Brutus went to meete him, and they both met at the citie of SMYRNA, which was the firſt time that they ſaw together, ſince they tooke leaue eche of other, at the hauen of PIRÆA in ATHENS: the one going into SYRIA, and the other into MACEDON. So they were maruelous ioyfull, and no leſſe coragious, when they ſaw the great armies together which they had both leauied: conſidering that they departing out of ITALY, like naked and poore baniſhed men, without armor and money, nor hauing any ſhippe ready, nor ſouldier about them, nor any one towne at their commaundement: yet notwithſtanding, in a ſhort time after they were now met together, hauing ſhippes, money and ſouldiers enowe, both footemen & horſemen, to fight for the Empire of ROME. Now Caſſius would haue done Brutus as much honor, as Brutus did vnto him: but Brutus moſt commonly preuented him, and went firſt vnto him, both bicauſe he was the elder man, as alſo for that he was ſickly of bodye. And men reputed him commonly to be very skilfull in warres, but otherwiſe maruelous chollerick and cruell, who ſought to rule men by feare, rather then with lenitie: and on the other ſide he was too familier with his friends, and would ieſt too brodely with them. But Brutus in contrary manner, for his vertue and valliantnes, was wellbeloued of the people and his owne, eſteemed of noble men, and hated of no man, not ſo much as of his enemies: bicauſe he was a maruelous lowly and gentle perſon, noble minded, and would neuer be in any rage, nor caried away with pleaſure and couetouſnes, but had euer an vpright mind with him, and would neuer yeeld to any wronge or iniuſtice, the which was the chiefeſt cauſe of his fame, of his riſing, and of the good will that euery man bare him: for they were all perſwaded that his intent was good. For they did not certainly beleue, that if Pompey him ſelfe had ouercome Cæſar, he would haue reſigned his authoritie to the law: but rather they were of opinion, that he would ſtill keepe the ſouerainty and abſolute gouernment in his hands, taking onely, to pleaſe the people, the title of Conſul or Dictator, or of ſome other more ciuill office. And as for Caſſius, a hot, chollerick, & cruell man, that would oftentymes be caried away from iuſtice for gayne: it was certainly thought that he made warre, and put him ſelfe into ſundry daungers, more to haue abſolute power and authoritie, then to defend the libertie of his contry. For, they that will alſo conſider others, that were elder men then they, as Cinna, Marius, and Carbo: it is out of doubt that the ende and hope of their victorie, was to be Lordes of their contry: and in manner they did all confeſſe that they fought for the tyranny, and to be Lordes of the Empire of ROME. And in contrary manner, his enemies them ſelues did neuer reproue Brutus, for any ſuch chaunge or deſire. For, it was ſayd that Antonius ſpake it openly diuers tymes, that he thought, that of all them that had ſlayne Cæſar, there was none but Brutus only that was moued to doe it, as thinking the acte commendable of it ſelfe: but that all the other conſpirators did conſpire his death, for ſome priuate malice or enuy, that they otherwiſe did beare vnto him. Hereby it appeareth, that Brutus did not truſt ſo much to the power of his army, as he did to his owne vertue: as is to be ſeene by his writings. For approaching neare to the inſtant daunger, he wrote vnto Pomponius Atticus, that his affayres had the beſt happe that could be. For, ſayd he, eyther I will ſet my contry at libertie by battell, or by honorable death rid me of this bondage. And furthermore, that they being certeine and aſſured of all thinges els, this one thing onely was doubtfull to them: whether they ſhould liue or dye with libertie. He wrote alſo that Antonius had

A had his due paiment for his folly. For where he might haue bene a partner equally of the glory of Brutus, Caßius, and Cato, & haue made one with them: he liked better to chooſe to be ioyned with Octauius Cæſar alone: with whome, though now he be not ouercome by vs, yet ſhall he ſhortly after alſo haue warre with him. And truely he proued a true Prophet, for ſo came it in deede to paſſe. Now whileſt Brutus and Caßius were together in the citie of SMYRNA: Brutus prayed Caßius to let him haue ſome part of his money whereof he had great ſtore, bicauſe all that he could rappe and rend of his ſide, he had beſtowed it in making ſo great a number of ſhippes, that by meanes of them they ſhould keepe all the ſea at their commaundement. Caßius friendes hindered this requeſt, and earneſtly diſſwaded him from it: perſwading him, that it was no reaſon that Brutus ſhould haue the money which Caßius had gotten together by

B ſparing, and leauied with great euill will of the people their ſubiects, for him to beſtowe liberally vppon his ſouldiers, and by this meanes to winne their good willes, by Caßius charge. This notwithſtanding, Caßius gaue him the thirde parte of his totall ſumme. So Caſſius and Brutus then departing from eche other, Caſſius tooke the citie of RHODES, where he too diſhoneſtly & cruelly vſed him ſelfe: although when he came into the citie, he aunſwered ſome of the inhabitants, who called him Lord and king, that he was nether Lord nor king, but he onely that had ſlaine him, that would haue bene Lord and king. Brutus departing from thence, ſent vnto the LYCIANS, to require money, and men of warre. But there was a certaine Orator called Naucrates, that made the cities to rebell againſt him, inſomuch that the contry men of that contry kept the ſtraights and litle mountaines, thinking by that meanes to ſtoppe Brutus

But they were ſo fierce and obſtinate, that they would mutyne for euery ſmall hurt they receyued as they paſſed by their contry, and did deſpiſe his curteſie and good nature: vntill that at length he went to beſeege the citie of the XANTHIANS, within the which were ſhut vppe the cruelleſt and moſte warrelikeſt men of LYCIA. There was a ryuer that ranne by the walls of the citie, in the which many men ſaued them ſelues, ſwymming betweene two waters, and ſledde: howbeit they layed nettes ouerthwart the ryuer, and tyed litle bells on the toppe of them, to

The winde by chaunce was maruelous bygge, and increaſed the flame ſo ſore, that it violently caried it into the cranewes of the wall of the citie, ſo that the next houſes vnto them were ſtraight ſet a fire thereby. Wherefore Brutus beeing affrayde that all the citie woulde take of a fire, he preſently commaunded his men to quenche the fire, and to ſaue the towne if it might be. But the LYCIANS at that inſtant fell into ſuch a frenſie, and ſtraunge and horrible diſpayre, that no man can well expreſſe it: and a man can not more rightly compare or lyken it, then to a franticke and moſte deſperate deſire to dye. The citie of Xanthus ſet a fire.

The deſperate ende of the Xanthians.

E and children, Maiſters and ſeruaunts, and of all ſortes of age whatſoeuer, fought vppon the ramper of their walles, and did caſt downe ſtones and fierworkes on the ROMANES, which were very buſie in quenching the flame of the fire, to ſaue the citie. And in contrary manner alſo, they brought fagotts, drye wodde, and reedes, to bringe the fire further into the citie aſmuch as might bee, increaſing it by ſuche thinges as they brought. Nowe when the fire had gotten into all the partes of the citie, and that the flame burnt bright in euery place: Brutus beeing ſorye to ſee it, gotte vppon his horſe, and rode rownde about the walles of the citie, to ſee if it were poſſible to ſaue it, and helde vppe his handes to the inhabitants, praying them to pardon their cityes, and to ſaue them ſelues. Howbeit they woulde not be perſwaded, but did all that they coulde poſſible to caſt them ſelues away;

F not onely men and women, but alſo litle children. For ſome of them weeping and crying out, did caſt them ſelues into the fire: others headlong throwing them ſelues downe from the walles, brake their neckes: others alſo made their neckes bare, to the naked swordes of their fathers, and vndid their clothes, praying them to kill them their owne A handes. After the citye was burnt, they founde a woman hanged vppe by the necke, holding one of her children in her hande deade by her, hanged vppe also: and in the other hande a burning torche setting fire on her house. Some woulde haue had Brutus to haue seene her, but he woulde not see so horrible and tragicall a sight: but when he heard it, he fell a weeping, and caused a Herauld to make proclamation by sownd of trompet, that he woulde giue a certaine summe of money, to euery souldier that coulde saue a XANTHIAN. So there were not (as it is reported) aboue fiftye of them saued, and yet they were saued against their willes. Thus the XANTHIANS hauing ended the reuolution of their fatall destinie, after a longe continuance of tyme: they did through their desperation, renue the memorie of the lamentable calamities of their Auncestors. Who in like manner, in the warres B of the PERSIANS, did burne their citie, and destroyed them selues. Therefore Brutus likewise beseeging the citie of the PATARBIANS, perceyuing that they stowtly resisted him: he was also affrayde of that, and could not well tell whether he should giue assault to it, or not, least they woulde fall into the dispayre and desperation of the XANTHIANS. Howbeit hauing taken certaine of their women prisoners, he sent them backe agayne, without payment of ransome. Nowe they that were the wiues and Daughters of the noblest men of the citie, reporting vnto their parents, that they had founde Brutus a mercifull, iuste, and curteous man: they perswaded them to yeelde them selues and their citie vnto him, the which they did. So after they had thus yeelded them selues, diuers other cities also followed them, and did the like: and founde Brutus more mercifull and curteous, then they thought they should C haue done, but specially farre aboue Cassius. For Cassius, about the selfe same tyme, after he had compelled the RHODIANS euery man to deliuer all the ready money they had in gold and siluer in their houses, the which being brought together, amounted to the summe of eyght thowsande talents: yet he condemned the citie besides, to paye the summe of fiue hundred talents more. Where Brutus in contrary manner, after he had leauyed of all the contrye of LYCIA but a hundred and fiftye talents onely: he departed thence into the contrye of IONIA, and did them no more hurt. Nowe Brutus in all this iorney, did many notable actes and worthy of memorie, bothe for rewarding, as also in punishing those that had deserued it: Wherefore amonge the rest, I will tell you of one thinge, of the which he him selfe, and all the noble men of the ROMANES were maruelous glad. When Pompey the great (ha- D uing lost the battell against Iulius Cæsar, in the fieldes of PHARSALIA) came and fell vppon the coast of ÆGYPT, hard by the citie of PELVSIVM: those that were protectors to the young king Ptolomy, beeing then but a childe, sate in counsell with his seruaunts and friendes, what they shoulde determine in that case. They were not all of one mynde in this consultacion: for some thought it good to receyue Pompey, others also, that they shoulde driue him out of ÆGYPT. But there was a certayne Rethoritian called Theodotus, that was borne in the Ile of CHIO, who was the kinges Schoolemaister to teache him Rethoricke. He beeing called to this counsell for lacke of sufficienter men, sayde, that bothe the one and the other side went awrye, aswell those that were of opinion to receyue Pompey, as the other that woulde haue had him driuen awaye: and that the best waye was (considering the present E tyme) that they shoulde laye holde on him, and kill him, adding withall, this sentence, that a deade man byteth not. The whole counsell stucke to this opinion. So, for a notable example of incredible misfortune, and vnlooked for vnto Pompey: Pompey the great was slayne, by the motion and counsell of this wicked Rethoritian Theodotus, as Theodotus afterwardes did him selfe boast of it. But when Iulius Cæsar came afterwardes into ÆGYPT, the wicked men that consented to this counsell, had their payment according to their deserts: for they dyed euery man of them a wicked death, sauing this Theodotus, whome fortune respyted a litle while lenger, and yet in that tyme he liued a poore and miserable life, neuer tarying longe in any one place. So Brutus going vppe and downe ASIA, Theodotus coulde hyde him selfe no lenger, but was brought vnto Brutus, where he suffered paines of death: F so that he wanne more fame by his deathe, then euer he did in his life. About that tyme, Brutus sent to praye Cassius to come to the citye of SARDIS, and so he did. Brutus

A vnderſtanding of his comming, went to meete him with all his friendes. There, both their armies being armed, they called them both Emperors. Nowe, as it commonly happeth in great affayres betwene two perſons, both of them hauing many friends, and ſo many Captaines vnder them: there ranne tales and complaints betwixt them. Therefore, before they fell in hand with any other matter, they went into a litle chamber together, and bad euery man auoyde, and did ſhut the dores to them. Then they beganne to powre out their complaints one to the other, and grew hot and lowde, earneſtly accuſing one another, and at length fell both a weeping. Their friends that were without the chamber hearing them lowd within, and angry betwene them ſelues, they were both amaſed, and affrayd alſo leſt it would grow to further matter: but yet they were commaunded, that no man ſhould come to them. Notwithſtanding, one

Brutus and Caſſius complaints one vnto the other.

B Marcus Phaonius, that had bene a friend and follower of Cato while he liued, & tooke vpon him to counterfeate a Philoſopher, not with wiſedom and diſcretion, but with a certaine bedlem and frantick motion: he would needes come into the chamber, though the men offered to keepe him out. But it was no boote to let Phaonius, when a mad moode or toye tooke him in the head: for he was a hot haſty man, & ſodaine in all his doings, and cared for neuer a Senator of them all. Now, though he vſed this bold manner of ſpeeche after the profeſſion of the Cynick Philoſophers, (as who would ſay, doggs) yet this boldnes did no hurt many times, becauſe they did but laugh at him to ſee him ſo mad. This Phaonius at that time, in deſpite of the doorekeepers, came into the chamber, and with a certaine ſcoffing & mocking geſture which he counterfeated of purpoſe, he rehearſed the verſes which old Neſtor ſayd in Homer,

M. Phaonius a follower of Cato.

Cynick Philoſophers, counted doggs.

C My Lords, I pray you harken both to mee, For I haue ſeene moe yeares than ſuchye three.

Caſſius fel a laughing at him: but Brutus thruſt him out of the chamber, & called him dogge, and counterfeate Cynick. Howbeit his comming in brake their ſtrife at that time, and ſo they left eche other. The ſelfe ſame night Caſſius prepared his ſupper in his chamber, and Brutus brought his friendes with him. So when they were ſet at ſupper, Phaonius came to ſit downe after he had waſhed. Brutus tolde him alowd, no man ſent for him, and bad them ſet him at the vpper end: meaning in deede at the lower ende of the bed. Phaonius made no ceremonie, but thruſt in amongeſt the middeſt of them, and made all the companye laugh at him: So they were merry all ſupper tyme, and full of their Philoſophie. The next daye after, Brutus, vpon

D complaynt of the SARDIANS, did condemne and noted Lucius Pella for a defamed perſon, that had bene a Prætor of the ROMANES, and whome Brutus had giuen charge vnto: for that he was accuſed and conuicted of robberie, and pilferie in his office. This iudgement much miſliked Caſſius: bicauſe he him ſelfe had ſecretly (not many dayes before) warned two of his friends, attainted and conuicted of the like offences, and openly had cleered them: but yet he did not therefore leaue to employ them in any manner of ſeruice as he did before. And therefore he greatly reproued Brutus, for that he would ſhew him ſelfe ſo ſtraight and ſeuere in ſuch a tyme, as was meeter to beare a litle, then to take thinges at the worſt. Brutus in contrary manner aunſwered, that he ſhoulde remember the Ides of Marche, at which tyme they ſlue Iulius Cæſar: who nether pilled nor polled the contrye, but onely was a fauorer and

E ſuborner of all them that did robbe and ſpoyle, by his countenaunce and authoritie. And if there were any occaſion whereby they might honeſtly ſette aſide iuſtice and equitie: they ſhould haue had more reaſon to haue ſuffered Cæſars friendes, to haue robbed and done what wronge and iniurie they had would, then to beare with their owne men. For then ſayde he, they could but haue ſayde they had bene cowards: and nowe they may accuſe vs of iniuſtice, beſide the paynes we take, and the daunger we put our ſelues into. And thus may we ſee what Brutus intent and purpoſe was. But as they both prepared to paſſe ouer againe, out of ASIA into EVROPE: there went a rumor that there appeared a wonderfull ſigne vnto him. Brutus was a carefull man, and ſlept very litle, both for that his dyet was moderate, as alſo bicauſe he was continually occupied. He neuer ſlept in the day tyme, and in the night no lenger, then the

F tyme he was driuen to be alone, and when euery bodye els tooke their reſt. But nowe whileſt he was in warre, and his heade euer buſily occupied to thinke of his affayres, and what would happen: after he had ſlumbered a litle after ſupper, he ſpent all the reſt of the night in diſpatching of his waightieſt cauſes, and after he had taken order for them, if he had any leyſure left him, he would read ſome booke till the third watche of the night, at what tyme the Captaines, pety Captaines and Colonells, did vſe to come vnto him. So, being ready to goe into EVROPE, one night very late (when all the campe tooke quiet reſt) as he was in his tent with a litle light, thinking of waighty matters: he thought he heard one come in to him, and caſting his eye towards the doore of his tent, that he ſaw a wonderfull ſtraunge and monſtruous ſhape of a body comming towards him, and ſayd neuer a word. So Brutus boldly asked what he was, a god, or a man, and what cauſe brought him thither. The ſpirit aunſwered him, I am thy euill ſpirit, Brutus: and thou ſhalt ſee me by the citie of PHILIPPES. Brutus beeing no otherwiſe affrayd, replyed againe vnto it: well, then I ſhall ſee thee agayne. The ſpirit preſently vaniſhed away: and Brutus called his men vnto him, who tolde him that they heard no noyſe, nor ſawe any thinge at all. Thereuppon Brutus returned agayne to thinke on his matters as he did before: and when the daye brake, he went vnto Caſſius, to tell him what viſion had appeared vnto him in the night. Caſſius beeing in opinion an EPICVRIAN, and reaſoning thereon with Brutus, ſpake to him touching the viſion thus. In our ſecte, Brutus, we haue an opinion, that we doe not alwayes feele, or ſee, that which we ſuppoſe we doe both ſee and feele: but that our ſenſes beeing credulous, and therefore eaſily abuſed (when they are idle and vnoccupied in their owne obiects) are induced to imagine they ſee and conieture that, which they in truth doe not. For, our minde is quicke and cunning to worke (without eyther cauſe or matter) any thinge in the imagination whatſoeuer. And therefore the imagination is reſembled to claye, and the minde to the potter: who without any other cauſe than his fancie and pleaſure, chaungeth it into what facion and forme he will. And this doth the diuerſitie of our dreames ſhewe vnto vs. For our imagination doth vppon a ſmall fancie growe from conceit to conceit, altering both in paſſions and formes of thinges imagined. For the minde of man is euer occupied, and that continuall mouing is nothing but an imagination. But yet there is a further cauſe of this in you. For you being by nature giuen to melancholick diſcourſing, and of late continually occupied: your wittes and ſences hauing bene ouerlabored, doe eaſilier yeelde to ſuch imaginations. For, to ſay that there are ſpirits or angells, and if there were, that they had the ſhape of men, or ſuch voyces, or any power at all to come vnto vs: it is a mockerye. And for myne owne parte, I would there were ſuche, bicauſe that we ſhoulde not onely haue ſouldiers, horſes, and ſhippes, but alſo the ayde of the goddes, to guide and further our honeſt and honorable attempts. With theſe words Caſſius did ſomewhat comfort and quiet Brutus. When they rayſed their campe, there came two Eagles that flying with a maruelous force, lighted vppon two of the foremoſte enſeignes, and alwayes followed the ſouldiers, which gaue them meate, and fedde them, vntill they came neare to the citie of PHILIPPES: and there one daye onely before the battell, they bothe flewe awaye. Now Brutus had conquered the moſte parte of all the people, and nations of that contry: but if there were any other citie or Captaine to ouercome, then they made all cleere before them, and ſo drewe towards the coaſts of THASSOS. There Norbanus lying in campe in a certaine place called the ſtraights, by another place called SYMBOLON: (which is a port of the ſea) Caſſius and Brutus compaſſed him in in ſuch ſort, that hewas driuen to forſake the place which was of great ſtrength for him, and he was alſo in daunger beſide to haue loſt all his armye. For, Octauius Cæſar could not followe him bicauſe of his ſicknes, and therefore ſtayed behind: whereuppon they had taken his army, had not Antonius ayde bene, which made ſuch wonderful ſpeede, that Brutus could ſcant beleue it. So Cæſar came not thether of ten daies after: & Antonius camped againſt Caſſius, and Brutus on thother ſide againſt Cæſar. The ROMANES called the valley betweene both campes, the PHILIPPIAN fields: and there were neuer ſeene two ſo great armies of the ROMANES, one before the other, ready to fight. In truth, Brutus army was inferior to Octauius Cæſars, in number of men: but for brauery and rich furniture, Brutus army farre excelled Cæſars. For the moſt part of their armors were ſiluer and gilt, which Brutus had bountifully giuen them: although in all other things he taught his Captaines to liue in order without exceſſe. But for the brauery of armor, & weapõ, which ſouldiers ſhould cary in their hands, or otherwiſe weare vpon their backes: he thought

A that it was an encoragement vnto them that by nature are greedy of honor, & that it maketh them also fight like deuills that loue to get, and be affrayd to lose: bicause they fight to keepe their armor and weapon, as also their goods and lands. Now when they came to muster their armies, Octauius Cæsar tooke the muster of his army within the trenches of his campe, & gaue his men onely a litle corne, and fiue siluer Drachmas to euery man to sacrifice to the gods, & to pray for victory. But Brutus skorning this miserie and niggardlines, first of all mustered his armie, and did purifie it in the fields, according to the manner of the ROMANES: and then he gaue vnto euery band a number of weathers to sacrifice, and fiftie siluer Drachmas to euery souldier. So that Brutus and Cassius souldiers were better pleased, and more coragiously bent to fight at the daye of the battell, then their enemies souldiers were. Notwithstanding, being the bravery of souldiers, in their armor and weapons.

B busily occupied about the ceremonies of this purification, it is reported that there chaunced certaine vnlucky signes vnto Cassius. For one of his Sergeaunts that caried the roddes before him, brought him the garland of flowers turned backwards, the which he should haue worne on his head in the tyme of sacrificing. Moreouer it is reported also, that at another tyme before, in certaine sportes and triumphe where they caried an image of Cassius victorie of cleane gold, it fell by chaunce, the man stumbling that caried it. And yet further, there were seene a maruelous number of fowles of praye, that feede vpon dead carkasses: and beehiues also were founde, where bees were gathered together in a certaine place within the trenches of the campe: the which place the Soothsayers thought good to shut out of the precinct of the campe, for to take away the superstitious feare and mistrust men would haue of it. The which

C beganne somewhat to alter Cassius minde from Epicurus opinions, and had put the souldiers also in a maruelous feare. Thereuppon Cassius was of opinion not to trye this warre at one battell, but rather to delay tyme, and to drawe it out in length, considering that they were the stronger in money, and the weaker in men and armors. But Brutus in contrary manner, did alway before, and at that tyme also, desire nothing more, then to put all to the hazard of battell, assoone as might be possible: to the ende he might either quickely restore his contry to her former libertie, or rid him forthwith of this miserable world, being still troubled in following and mainteyning of such great armies together. But perceiuing that in the dayly skirmishes and byckerings they made, his men were alway the stronger, and euer had the better: that yet quickned his spirits againe, and did put him in better hart. And furthermore, bicause that some Cassius and Brutus opinions about battell.

D of their owne men had already yelded them selues to their enemies, and that it was suspected moreouer diuers others would doe the like: that made many of Cassius friendes, which were of his minde before, (when it came to be debated in counsell whether the battell shoulde be fought or not) that they were then of Brutus minde. But yet was there one of Brutus friendes called Atellius, that was against it, and was of opinion that they should tary the next winter. Brutus asked him what he should get by taryinga yeare lenger? If I get nought els, quod Atellius agayne, yet haue I liued so much lenger. Cassius was very angry with this aunswer: and Atellius was maliced and esteemed the worse for it of all men. Thereuppon it was presently determined they should fight battell the next daye. So Brutus all supper tyme looked with a cheerefull countenaunce, like a man that had good hope, and talked very wisely of Philoso-

Atellius opinion for the battell.

E phie, and after supper went to bed. But touching Cassius, Messala reporteth that he supped by him selfe in his tent with a fewe of his friendes, and that all supper tyme he looked very sadly, and was full of thoughts, although it was against his nature: and that after supper he tooke him by the hande, and holding him fast (in token of kindnes as his manner was) tolde him in Greeke: Messala, I protest vnto thee, and make thee my witnes, that I am compelled against my minde and will (as Pompey the great was) to ieopard the libertie of our contry, to the hazard of a battel. And yet we must be liuely, and of good corage, considering our good fortune, whome we shoulde wronge too muche to mistrust her, although we followe euill counsell. Messala writeth, that Cassius hauing spoken these last wordes vnto him, he bad him farewell, and willed him to come to supper to him the next night following, bicause it was his birth Cassius words vnto Messala, the night before the battell.

F day. The next morning by breake of day, the signall of battell was set out in Brutus and Cassius campe, which was an arming scarlet coate: and both the Chiefetaines spake together in the middest of their armies. There Cassius beganne to speake first, and sayd: the gods graunt vs, O

Brutus and Cassius talke before the battell.

Brutus, that this day we may winne the field, and euer after to liue all the reſt of our life quietly, one with another. But ſith the gods haue ſo ordeyned it, that the greateſt & chiefeſt things amongeſt men are moſt vncertaine, and that if the battell fall out otherwiſe to daye then we wiſhe or looke for, we ſhall hardely meete againe: what art thou then determined to doe, to flye, or dye? Brutus aunſwered him, being yet but a young man, and not ouergreatly experienced in the world: I truſt, (I know not how) a certaine rule of Philoſophie, by the which I did greatly blame and reproue Cato for killing of him ſelfe, as being no lawfull nor godly acte, touching the gods, nor concerning men, valliant, not to giue place and yeld to diuine prouidence, and not conſtantly and paciently to take whatſoeuer it pleaſeth him to ſend vs, but to drawe backe, and flie: but being nowe in the middeſt of the daunger, I am of a contrary mind. For if it be not the will of God, that this battell fall out fortunate for vs: I will looke no more for hope, neither ſeeke to make any new ſupply for warre againe, but will rid me of this miſerable world, and content me with my fortune. For, I gaue vp my life for my contry in the Ides of Marche, for the which I ſhall liue in another more glorious worlde. Caſſius fell a laughing to heare what he ſayde, and imbracing him, come on then ſayde he, let vs goe and charge our enemies with this mynde. For eyther we ſhall conquer, or we ſhall not neede to feare the Conquerors. After this talke, they fell to conſultacion amonge their friendes for the ordering of the battell. Then Brutus prayed Caſſius he might haue the leading of the right winge, the which men thought was farre meeter for Caſſius: both bicauſe he was the elder man, and alſo for that he had the better experience. But yet Caſſius gaue it him, and willed that Meſſala (who had charge of one of the warrelikeſt legions they had) ſhoulde be alſo in that winge with Brutus. So Brutus preſently ſent out his horſemen, who were excellently well appoynted, and his footemen alſo were as willing and readye to giue charge. Nowe Antonius men did caſt a trenche from the mariſhe by the which they laye, to cutte of Caſſius way to come to the ſea: and Cæſar, at the leaſt his armye, ſtyrred not. As for Octauius Cæſar him ſelfe, he was not in his campe, bicauſe he was ſicke. And for his people, they litle thought the enemies would haue giuen them battell, but onely haue made ſome light skirmiſhes to hinder them that wrought in the trenche, and with their darts and ſlings to haue kept them from finiſhing of their worke: but they taking no heede to them that came full vpon them to giue them battell, maruelled much at the great noyſe they heard, that came from the place where they were caſting their trenche. In the meane tyme Brutus that led the right winge, ſent litle billes to the Colonells and Captaines of priuate bandes, in the which he wrote the worde of the battell: and he him ſelfe riding a horſe backe by all the trowpes, did ſpeake to them, and incoraged them to ſticke to it like men. So by this meanes very fewe of them vnderſtoode what was the worde of the battell, and beſides, the moſte parte of them neuer taryed to haue it tolde them, but ranne with greate furie to aſſayle the enemies: whereby through this diſorder, the legions were marueloufly ſcattered and diſperſed one from the other. For firſt of all, Meſſalaes legion, and then the next vnto them, went beyond the left winge of the enemies, and did nothing, but glawnſing by them, ouerthrewe ſome as they went, and ſo going on further, fell right vpon Cæſars cámpe, out of the which (as him ſelfe writeth in his commentaries) he had bene conueyed away a litle before, thorough the counſell and aduiſe of one of his friendes called Marcus Artorius: Who dreaming in the night, had a viſion appeared vnto him, that commaunded Octauius Cæſar ſhould be caried out of his campe. Inſomuch as it was thought he was ſlayne, bicauſe his lytter (which had nothing in it) was thruſt through & through with pykes and darts. There was great ſlaughter in this campe. For amongeſt others, there were ſlayne two thowſand LACEDÆMONIANS, who were arriued but euen a litle before, comming to ayde Cæſar. The other alſo that had not glaunſed by, but had giuen a charge full vpon Cæſars battell: they eaſily made them flie, bicauſe they were greatly troubled for the loſſe of their campe, and of them there were ſlayne by hand, three legions. Then being very earneſt to followe the chaſe of them that fled, they ranne in amongeſt them hand ouer head into their campe, & Brutus among thē. But that which the cōquerors thought not of, occaſion ſhewed it vnto them that were ouercome: & that was, the left wing of their enemies left naked, & vngarded of thē of the right wing, who were ſtrayed too far of, in following

A ing of them that were ouerthrowen. So they gaue a hot charge vpon them. But notwithſtanding all the force they made, they coulde not breake into the middeſt of their battell, where they founde men that receiued them, and valliantlie made head againſt them. Howbeit they brake and ouerthrewe the left wing where Caſſius was, by reaſon of the great diſorder among them, and alſo bicauſe they had no intelligence how the right wing had ſped. So they chaſed them beating them into their campe, the which they ſpoyled, none of both the Chieftaines being preſent there. For Antonius, as it is reported, to flie the furie of the firſt charge, was gotten into the next mariſh: and no man coulde tell what became of Octauius Cæſar, after he was caried out of his campe. Inſomuche that there were certaine ſouldiers that ſhewed their ſwords bloodied, & ſayd that they had ſlaine him, and did deſcribe his face, and ſhewed what B age he was of. Furthermore the voward, and the middeſt of Brutus battell, had alreadie put all their enemies to flight that withſtoode them, with great ſlaughter: ſo that Brutus had conquered all of his ſide, and Caſſius had loſt all on the other ſide. For nothing vndid them, but that Brutus went not to helpe Caſſius, thinking he had ouercome them, as him ſelfe had done: and Caſſius on the other ſide taried not for Brutus, thinking he had bene ouerthrowen, as him ſelfe was. And to proue that the victorie fell on Brutus ſide, Meſſala confirmeth it: that they wanne three Eagles, and diuers other enſignes of their enemies, and their enemies wanne neuer a one of theirs. Now Brutus returning from the chaſe, after he had ſlaine and ſacked Cæſars men: he wondred muche that he coulde not ſee Caſſius tent ſtanding vp high as it was wont, neither the other tentes of his campe ſtanding as they were before, bicauſe all the whole cãpe C had bene ſpoiled, and the tentes throwen downe, at the firſt comming in of the enemies. But they that were about Brutus, whoſe ſight ſerued them better, tolde him that they ſawe a great gliſtering of harnes, and a number of ſiluered targets, that went & came into Caſſius campe, and were not (as they tooke it) the armors, nor the number of men that they had left there to gard the campe: and yet that they ſaw not ſuch a number of dead bodies, and great ouerthrow, as there ſhould haue bene, if ſo many legions had bene ſlaine. This made Brutus at the firſt miſtruſt that which had hapned. So he appointed a number of men to keepe the campe of his enemie which he had taken, and cauſed his men to be ſent for that yet followed the chaſe, and gathered them together, thinking to leade them to aide Caſſius, who was in this ſtate as you ſhall heare. Firſt of all he was maruelous angrie, to ſee how Brutus men ranne to D geue charge vpon their enemies, and taried not for the word of the battell, nor commaundement to geue charge: and it grieued him beſide, that after he had ouercome them, his men fell ſtraight to ſpoyle, and were not carefull to compaſſe in the reſt of the enemies behinde. But with tarying too long alſo, more then through the valliantneſſe or foreſight of the Captaines his enemies: Caſſius founde him ſelfe compaſſed in with the right wing of his enemies armie. Whereuppon his horſemen brake immediatly, and fled for life towardes the ſea. Furthermore, perceiuing his footemen to geue ground, he did what he could to kepe them from flying, and tooke an enſigne from one of the enſigne bearers that fled, and ſtucke it faſt at his feete: although with much a do he could ſcant keepe his owne gard together. So Caſſius him E ſelfe was at length compelled to flie, with a few about him, vnto a litle hill, from whence they might eaſely ſee what was done in all the plaine: howebeit Caſſius him ſelfe ſawe nothing, for his ſight was verie bad, ſauing that he ſaw (and yet with much a doe) how the enemies ſpoiled his campe before his eyes. He ſawe alſo a great troupe of horſemen, whom Brutus ſent to aide him, and thought that they were his enemies that followed him: but yet he ſent Titinnius, one of them that was with him, to goe and know what they were. Brutus horſemen ſawe him comming a farre of, whom when they knewe that he was one of Caſſius chiefeſt frendes, they ſhowted out for ioy: and they that were familiarly acquainted with him, lighted from their horſes, and went and imbraced him. The reſt compaſſed him in rounde about a horſeback, with ſongs of victorie and great ruſhing of their harnes, ſo that they made all the field ring againe for ioy. But this marred all. For Caſſius thinking in deede that Titinnius was taken F of the enemies, he then ſpake theſe wordes: deſiring too much to liue, I haue liued to ſee one of my beſt frendes taken, for my ſake, before my face. After that, he gotte into a tent where no bodie was, and tooke Pyndarus with him, one of his freed bondmen, whom he reſerued

Brutus did ſet them in battell ray, but yet kept him ſelfe from geuing battell. Now for the ſlaues that were priſoners, which were a great number of them, & went & came to and fro amongſt the armed men, not without ſuſpicion: he commaunded they ſhoulde kill them. But for the freemen, he ſent them freely home, and ſaid, that they were better priſoners with his enemies, him, and did accuſe them, that though they were priſoners, they did not let to laugh them to ſcorne, and to ieaſt broadly with them. Brutus made no aunſwere to it, bicauſe his heade was occupied other wayes. Whereupon, Meſſala Coruinus ſayd: that it were good to whippe them

When they hearde him ſay ſo, they tooke his aunſwere for a conſent againſt theſe poore vnfortunate men, to ſuffer them to doe what they thought good: and therefore they caried them away, & ſlue them. Afterwards Brutus performed the promiſe he had made to the ſouldiers, and gaue them the two thowſand Drachmas a peece, but yet he firſt reproued them, bicauſe they went & gaue charge vpon the enemies at the firſt battell, before they had the word of battell geuen them: and made them a new promiſe alſo, that if in the ſecond battell they fought like men, he would geue them the ſacke and ſpoyle of two cities, to wit,

B THESSALONICA, and LACEDÆMON. In all Brutus life there is but this only fault to be found, and that is not to be gaineſaid: though Antonius and Octauius Cæſar did reward their ſouldiers farre worſe for their victory. For when they had driuen all the naturall ITALIANS out of ITALIE, they gaue their ſouldiers their landes and townes, to the which they had no right: and moreouer, the only marke they ſhot at in all this warre they made, was but to ouercome, and raigne. Where in contrarie manner they had ſo great an opinion of Brutus vertue, that the common voyce and opinion of the world would not ſuffer him, neither to ouercome, nor to ſaue him ſelfe, otherwiſe then iuſtlie and honeſtly, and ſpeciallie after Caſſius death: whome men burdened, that oftentimes he moued Brutus to great crueltie. But nowe, like as the mariners on the ſea after the rudder of their ſhippe is broken by tempeſt, do ſeeke to naile on ſome

C other peece of wodde in liew thereof, and doe helpe them ſelues to keepe them from hurt, as much as may be vpon that inſtant daunger: euen ſo Brutus, hauing ſuch a great armie to gouerne, and his affaires ſtanding verie tickle, and hauing no other Captaine coequall with him in dignitie and authoritie: he was forced to imploy them he had, and likewiſe to be ruled by them in many things, & was of mind him ſelfe alſo to graunt them any thing, that he thought might make them ſerue like noble ſouldiers at time of neede. For Caſſius ſouldiers were verie euill to be ruled, and did ſhewe them ſelues verie ſtubborne and luſtie in the campe, bicauſe they had no Chieftaine that did cõmaund them: but yet rancke cowards to their enemies, bicauſe they had once ouercome them. On the other ſide Octauius Cæſar, and Antonius, were not in much better ſtate: for firſt of all, they lacked vittells. And bicauſe they were lodged in low

D places, they looked to abide a hard and ſharpe winter, being camped as they were by the mariſh ſide, and alſo for that after the battell there had fallen plentie of raine about the autumne, where through, all their tents were full of myre and durt, the which by reaſon of the colde did freeze incontinentlie. But beſide all theſe diſcommodities, there came newes vnto them of the great loſſe they had of their men by ſea. For Brutus ſhippes met with a great aide and ſupplie of men, which were ſent them out of ITALIE, and they ouerthrewe them in ſuche ſorte, that there ſcaped but few of them: and yet they were ſo famiſhed, that they were compelled to eate the tackle and ſailes of their ſhippes. Thereuppon they were verie deſirous to fight a battell againe, before Brutus ſhould haue intelligence of this good newes for him: for it chaũced ſo, that the battell was fought by ſea, on the ſelfe ſame day it was fought by lande. But by

E ill fortune, rather then through the malice or negligence of the Captaines, this victory came not to Brutus eare, till twentie dayes after. For had he knowen of it before, he would not haue bene brought to haue fought a ſecond battell, conſidering that he had excellent good prouiſion for his armie for a long time, and beſides, lay in a place of great ſtrength, ſo as his campe could not be greatly hurt by the winter, nor alſo diſtreſſed by his enemies: and further, he had bene a quiet Lord, being a conqueror by ſea, as he was alſo by land. This would haue maruelouſly encoraged him. Howbeit the ſtate of ROME (in my opinion) being now brought to that paſſe, that it could no more abide to be gouerned by many Lordes, but required one only abſolute Gouernor: God, to preuent Brutus that it ſhoulde not come to his gouernment, kept this victorie from his knowledge, though in deede it came but a litle too late. For the day be-and roade before his face to yeeld him selfe vnto his enemies. Brutus was maruelous sorie for it, wherefore partely for anger, and partely for feare of greater treason and rebellion, he sodainly caused his armie to marche, being past three of the clocke in the afternoone. So in that place where he him selfe fought in person, he had the better: and brake into the left wing of

When they came neere together, Antonius ſtayed a while, bethinking him ſelfe how he ſhould vſe Brutus. For, in ſteade of an enemie, you haue brought me a frend: and for my parte, if you had brought me Brutus aliue, truely I can not tell what I ſhould haue done to him. For, I had rather haue ſuche men my frendes, as this man here, then enemies. Thereuppon he ſent him againe that went for water before, who was in great daunger of being taken by the enemies, and hardly ſcaped, being ſore hurt. Furthermore, Brutus thought that there was no great number of men ſlaine in battell, and to know the trueth of it, there was one called Statilius, that promiſed to goe through his enemies (for otherwiſe it was impoſſible to goe ſee their campe) and from thence if all were well, that he woulde lift vp a torche light in the ayer, and then returne againe with ſpeede to

Nowe Brutus ſeeing Statilius tarie long after that, and that he came not againe, he ſayd: if Statilius be aliue, he will come againe. But his euill fortune was ſuche, that as he came backe, he lighted in his enemies hands, and was ſlaine. Now, the night being farre ſpent, Brutus as he ſate bowed towards Clitus one of his men, and told him ſomwhat in his eare, the other aunſwered him not, but fell a weeping. Thereupon he proued Dardanus, and ſayd ſomwhat alſo to him: at length he came to Volumnius him ſelfe, & ſpeaking to him in Græke, prayed him for the ſtudies ſake which brought them acquainted together, that he woulde helpe him to put his hande to his ſword, to thruſt it in him to kill him. Volumnius denied his requeſt, and ſo did many others: and amongeſt the reſt, one of them ſayd, there was no tarying for them there, but that they

at my neede, and I do not complaine of my fortune, but only for my contries sake: for, as for me, I thinke my selfe happier than they that haue ouercome, considering that I leaue a perpetuall fame of our corage and manhoode, the which our enemies the conquerors shall neuer attaine vnto by force nor money, neither can let their posteritie to say, that they being naughtie and vniust men, haue slaine good men, to vsurpe tyrannical power not pertaining to them. Hauing sayd so, he prayed euerie man to shift for them selues, and then he went a litle aside with two or three only, among the which Strato was one, with whom he came first acquainted by the studie of Rethoricke. He came as neere to him as he coulde, and taking his sword by the hilts with both his hands, & falling downe vpon the poynt of it, ran him selfe through. Others say, that not he, but Strato (at his requeste) held the sword in his hand, & turned his head aside, and that Brutus fell downe vpon it: and so ranne him selfe through, and dyed presently. Messala, that had bene Brutus great frend, became afterwards Octauius Cæsars frend. So, shortly after, Cæsar being at good leasure, he brought Strato, Brutus frende vnto him, and weeping sayd: Cæsar, beholde, here is he that did the last seruice to my Brutus. Cæsar welcomed him at that time, and afterwards he did him as faithfull seruice in all his affaires, as any GRÆCIAN els he had about him, vntill the battell of ACTIVM. It is reported also, that this Messala him selfe aunswered Cæsar one day, when he gaue him great praise before his face, that he had fought valliantlie, and with great affection for him, at the battell of ACTIVM: (notwithstanding that he had bene his cruell enemy before, at the battell of PHILIPPES, for Brutus sake) I euer loued, sayd he, to take the best and iustest parte. Now, Antonius hauing found Brutus bodie, he caused it to be wrapped vp in one of the richest cote armors he had. Afterwards also, Antonius vnderstanding that this cotearmor was stollen, he put the theefe to death that had stollen it, & sent the ashes of his bodie vnto Seruilia his mother. And for Porcia, Brutus wife: Nicolaus the Philosopher, and Valerius Maximus doe wryte, that she determining to kill her selfe (her parents and frendes carefullie looking to her to kepe her from it) tooke hotte burning coles, and cast them into her mouth, and kept her mouth so close, that she choked her selfe. There was a letter of Brutus found wrytten to his frendes, complayning of their negligence, that his wife being sicke, they would not helpe her, but suffred her to kill her selfe, choosing to dye, rather then to languish in paine. Thus it appeareth, that Nicolaus knewe not well that time, sith the letter (at the least if it were Brutus letter) doth plainly declare the disease and loue of this Lady, and also the maner of her death.

A TO come nowe to compare theſe two noble perſonages together, it is certaine that both of them hauing had great gifts in them (& ſpecially Dion) of ſmall occaſions they made them ſelues great men: & therfore Dion of both deſerueth chiefeſt praiſe. For, he had no cohelper to bring him vnto that greatneſſe, as Brutus had of Caſſius: who doubtleſſe was not comparable vnto Brutus, for vertue and reſpect of honor, though otherwiſe in matters of warre, he was no leſſe wiſe and valliant then he. For many doe impute vnto Caſſius, the firſt beginning and originall of all the warre and enterpriſe: and ſayd it was he that did encourage Brutus, to conſpire Cæſars death. Where Dion furniſhed him ſelfe with armor, ſhippes and B ſouldiers and wanne thoſe frendes and companions alſo that did helpe him, to proſecute his warre. Nor he did not as Brutus, who roſe to greatneſſe by his enterpriſes, and by warre got all his ſtrength and riches. But he in contrarie maner, ſpent of his owne goods to make warre for the libertie of his contrie and diſburſed of his owne money, that ſhould haue kept him in his baniſhment. Furthermore, Brutus and Caſſius were compelled of neceſſity to make warres, bicauſe they coulde not haue liued ſafelie in peace, when they were driuen out of ROME: for that they were condemned to death, and purſued by their enemies. And for this cauſe therefore they were driuen to hazard them ſelues in warre, more for their owne ſafetie, then for the libertie of their contrie men. Whereas Dion on the other ſide, liuing more merily and ſafelie in his baniſhment, then the tyranne Dionyſius him ſelfe that had baniſhed him: did put C him ſelfe to that daunger, to deliuer SICILE from bondage. Nowe the matter was not a like vnto the ROMANES, to be deliuered from the gouernment of Cæſar: as it was for the SYRACVSANS, to be ridde of Dionyſius tyrannie. For Dionyſius denyed not, that he was not a tyranne, hauing filled SICILE with ſuche miſerie and calamitie. Howebeit Cæſars power and gouernment when it came to be eſtabliſhed, did in deede much hurt at his firſt entrie and beginning vnto thoſe that did reſiſt him: but afterwardes, vnto them that being ouercome had receiued his gouernment, it ſeemed he rather had the name and opinion onely of a tyranne, then otherwiſe that he was ſo in deede. For there neuer followed any tyrannicall nor cruell act, but contrarilie, it ſeemed that he was a mercifull Phiſition, whom God had ordeyned of ſpeciall grace to be Gouernor of the Empire of ROME, and to ſet all thinges againe at quiet ſtay, D the which required the counſell and authoritie of an abſolute Prince. And therefore the ROMANES were maruelous ſorie for Cæſar after he was ſlaine, and afterwardes would neuer pardon them that had ſlaine him. On the other ſide, the cauſe why the SYRACVSANS did moſt accuſe Dion, was: bicauſe he did let Dionyſius eſcape out of the caſtell of SYRACVSA, and bicauſe he did not ouerthrow and deface the tombe of his father. Furthermore, towching the warres: Dion alway ſhewed him ſelfe a Captaine vnreprouable, hauing wiſelie and skilfullie taken order for thoſe things, which he had enterpriſed of his owne head and counſell: and did amende the faults others committed, and brought things to better ſtate then he found them. Where it ſeemeth, that Brutus did not wiſely to receiue the ſecond battell: conſidering his reſt ſtoode vpon it. For, after he had loſt the battell, it was vnpoſſible for him euer to riſe againe: & therefore his hart failed him, and ſo gaue vp all, and neuer durſt ſtriue with his euill fortune as Pompey did, conſidering that he had preſent cauſe enough in the field to hope of his ſouldiers, and being beſide a dreadfull Lorde all the ſea ouer. Furthermore, the greateſt reproache they could obiect againſt Brutus, was: that Iulius Cæſar hauing ſaued his life, and pardoned all the priſoners alſo taken in battell, as many as he had made requeſt for, taking him for his frende, and honoring him aboue all his other frends: Brutus notwithſtanding had imbrued his hands in his blood, wherewith they could neuer reproue Dion. For on the contrarie ſide, ſo long as Dion was Dionyſius frende and kinſeman, he did alway helpe him to order and gouerne his affaires. But after he was baniſhed his contrie, and that his wife was forciblie maried to an other man, and his goodes alſo taken from him: then he entred into iuſt and open warres againſt Dionyſius the tyranne. But in this poynt, they were contrarie together. For wherein their chiefeſt praiſe conſiſted, to witte, in hating of tyrannes and wicked men: it is moſt true that Brutus deſire was moſt ſincere of both. For hauing no priuate cauſe of complaint or grudge againſt Cæſar, he ventred to kill him, onely to ſet his contrie againe at libertie. Where if Dion had not receiued priuate cauſe of quarrell againſt Dionyſius: he woulde neuer haue made warre with him. The which Plato proueth in his Epiſtells, where is plainlie ſeene: that Dion being driuen out of the tyrans Court againſt his will, and not putting him ſelfe to voluntarie baniſhment, he draue out Dionyſius. Furthermore, the reſpect of the common wealth cauſed Brutus, that before was Pompeys enemie, to become his frende, and enemie vnto Cæſar, that before was his frend: only referring his frendſhippe and enmitie, vnto the conſideracion of iuſtice and equitie. And Dion did many things for Dionyſius ſake and benefit, all the while he truſted him: and when he beganne to miſtruſt him, then for anger he made warre with him. Wherefore all his frendes did not beleue, but after he had driuen out Dionyſius, he would ſtabliſh the gouernment to him ſelfe, flattering the people with a more curteous and gentle title then the name of a tyranne. But for Brutus, his verie enemies them ſelues confeſſed, that of all thoſe that conſpired Cæſars death, he only had no other ende and intent to attempt his enterpriſe, but to reſtore the Empire of Rome againe, to her former ſtate & gouernment. And furthermore, it was not all one thing to deale with Dionyſius, as it was to haue to doe with Iulius Cæſar. For no man that knew Dionyſius, but would haue deſpiſed him, conſidering that he ſpent the moſt parte of his time in drinking, dycing, and in haunting lewde womens company. But to haue vndertaken to deſtroy Iulius Cæſar, and not to haue ſhroncke backe for feare of his great wiſedom, power, and fortune, conſidering that his name only was dreadfull vnto euerie man, and alſo not to ſuffer the kings of Parthia and India to be in reſt for him: this could not come but of a maruelous noble minde of him, that for feare neuer fainted, nor let fall any part of his corage. And therfore, ſo ſone as Dion came into Sicilia, many thowſands of men came and ioyned with him, againſt Dionyſius. But the fame of Iulius Cæſar did ſet vp his frends againe after his death, and was of ſuche force, that it raiſed a young ſtripling, Octauius Cæſar, (that had no meanes nor power of him ſelfe) to be one of the greateſt men of Rome: and they vſed him as a remedie to encounter Antonius malice and power. And if men will ſay, that Dion draue out the tyran Dionyſius with force of armes, and ſundrie battells: and that in contrarie maner Brutus ſlue Cæſar, being a naked man, and without gard: then doe I aunſwere againe, that it was a noble parte, and of a wiſe Captaine, to chooſe ſo apt a time and place, to come vppon a man of ſo great power, and to finde him naked without his gard. For he went not ſodainlie in a rage, and alone, or with a ſmall companie, to aſſaile him: but his enterpriſe was long time before determined of, and that with diuers men, of all the which, not a man of them once fayled him: but it is rather to be thought, that from the beginning he choſe them honeſt men, or elſe that by his choyſe of them, he made them good men.

In what things Dion was inferior vnto Brutus.

Whereas

A Whereas Dion, either from the beginning made no wise choyse in trusting of euill men, or else bicause he could not tell how to vse them he had chosen: of good men he made them become euill, so that neither the one nor the other coulde be the parte of a wise man. For Plato himselfe reproueth him, for that he had chosen suche men for his frendes, that he was slaine by them, and after he was slaine, no man woulde then reuenge his death. And in contrarie maner, of the enemies of Brutus, the one (who was Antonius) gaue his bodie honorable buriall: and Octauius Cæsar the other, reserued his honors and memories of him. For at Millayne, (a citie of GAVLE on ITALIE side) there was an image of his in brasse, verie like vnto him; the which Cæsar afterwardes passing that way, behelde verie aduisedly, for that it was made by an excellent workeman, and was verie like him, and so went his way. Then he stayed sodainly a-

B gaine, and called for the Gouernors of the citie, and before them all tolde them, that the citizens were his enemies, and traitors vnto him, bicause they kept an enemie of his among them. The Gouernors of the citie at the first were astonied at it, and stowtlie denyed it: and none of them knowing what enemie he ment, one of them looked on an other. Octauius Cæsar then turning him vnto Brutus statue, bending his browes, sayd vnto them: this man you see standing vp here, is he not our enemie? Then the Gouernors of the citie were worse afrayed then before, & could not tel what answere to make him. But Cæsar laughing, and commending the GAVLES for their faithfulnes to their frendes, euen in their aduersities: he was contented Brutus image should stand still as it did.

CHrisyppus the Philosopher (my frend Polycrates) being affrayed as it seemeth of the euill sound of an auncient prouerbe not rightlie as it was spoken, and in vse, but as he thought it best, he wrote in this maner:

VVhat children do their auncetors commend,
But those vvhom fortune fauors to the end?

But Dionysodorus TROEZENIAN reprouing him, doth rehearse the prouerbe rightly as in deede it is?

VVhat children do their auncetors commend,

But thoſe vvhoſe life is vertuous to the end?

Saying, that this prouerbe ſtoppeth their mouthes who of them ſelues are vnworthie of praiſe, and yet are ſtill boaſting of the vertues of their auncеſters, whoſe praiſe they hiely extoll. But affore thoſe that (as Pindarus ſayth,)

Do match their noble auncetors in prowweſſe of their owne, And by their frutes commend the ſtocke vvhence they them ſelues are growne.

(As thy ſelfe that conformeſt thy life vnto the examples and maners of thy vertuous auncеſters:) it is no ſmall good happe for them, often to remember the noble deedes of their parentes in hearing them ſpoken of, or otherwiſe for them ſelues oftentimes to remember ſome notable doings of their parents. For in them, it is not for lacke of commendable vertues, that they report others praiſe and glorie: but in ioyning their owne vertues, to the vertues of their auncеſters, they do increaſe their glorie, as inheriting their vertuous life, as challenging their diſcent by blood. Therefore, hauing wrytten the life of Aratus thy contrie man, and one of thy auncеſters, whoſe glorie and greatneſſe thou doeſt not blemiſhe, I doe ſende it vnto thee, not that I thinke but that thou haſt more diligentlie then any man elſe, ſearched out all his deedes and ſayings: But yet, bicauſe that thy two ſonnes, Polycrates, and Pythocles, reading, and ſtill hearing ſome thing reported, might be brought vp at home by the example of their auncеſters, whoſe deedes ſhall lye before them to followe. For he loueth him ſelfe more, then he regardeth perfit vertue, or his credit: that thinketh him ſelfe ſo perfit, as he neede not follow any others example.

The example of our auncеſters, wherein profitable to their poſteritie.

The citie of SICYONE, after it fell from her firſt gouernment of the optimacie and nobilitie, which is proper to the cities of the DORIANS: like an inſtrument out of tune, it fell into ciuill warres and ſeditious practiſes, through the Orators of the people: and neuer ceaſſed to be plagued with thoſe troubles and miſeries, alway chaunging new tyrannes, vntill that Cleon being ſlaine, they choſe Timoclidas and Clinias their Gouernors, two of the nobleſt men & of greateſt authoritie in all the citie. Now when the common wealth beganne to grow to a certeine ſtate of gouernment, Timoclidas dyed: and Abantidas, the ſonne of Paſeas, pretending to make him ſelfe Lord of the citie, he ſlue Clinias, and put to death ſome of his parentes and frendes, draue away others, and ſought alſo to put his ſonne Aratus to death, that was then but ſeuen yeare old. But in this hurly burly and tumult, Aratus flying out of his fathers houſe, among them that ranne away, and wandering vp and downe the citie, being ſcared and affrayed, finding no man to helpe him: by good fortune he gotte into a womans houſe, called Soſo, which was Abantidas ſiſter, and wife vnto Periphantus, his father Clinias brother. She being of a noble minde, and iudging that the childe Aratus by Gods prouidence fledde vnto her: hidde him in her houſe, and in the night ſecretlie ſent him vnto the citie of ARGOS. Now after that Aratus had ſcaped, and was ſafe from this daunger: from that time there bred in him a vehement malice againſt tyrannes, the which ſtill increaſed in him, as he grewe in yeares. So he was vertuouſlie brought vp in the citie of ARGOS, with his fathers frends: and perceiuing with him ſelfe that he waxed bigge and ſtrong, he diſpoſed his bodie to diuers exerciſes, and became ſo excellent in them, that he contended in fiue manner of exerciſes, and oftentimes bare the beſt away. And in his images and ſtatues, he appeared in face, ful and well liking, as one that fed well, and the maieſtie of his countenaunce argueth that he vſed ſuche exerciſe: and ſuche commonly are large eaters. From whence it came, that he did not geue him ſelfe ſo muche to pleading, as peraduenture was requiſite for a Gouernor of a common wealth. Howebeit, ſome doe iudge by his Commentaries he wrote, that he had an eloquenter tongue then ſeemed vnto ſome: bicauſe he wrote them in haſt, hauing other buſines in hand, and euen as things came firſt into his minde. But afterwards, Dinias and Ariſtotle Logitian, ſlue Abantidas, who did commonlie vſe to ſit in the market place, to heare their matters, and to talke with them. And this gaue them good meanes and oportunitie to worke their feate they did. After Abantidas death, his father Paſeas poſſeſſed the tyrannie: whom Nicocles afterwardes ſlue alſo by treaſon, and made him ſelfe tyranne in his place. It is reported that this Nicocles did liuelie reſemble the countenaunce of Periander, the ſonne of Cypſelus, as Orontes PERSIAN was very like vnto Alcmaon, the ſonne of Amphiaraus: and an other young

A LACEDÆMONIAN, vnto Hector of TROYA, whom Myrſilus wryteth, was troden vnder mens feete, through the ouergreat preſſe of people that came to ſee him, when they hearde of it. This Nicocles was tyranne foure monethes together, in the which he did wonderfull great hurt to the citie, and had almoſt loſt it, the ÆTOLIANS comming on a ſodaine, who were like to haue taken it. Nowe Aratus was come to the ſtate of a ſtripling, and was greatlie eſteemed for the noble houſe he came of, and alſo for the great courage they founde in him, which was no ſmall matter: and beſides that, he had a maieſtie in his countenaunce, being wiſer then was looked for in a young man of his yeares. Therefore the baniſhed men from the citie of SICYONE, repaired vnto him before any other man. Nicocles for his parte alſo was not careleſſe of his doinges, but had an eye euer to ſee what Aratus intended, although B he litle miſtruſted any ſuche bolde enterpriſe, nor ſo daungerous an exployt of him: but did onely coniecture that he did ſtirre vp the kings which had bene his dead fathers frendes. And ſo in deede Aratus tooke that courſe. But when he ſaw that Antigonus ſtill delayed his promiſes, and did alwayes tract time, and that the hope of aide from king Ptolomy of ÆGYPT was too farre of: at length he determined to vndertake to deſtroy the tyranne him ſelfe. So he firſt conſulted with Ariſtomachus and * Ecdelus: of the which the one was baniſhed from SICYONE, and the other an ARCADIAN, from the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, a Philoſopher, and a valliant man of his hands, and had bene ſcholler to Arceſilaus the Academicke, in the citie of ATHENS. Theſe two men being contented to ioyne with Aratus, he practiſed with other of the baniſhed men alſo: of the which there were ſome that were aſhamed, not to be partakers C of his hope & noble attempt, and ſo did alſo ioyne with him. Howbeit the moſt part of them did not only refuſe to enter into that practiſe, but further, went about to diſſwade Aratus from his enterpriſe, ſaying: that for lacke of knowledge and experience, he vnderſtoode not the daunger in vndertaking ſuch a matter, altogether ſo vnlikelie. Nowe, as Aratus was thinking in his minde to keepe a certaine place in the territory of SICYONE, from whence they might make warre with the tyrannes: there came a priſoner vnto them out of the citie of ARGOS, that had broken priſon from the tyranne of SICYONE: and was brother vnto Xenocles, one of the baniſhed men. He being brought by the ſame Xenocles vnto Aratus, told that in the place whereby he had ſaued him ſelfe, the grounde within was almoſt as high as the toppe of the wall, the which in that parte ioyned vnto high ſtonie places: and that without the wall the D height was not ſo great, but that it was eaſelie ſcalable with ladders. When Aratus heard that, he ſent two of his men, Seuthas, and Technon, with Xenocles to viewe the wall, being determined if it were true, rather to proue ſecretlie to execute his pretended enterpriſe, and quickely to put it to a venter: then to beginne a long warre, and to prepare an open armie, he being a priuate man, to goe againſt the power of a tyranne. Xenocles being returned againe to Aratus, after he had meaſured the height of the wall: he reported that the place was not vnſcalable, but yet very hard to come to it vndiſcouered, bicauſe of certeine litle curſt curres a gardiner kept hard by the wall, which would neuer leaue barking. Howbeit Aratus would not leaue of his enterpriſe ſo. Now it was not ſtraunge to ſee euerie man prepare them ſelues of armor and weapon, bicauſe at that time there were great robberies and cruell murthers committed E by high wayes, and one would aſſault an other: but for the ladders, Euphranor that was a carpenter and maker of engines, did not ſticke to make them openlie, bicauſe his common occupation did take away all ſuſpition why they were made. For this carpenter was him ſelfe alſo a baniſhed man from SICYONE, as the reſidue were. Furthermore, Aratus frendes he had in ARGOS, of thoſe fewe men they had, did euerie man of them lende him tenne men, and armed thirtie of his owne men: beſide them, Aratus him ſelfe alſo did hyre ſome pretie number of ſouldiers, by the practiſe of Xenophilus, whome the Captaines of the theeues did furniſh him. They were geuen to vnderſtand that they ſhould be ledde to the territorie of SICYONE, to take a pray of cattell and coltes of the king: and they were ſent before, ſome one way, ſome an other, with commaundement, all to meete together at the tower of Polyf gnotus, where they ſhoulde tarie. So he ſent Capheſias alſo before, without any weapons, with foure companions with him: who ſhoulde come to this gardiners houſe in the night, like ſtraungers and trauellers, to lye in his houſe, and to locke him vppe and his dogges, bicause they had no other deuise to get in but that way. But in the meane time, there were certaine spialls of Nicocles the tyranne discouered, that walked vp and downe the citie (making no countenaunce of any matter) to see what Aratus did. Wherefore, Aratus went out of his house early in the morning (as his manner was) and walked to the market place with his frendes. Then he went to the shewe place (or place of exercises) and there stripped him selfe, annoynted him, and wrestled, and in the ende tooke certaine of the young gentlemen home with him, that were wont to make merie, and to passe the time away with him: and immediatly after, one of his seruauntes was seene in the market place, carying of garlandes of flowers. An other was seene also buying of linckes and torches, and an other hyering of these common dauncing and singing women, which followe feastes and bankets with their instruments. Nicocles spialls seeing that, were deceiued: for one of them laughing on an other sayd, that they might easely see by that, there was nothing more fearefull and timerous then a tyran: considering that Nicocles being Lord of so great a citie, was affrayed of a young stripling, that spent all that he could rappe & rend to keepe him in his banishment, vpon vaine bankets, and feasts, at noone dayes. And thus were the tyrans spialls finely mocked. Aratus selfe departed immediatly after dinner out of Argos, & went vnto his souldiers, whom he had appointed before to mete him at the tower of Polygnotus, & led them straight vnto Nemea. There he told them openly his full intent and purpose, hauing before made an Oration vnto them to encourage them, and also made them maruelous fayer promises. Then he gaue them for their watche word, Apollo fauorable, and so went directly to the citie of Sicyone, marching with great speede at the first bicause of the going downe of the Moone, and afterwardes slackened his pace a litle, so that they had Moone light all the way as they came, and the Moone went not downe, vntill they were come to the gardiners house that was harde by the wall. So Cephesius, whome he had sent before vnto the gardiners house, came to meete with Aratus, and brought him word that he could not take the dogges, bicause they ranne away: howbeit that he had made fast the gardiner in his owne house. This discoraged the most parte of all the companie, who would needes haue him in any case to returne backe againe. But Aratus then began to comfort them, and promised that he would lead them backe againe, if it chaunced that the dogges were too busie with them: and therewithall presently caused the ladder men to goe before, whom Ecdelus and Mnasitheus led, and he him selfe came fayer and softly after. The dogges made a fowle barking, and were baying about Ecdelus & his companie. This notwithstanding, they came safely to the wall, and did set vp their scaling ladders. But euen as the first men got vp on them, the Captaine of the watch that had geuen place to him that should ward in the morning, came by chaunce, and passed hard by them, visiting the souldiers with a litle bell, and there was a number of torches, and a great noyse of men that followed him. They that were vpon the ladders hearing them, ducked downe, and stirred not: and thereby the souldiers that passed by them, could not see them. But now the new morning watch came towards them also, which did put them in great daunger to be discouered: but yet they once againe scaped them and were not discouered, bicause the second watch went beyond them, and stayed not. Then Ecdelus and Mnasitheus immediatly scaled the wall, & sent Technon with all possible spede vnto Aratus, to will him to make all the hast he could to come to them. Now there was no great distance betwext the garden where the dogges were, and the wall, and a litle tower where they kept a great greyhounde to keepe watche: but the greyhounde neuer heard their comming, either bicause he was a cowardly curre of nature, or els for that he had bene ouercourst and wearied the day before. But the gardiners litle curres that bald and barked beneath, had wakened the greyhounde with their barking, who at the first began to aunswere them with a soft girning: but when they came by the tower where he lay, he barked out alowde, that all the place thereabouts rang of his barking. Insomuch, that the skowte which was further of, called alowde to the hunt that kept the dogge, and asked what he ailed, that he made such a barking, and whether there were any thing sturring or not that angered him. The hunt within the tower aunswered, that it was nothing, but that his dogge was waked, and fell a barking at the lights of the watch that passed by, and at the noyse of the bell. This made Aratus souldiers a great deale the bolder: bicause they thought that the hunte had bene made priuy Aratus daungers, in deliuering of his contrie from the tyranny of Nicocles.

A priuy to their enterprise, and that he went about to hide their secret attempt, and hoped also that there were many other within the citie that would further their enterprise. When they came to get vp vpon the wall, it was of a great height, and very daungerous, bicause the ladders shooke, and bowed by reason of the waight of the men, vnles they did come vp fayer and softly one after another. Furthermore the time did put them in some perill, bicause the cocks began to crowe, and the contry folke that brought things to the market to sell, began to come a pace to the towne out of euery quarter. And therefore Aratus made haste to get vp, hauing onely forty men aboue with him, and looked for some besides to come vp, which were yet beneath. Then he marched directly towards the tyrannes pallace, where his hiered souldiers kept watch and ward: and comming sodenly vpon them, layed hold of euery man of them, & B slue not one. Then he sent into the citie to his friends, to will them to come vnto him. Therevppon they ranne out of euery corner to Aratus. Now the day began to breake, and straight the Theater was full of people that gathered together, bicause of the noyse and sturre they heard in the citie, not knowing what the matter ment: vntill at length an Herauld proclaymed with open voyce, that it was Aratus the sonne of Clinias, who called his contry men and Citizens to the recouerye of their libertie. Then they perswading them selues, that the thing which they long wished and looked for, was nowe come to passe: they ranne all in a trowpe together to the tyrannes house, and set it a fire. But the flame rose so high and great after the fire had taken it in euery part, that it was seene to the citie of CORINTHE: insomuch that the CORINTHIANS wondring what the matter should be, were in mind to haue gone to helpe it. C Now for Nicocles, he saued him selfe, and got out of the citie by secret vaults he had made vnder the ground. The souldiers on the other side quenching the fire with the helpe of the Citizens, did sacke all they found in the tyrants pallace. The which Aratus hyndered not, but did moreouer make all the rest of the tyrants goods common amongest them. So his enterprise had so good successe, that there was none of his owne company slayne he brought with him, nether any of their enemies that were within the citie, fortune kept this exployt so pure and cleane from any bloudshed. Then Aratus restored foure score men vnto their lands & goods againe, whome the tyrant Nicocles had banished: and others also, that had bene banished by former tyrants, to the number of fiue hundred men, who had bene wel neare fifty yeares space banished out of their contry. Nowe the most of them being comen home poore and needy, D would haue entred on their goods and lands they enioyed before: and so, entring againe vpon their lands in their contry, and their houses in the citie, they amazed Aratus withall, seeing Antigonus on the one side practise all the meanes he could to winne SICYONA beeing nowe free, and they all in an vprore and mutinie in the citie. Therefore, following the best counsell he could thinke vppon and deuise, considering the daunger of the present tyme: he ioyned the citie in league and friendship with the ACHAIANS, and of them all, made but one bodye. And bicause the Citizens of SICYONE were DORIANS, they were glad to submit them selues to be gouerned and protected by the name of the ACHAIANS, who were at that tyme of no great fame nor power. For they dwelt in litle villages, and had no great bounds of landes, nether were they very special good, for that they stoode vpon the sea side, where was no manner E of hauen nor port, but stones and rockes good store: and the sea beating vpon them, did eate into the mayne land. This notwithstanding, they made their enemies know, that the power of GRÆCE when it was vnited and gouerned by good policie was of great force, and almost inuincible. For the ACHAIANS being in comparison of the auncient force of GRÆCE, of no regard, and but a part of one citie enfeebled with ciuill and forrein warre: So long as they could submit them selues to be ruled by the wisedom and vertue of their Captaine, and not enuy & malice his prosperitie and soueraintie: they did not onely mainteyne them selues as free men, in the middest of the seruitude of so many great cities, large and mighty, but did also deliuer many other people of GRÆCE from their tyrants. Now, for Aratus manners: he was one that in nature loued ciuill gouernment, and equalitie among Citizens in one selfe citie: he was F nobly minded, and more painefull about the affayres of the common weale, then carefull of his owne busines, and hated tyrants to the death, and imployed his good or euill will wholy for the seruice of the common wealth. And therefore he seemed not to be so fownd a friend, Aratus ioyneth the citie of Sicyone vnto the Achaians.

Aratus referred all things to the common wealth.

as he was a gentle and mercifull enemye: framing him ſelfe in either of both, as tyme ſerued for the common wealth. To be ſhort, it was a generall and common voyce amonge all the cities confederats, in priuate company, and at open meetings in the Theaters: that Aratus loued nothing but vertue, and honeſty. That in open warres he was not ſo valliant and coragious, as he was crafty and ſuttell, to take a citie on the ſodaine. Furthermore, though he was valliant to attempt many great things, the which men thought he would neuer haue brought to paſſe: yet it ſeemeth he left many thinges poſſible vndone, the which he might eaſily haue done, for that he durſt not venter on them. For as there be beaſtes whoſe ſight is perfitteſt by night, and by day they can ſee nothing, bicauſe the ſubtiltie of the humor and moyſture in their eyes is dried vp, and can not abide the bright light of the daye: euen ſo, men that otherwiſe by nature are very wiſe, are eaſely affrayd of daunger, when they muſt venter on it at noone dayes, where contrarily they are bold in ſecret enterpriſes, ſodeinly to attẽpt any thing. Now, this contrarietie and difference in men well brought vp, groweth through ignorance & lacke of inſtruction of Philoſophie, which of it ſelfe doth noriſh vertue, as frute that ſpringeth vp without planting, or helpe of mans hand. But this is beſt diſcerned by examples. So Aratus hauing ioyned him ſelfe and his citie SICYONE vnto the ACHAIANS, and ſeruing in perſon as a man of armes among the reſt: he was maruelouſly beloued of his generalls, that ſaw him ſo obedient. For, notwithſtanding that he had made ſo large a contribucion as the eſtimation of him ſelfe, and the force of his citie vnto the common wealth of the ACHAIANS: yet he was as ready to obey and execute the commaundements of the generals, as the pooreſt and meaneſt ſouldier, were he of DYMA, or of TRITA, or of any other ſmall village whatſoeuer. Furthermore, a great ſumme of money beeing ſent him from king Ptolomy for a gifte, amownting to twenty and fiue talents, he tooke it, but forthwith diſpoſed it amongeſt his poore contry men, both to releeue their want, as alſo to redeeme priſoners. This notwithſtanding, the baniſhed men ſtill vexed & troubled them that had their goods & lands, to haue thẽ out of their hands, and otherwiſe would be ſatisfied by no meanes. Their common wealth therefore beeing in great daunger to fall into ciuill warre, Aratus perceiuing there was no other way to helpe this miſchiefe, but by Ptolomies liberalitie: he determined to goe vnto him, to praye him to helpe him with money, to pacifie this grudge and tumult. So he imbarked at the hauen of METHONA, aboue the foreland of MALEA, to ſayle from thence into ÆGYPT: howbeit he had ſuch a contrary wind, and the ſea roſe ſo hie, that the maiſter of the ſhippe was driuen to let her goe whether ſhe woulde to take ſea roome. So beeing driuen quite from his direct courſe, with great daunger he got to the citie of ADRIA, which was his enemy: bicauſe Antigonus kept it, and had a garriſon in it. But Aratus did wiſely preuent it, going a ſhore, & wandred farre from the ſea, with one of his friends called Timanthes, and got into a wodde, where they had an euill nights reſt. He had not gone farre after he had left his ſhippe, but the Captaine of the garriſon came, and ſought for him. Notwithſtanding, his ſeruaunts had mocked him finely, (being before inſtructed by Aratus what aunſwer they ſhould make) ſaying that he was gone, and fled into the Ile of EVBOEA. Howbeit, the Captaine of the garriſon ſtayed the ſhippe, his men, and all things els ſhe had in her, and tooke her for a good priſe. Within fewe dayes after, Aratus being maruelouſly troubled, and at a ſtraight with him ſelfe what he ſhould doe: there happily arriued a ROMANE ſhippe hard by the place where he kept moſt, partly to hide him ſelfe, and partly alſo to ſee if he could diſcouer any thing. This ſhippe was bownd for SYRIA. So he had delt with the maſter of the ſhippe in that ſorte, that he tooke him abourd, and promiſed he would deliuer him in CARIA, and ſo he did. But he was in as much daunger, this ſecond iorney againe by ſea, as he was in the firſt he made towards ÆGYPT. From CARIA, a long time after, Aratus went into ÆGYPT, and ſpake with the king, who made very much of him: for Aratus fed him ſtill by ſending of him paſſing fayer tables, and pictures of GRÆCE, of excellent workemanſhip. And in deede haning a ſinguler good wit, he alwayes got together, and bought the excellenteſt painted pictures he could get, but ſpecially the pictures of Pamphilus and Melanthus, to ſend them vnto the king. For learning floriſhed yet in the citie of SICYONE, and they eſteemed the paintings of tables in that citie, to be the perfitteſt for true cullers, and fine drawing, of all other places. Inſomuch as Apelles, (though he was then of maruelous

And therefore when Aratus had reſtored his citie againe to libertie, he cauſed all the images of the tyrannes to be defaced and plucked downe: howbeit he ſtoode doubtful a long tyme, whether he ſhould deface Ariſtratus picture or not, who raigned in the tyme of Phillip. For it was paynted with the hands of all the ſchollers of Melanthus, being by a triumphant chariot, that caried a victorie, and as Polemon the Geographer writeth, Apelles hand was to it. This picture was a paſſing peece of worke to ſee to, ſo that Aratus at the firſt yelded, and was contented to ſaue it for the excellencye of the workemanſhip: yet in the ende, ouercome with the extreme hate he bare vnto tyrants, he bad it ſhould be defaced. Now B it is reported alſo, that Nealces the paynter being one of Aratus friends, prayed him with the teares in his eyes to pardon ſuch a notable peece of worke. But when he ſawe Aratus ſo hard harted that he would not graunt it: he tolde him it was good reaſon to make warre with tyrants, but not with their pictures. Let vs then (q he) leaue the chariot of triumphe and victorie, and I will make thee ſee Ariſtratus, willingly to come out of the table. Aratus was contented to let him haue his will. Then Nealces defaced the picture of Ariſtratus, and in place thereof drue onely a palme tree, and durſt adde nothing els to it of his owne deuiſe. Some ſay, that vnder the chariot were conueied Ariſtratus feete defaced. So Aratus by meanes of theſe tables and pictures, was maruelouſly well beloued of king Ptolomy. But after that he was acquaynted with him, and knew his conuerſation: he loued him then better then before. Inſomuch that C he gaue him a hundred and fifty talents to helpe his citie withall: of the which, he caried forty away with him vnto PELOPONNESVS, and the king afterwards ſent him the reſt at ſundry tymes. Nowe this was a maruelous matter of him to get ſuch a maſſe of money together for his Citizens: conſidering that the Orators, Captaines and Gouernors of free cities, for a litle ſumme of money onely which they haue taken of kings and Princes, haue bene corrupted, & betrayed their townes and contry. But this was a more wonder, that by meanes of this money, he made peace and loue betwixt the poore and riche, and furthermore, ſaued vpright all the people of SICYONE, where he ſhewed him ſelfe maruelous wiſe, and temperate, being of that D great power and authoritie he was. For after they had choſen him Arbitrator to iudge, compownd, and abſolutely to decyde all quarrells and ſtrife betwene the baniſhed men: he would neuer vndertake it him ſelfe alone, but tooke fifteene other of the chiefeſt Citizens with him, and with them, with great paynes and trouble, at length he pacified all matters among his citizens, and made them good friends one with another. Therefore, not onely all the inhabitants and Citizens of SICYONE together, did not onely decree publike honors meete for him: but alſo the baniſhed men them ſelues did priuately caſt his image in braſſe, and ſet it vp, vnder the which they cauſed this inſcription to be grauen.

Aratus hauing done all theſe thinges, he ſuppreſſed the enuye of the Citizens, through the great good turnes he had done vnto them. But then king Antigonus being angry with Aratus in his mind, and ſeeking either to make him his friend, or to bring him to be miſtruſted of Ptolomy: he did him many other great curteſies, Aratus neuer ſeeking them at his hands. But one day ſpecially aboue the reſt, as he did ſacrifice vnto the gods at CORINTH, he ſent Aratus part of his weathers he had ſacrificed, vnto SICYONE. And at the feaſt of his ſacrifice in the hea-F ring of many noble men that were bidden gheſts, he ſayd openly of Aratus: I did alway thinke that this young SICYONIAN could not but haue a liberall mind, louing the libertie of his contry and contry men: but I perceiue now he is a man that can iudge of Princes manners and affayres. For heretofore he made no accompt of vs, bicauſe his hope was out of this contry, A and he greatly eſteemed the riches of Ægypt, hearing talke of ſo many Elephants, of ſuch a great fleete of ſhippes, and of ſuch a ſumptuous Court, as king Ptolomyes Court. But now that he knoweth by experience, that it is onely but a ſmoke and vaine pompe, he is come to vs: & for my part, he is welcome to me, & I will haue you all to take him for my friend. Theſe words of king Antigonus, were ſtraight taken at bownd of certaine enuious men, and caried for lacke of better matter vnto king Ptolomy, euery man ſtriuing who ſhould write all the euil they could againſt him: So that Ptolomy thereuppon ſent a Meſſenger of purpoſe vnto him, to reproue him for it. Thus fell there out much enuy and malice, betwene the earneſt loue of theſe Princes and kings, that contended with eche other who ſhould haue Aratus. Furthermore, the firſt Aratus doings in his firſt Prætorſhip. tyme that Aratus was choſen Lieuetenant generall of the trybe of the Achaians, he forraged B and ſpoyled the contry of Locride, which lyeth directly ouer againſt Achaia, and Caly-donia alſo. Howbeit he came not tyme enough to ayde the Boeotians, in the battell which they loſt before the citie of Chæronea, againſt the Ætolians: where Abœocritus, Gouernor of Boeotia was ſlayne in the field, with a thowſand other Boeotians. Howbeit the next yeare following, he being the ſecond time choſen Lieuetenant generall, he attempted to win the caſtell of Corinth againe, being an enterpriſe which not onely concerned the priuate benefit of Sicyone it ſelfe, and the trybe of the Achaians, but alſo of all Græce beſides.

For, he was fully bent to driue the garriſon of the Macedonians thence, the which ſeemed euen a very yoke that held all the Græcians noſes to the gryndſtone. For like as Chares, Captaine of the Athenians, hauing in a certaine conflict diſcomfited the kings Lieuetenants, C wrote to the Athenians that he had wonne a victory halfe ſiſter to the victory of Marathon: Euen ſo me thinkes it were no diſgrace to ſay, that this execution was like (as one brother to another) to the killing of the tyrants, which was done by Pelopidas Theban, and Thraſybulus Athenian, ſauing that this laſt acte was more famous, bicauſe it was not againſt Græcians, but againſt ſtraungers, and forreyn power and gouernment, vpon whom it was executed.
For the Iſthmus or barre of Peloponnesvs, which ſeperateth the ſea Ægeum from the ſea Preſche, an Iland of Peloponneſus. Ionium, doth come and ioyne the firme land of the reſt of Græce, with the Presche, an I-land of Peloponnesvs. Euen ſo likewiſe, the Mountaine called Acrocorinthe, on the which Acrocorinthus mons. the caſtell ſtandeth, riſing vp in the middeſt of Græce, when there is any garriſon of men of warre in it, it cutteth of all traffike and paſſage by, of any armies of them which inhabite with- D in the ſtraite: from them that are without the ſtraight, both by ſea and by land, and maketh him onely Lorde of the contry that keepeth the caſtell. So that it was not for ſport, but for truth, and in good earneſt, that Philip the young king of Macedon was wont to call the citie Young king Philips ſaying, of the caſtell of Corinth. and caſtell of Corinth, the ſtockes and gyues of Græce. And therefore was this caſtel mar-uelouſly wiſhed and deſired of euery man, but ſpecially of kings and Princes. But the deſire Antigonus had of it was ſo vehement, that it differed nothing from the paſſions of a frantick louer. For he did nothing els continually but ſtudy and deuiſe howe he might winne it vppon the ſodeine, from them that kept it: bicauſe otherwiſe by open force, it was impoſſible to be had. Wherefore after the death of Alexander that kept that caſtell, being poyſoned (as it is reported) by Antigonus practiſe, the caſtell being left in the handes of his wife Nicæa, who go- E uerned the ſtate of Corinthe, and did carefully cauſe the Acrocorinthe to be kept: he im-Antigonus craft and deceit. mediatly ſent his ſonne Demetrius thither, and put Nicæa in good hope to mary her with this young Prince: a thing that pleaſed this Lady well, though ſhe was very olde. So, for her ſelfe, ſhe was wonne ſtraight, by meanes of his young ſonne Demetrius, whome he vſed as a ſtale to intrappe her. Howbeit Nicæa for all this goodly offer, forſooke not her caſtell, but alwayes made it ſtraightly to be looked vnto. Antigonus ſeemed to make no accompt of it, but dayly gaue him ſelfe to make ſumptuous ſacrifices, feaſts, and playes to the gods, within the citie of Corinthe for the mariage: as though he had ment no other thing, but bancketing and iolitie all that might be. When the hower was come to ſee theſe ſportes, and that the Muſition Amœbeus began to ſinge: he him ſelfe made as though he would accompany Nicæa vnto the F Theater, being conueyed thither in a ſumptuous riche lytter, as it had bene for a Queene. She was very glad of this honor, and thought nothing leſſe then of that which happened her. But

A when Antigonus came to the ende of a ſtreete that turned to goe vp the hill towards the caſtell, he bad her keepe on ſtill to the Theater: and him ſelfe in the meane time left Amœbeus there with his ſinging, and all the feaſt of the mariage, and went ſtraight vp to the caſtell, forcing him ſelfe aboue his ſtrength and yeares. When he was at the toppe of the hill, and found the gates ſhut, he knocked with his ſtaffe, and commaunded the garriſon to open him the gates. They wondring to ſee him there in perſon, did let him in. When he was gotten into the caſtell, he was ſo exceding ioyfull of it, that he had no reaſon to moderate his ioye, but would bancket in the middeſt of ſtreetes, and in the market place, hauing minſtrells to playe vpon their inſtruments at his table, wearing garlands of flowers on their heads for ioye, and did ſo fondly and lightly behaue him ſelfe, as if he had bene a light young man, and not (as he

B was) an olde man: who had proued ſuch ſundry chaunges of fortune, and yet ſuffered him ſelfe to be thus caried away with pleaſure, that he imbraced, and ſpake to euery man he met. Whereby it is eaſie to iudge, that ioy poſſeſſing a man without wit or diſcretion, it maketh him beſides him ſelfe, and doth more trouble his wits, then payne or feare. Now Antigonus hauing wonne the caſtell of the Acrocorinthe, as you haue heard, he put it into the handes of thoſe he truſted beſt, to be ſafely kept: and therefore made Perſæus the Philoſopher Captaine of the caſtell. But in deede Aratus was in mind to haue attempted the taking of the caſtell, in Alexanders life tyme: yet he let it alone, bicauſe he ioyned him ſelfe with the Achaians. But at that tyme there was offered him another occaſion againe to attempt it, and this it was. At Corinthe, there were foure brethren borne in Syria, of the which, one of them being called

C Diocles, was a ſouldier of the garriſon of the caſtell: and the reſt, hauing robbed the kings treaſure, went ſtraight vnto Sicyone, to AEgias the banker, whome Aratus imployed in his affaires. These three brethren immediatly told him part of the gold they had robbed: and afterwards, one of them called Erginus, comming often to ſee him, by litle and litle told him all the reſt. By this meanes AEgias fell into familliar acquaintance with him, and talked with him of the garriſon of the caſtell of the Acrocorinthe. Erginus told him, that going vnto his brother vp thoſe ſteepe and highe rockes, he found a path as it were cut out of the rocke, that went to a place of the wall of the caſtell, which was very lowe. AEgias hearing that, anſwered him ſmyling: alas, my friend, what meane you to ſteale a litle peece of golde to hinder the king, when in one howers ſpace you can ſell ſuch a great maſſe of money together? for aſwell ſhall

D you dye if you be apprehended for this felony, as if you were otherwiſe attainted for treaſon. Erginus with that fell a laughing, and promiſed that he would feele his brother Diocles minde in it, for he did not greatly truſt his other brethren. So returning ſhortly after, he bargayned with Aratus to bring him to a place of the wall that was not aboue fifteene foote highe, promiſing that he would helpe him to execute the reſt, with his brother Diocles. Aratus promiſed then to giue him fifty talents, if he brought his enterpriſe to paſſe: and if he fayled, that he would then giue either of them a houſe and a talent. Erginus would haue the whole 50. talents put into AEgias the bankers handes. Aratus had not ſo much ready money, and beſides, he would not take it vp at vſery, for feare of giuing cauſe to ſuſpect his enterpriſe. Wherefore he tooke all his plate of gold and ſiluer, and his wiues iewells, and layed them to gage to AEgias,

E to diſburſe the ſayd ſumme. But Aratus had ſo great and noble a mind in him, and was ſo bent to doe notable acts: that knowing howe Phocion and Epaminondas had bene eſteemed for the iuſteſt and honeſteſt men of Græce, bicauſe they had refuſed great gifts that were offered them, and would neuer ſell nor ſtayne their honor for money: he yet ſurpaſſing them, was contented to ſpend his owne, to bring any good enterpriſe to paſſe, & did put his life in daunger for the common benefit of his contry men, they them ſelues knowing nothing of his enterpriſe, which turned all to their benefit. What is he then, that will not wonder at the great magnanimitie and corage of ſuch a man, and that will not euen nowe as it were, be willing to ayde him: conſidering how dearely he bought ſo great a daunger of his perſon, and howe he laied his plate and all the richies he had to gage, to be brought in the night among the middeſt

F of his enemies, where he was to fight for his owne life, hauing no other gage nor pledge, but the hope of ſuch a noble enterpriſe, and nothing els? But now, though the enterpriſe of it ſelf was daungerous, an error chaunced through ignorance at the firſt, made it yet more daungerous. For Aratus had ſent Technon, one of his men before with Diocles, to viewe the wall. A This Technon had neuer ſpoken with Diocles, howbeit he thought in his minde what manner of man he was, by the markes that Erginus had giuen him of him: that he had a blacke curled heare, that his face was blacke, and that he had no beard. Nowe Technon being come to the place where Erginus ſayd he would be with Diocles: he ſtayed before the towne in a place called ORNIS. So whileſt he was tarying there, the elder brother of Diocles, called Dionyſius (who knew nothing of the enterpriſe, nor was made acquaynted withall, and looked very like his brother Diocles) came that way by chaunce. Technon being moued by the markes he ſawe in him, like vnto thoſe he was told of: asked him if he were nothing a kinne to Erginus. The other aunſwered, he was his brother. Then Technon perſwading him ſelfe it was certenly Diocles that ſpake to him, without asking him his name, or making other inquiery of him: he B tooke him by the hand, and began to talke with him of the practiſe he had with Erginus, and to aske him of it. Dionyſius taking the matter vpon him, & feeding on his error, returned forthwith into the citie, holding him on ſtill with talke, Technon miſtruſting nothing. But euen as Dionyſius was ready to take him faſt by the choller: his brother Erginus came. Who, perceyuing how Technon had miſtaken the matter, and the daunger he was in: beckned to him with his head to flye, and ſo they both ranne for life vnto Aratus, to ſaue them ſelues. Howbeit Aratus was nothing the more diſcoraged for this, but ſent Erginus ſtraight to cary his brother Dionyſius money, and to praye him not to be aknowen of anything: who furthermore brought him with him vnto Aratus. But after they had him once, they made him ſure for ſtarting: for they bound him, and locked him vp faſt in a chamber, whileſt they went about their enter- C priſe. So when all things were ready, Aratus commaunded the reſt of his army that they ſhould tary behind, armed all night: and he him ſelfe, with foure hundred of the beſt men he had, (not knowing them ſelues whether they went, nor to what intent) went ſtraight to the gates of the citie, paſſing by the temple of Iuno. This was about the middeſt of ſummer, when the Moone was at the full, and the element very cleere without clowdes: inſomuch that they were afraid their armors would gliſter by Moone light, and bewray them. But as the formoſt of them came neare vnto the citie, there roſe clowdes out of the ſea that darkened all the citie & places thereabouts, and ſhadowed them. Then all of them ſitting downe on the ground, plucked of their ſhoes, both bicauſe they ſhould make leſſe noyſe, as alſo for that their footing ſhould be ſurer, and that they ſhould ſlippe leſſe vpon the ladders. But Erginus, and ſeuen other com- D panions with him like men that trauell, came ſecretly into the gate of the citie, and ſlue the porter and warders there. At that very inſtant, Aratus cauſed the ladders to be ſet vp againſt the walls, and made a hundred of his ſouldiers get vp on them: and ſent alſo to commaund the reſt, that they ſhould follow him with all poſſible ſpeede. Then drawing vp his ladders after him, as faſt as he could, he went through the citie with his hundred men toward the caſtel, with ſuch a ioyfull cheere, as if he had had it already in his hand, for that he ſaw he was not diſcouered. But as he went on, he ſaw foure of the watch comming with a light againſt them. They ſaw not Aratus and his company, but the enemies ſaw them plainely a farre of. Aratus & his men therefore ſtoode vp cloſe againſt old walls to tary their comming, and at the firſt on- E ſet, ſlue three of them: but the fourth hauing a blowe on his head with a ſworde, ranne away, making an outcry, that the enemies were in the citie. The trompets forthwith ſownded the alarom, all the citie was in an vprore, the ſtreetes were ſtraight full of people ronning vp and downe, and of lights in euery corner, both beneath in the citie, as alſo in the caſtell, and the noyſe was great euery where. Aratus in the meane tyme forced to get vp the hie rocks fayer & ſoftely at the firſt, and with great payne and difficultie, being out of his parhe he ſhould haue found, which he miſſed, being very deepe into the rocks, and with many crookes and crankes went to the foote of the caſtell: but ſodainely, euen as it had bene by miracle, the Moone appearing through the clowdes, when they were in their worſt way, it gaue the light, & brought them to that part of the wall where they ſhould be, and ſtraight the Moone was ſhadowed againe. Now the three hundred ſouldiers whome Aratus had left at the gate by the temple of F Iuno, when they were come into the citie, being full of lights, and in vprore, and beſides could not find the path by the which their Captaine Aratus went before them: they ſtoode cloſe together

The happy benefit of the Moone.

A gether vnder a rocke that ſhadowed them, ſorowfully looking to heare ſome newes of Aratus: who was then fighting with the garriſon of the caſtell, the which made head againſt him with all the force and power they could. Vnder the caſtell there was a great noyſe heard of men that fought, but yet the noyſe was ſo confuſed by the ſound rebounding againſt the rocks and mountaine, that they could not deuiſe whence it thould come. So they being in this perplexitie, not knowing which way to turne them ſelues: Archelaus, Captaine of king Antigonus men, hauing a good number of ſouldiers with him, went vp the hill with great cryes and noyſe of trumpets, to ſet vpon Aratus, and his company behind. But after he was paſſed by theſe three hundred ſouldiers of Aratus band, they gaue charge vpon him, as if they had bene layed there in ambuſhe of purpoſe, and ſlue the firſt they encountered withall, and made the others
B ſo affrayde, and Archelaus him ſelfe, that they diſperſed them, and made ſome flye one way, ſome another waye. So, as they were ouerthrowen, Erginus came to theſe three hundred men, comming immediatly from them that fought, and brought them newes that Aratus and them of the caſtell, were come to the ſworde together, and valliantly defended them ſelues, luſtely fighting for the wall, and therefore it was tyme for them to helpe him quickly. Then the ſouldiers bad him bringe them thither ſtraight, and ſo he did. So they clyming vp the hill, did ſignifie by their cryes to their men, that they came to ayde him. Furthermore, the Moone beeing then at the full, and ſhining on their harnes, made their enemies in the caſtell thinke that they were a greater number then in deede they were, bicauſe of the longe waye they had to make to gette vppe vpon the rockes: and alſo bicauſe of the ſound in C the night, that made their crye ſeeme to be of a greater number then they were. At length they ioyning with Aratus, they fought it out ſo luſtely, that they draue the garriſonous of the walls, and by breake of daye wanne the caſtell. So that their exployt was diſcouered by the riſing of the Sunne, and beſides, all the reſt of their armye that came from the citie of SICYONE: whome the CORINTHIANS very gladly receyued, and did ſet open their gates vnto them, and ayded them to take king Antigonus men. Afterwards, when they thought that all was ſafe, then Aratus came from the caſtell vnto the Theater of the citie, whether repayred an infinite number of people, aſwell for the deſire they had to ſee him, as alſo to heare him ſpeake vnto the CORINTHIANS. So hauing placed the ACHAIANS of either ſide, at the comming into the Theater: Aratus being armed, went vp into the chayer or pulpit for D orations, hauing his face quite chaunged, both for the great paynes he had taken, and alſo for lacke of ſleepe: ſo that his body being ouerwearied, his ſpirits were euen done. Now when all the aſſembly of the people (ſeeing him in the chayer) did humble them ſelues to ſhewe him all the honor and kindnes they could poſſible: he tooke his ſpeare out of his left hand into his right, and bowing his knee and body ſomewhat, he leaned vpon it, and ſo ſtoode a great while in this manner before he ſpake, receiuing the cryes of ioy and clapping of handes which the people made, prayſing his valliantnes, and bleſſing his good happe and fortune. Then when they had done, and were quiet againe, he framed his countenance, and began to make an oration vnto them in the name of all the tribe and common wealth of the ACHAIANS, moere for the enterpriſe from whence he came: and perſwaded them to ioyne to the ACHAIANS. So E therewithall, they preſently deliuered him the keyes of their citie, the which were neuer before that tyme in their power, ſince the raigne of king Philip. Nowe touching the other Captaines of king Antigonus: Aratus hauing taken Archelaus priſoner, he let him goe, but put Theophraſtus to death, bicauſe he would not goe out of CORINTHE. Perſeus (Captaine of the caſtell) ſeeing the caſtell but loſt: he ſecretly ſaued him ſelfe, & fled vnto the citie of CENCHREES. And it is reported, that as he was afterwards in talke of Philoſophie, where one mainteyning that a man could not be a good Captaine, vnles he were a perfit wiſe man: This (ſaid he) is one of Zenoes opinions rightly, the which heretofore pleaſed me beſt: but now this young SICYONIAN Aratus, hath made me of an other mind. Many writers doe report this ſaying of Perſeus. Furthermore Aratus wanne preſently the temple of Iuno, and the hauen of LECHAEVM, F where he tooke fiue and twenty ſhippes of king Antigonus, and fiue hundred horſe of ſeruice for the warre, and foure hundred SYRIANS, which he ſold euery one of them. The ACHAIANS left within the caſtell of the Acrocorinthe, a garriſon of foure hundred footemen, and fiftye doggs, and as many hunts, all the which were kept for the watch of the castell. Now, the Romanes wondring at the valliantnes of Philopemen: they called him the last of the Græcians: Euen so might I also (in my opinion) say, that this acte is the last and most famous of all the Græcians, and deserueth to be equall, aswell for valliantnes, as also good successe, with the greatest exployes of the most famous auncients: as that which followed immediatly after doth amply declare. For the Megarians reuolting from king Antigonus, did straight ioyne with Aratus: and the Troezenians also with the Epidavrians, did likewise enter into league and friendship with the Achaians. So at the first inuasion he made, he went to spoyle the contry of Attica, and crossed ouer to the Ile of Salamina, and spoyled and destroyed it, euen as if he had deliuered the power and force of the Achaians out of prison, to serue his owne turne in any thing he thought good of. Howbeit, he sent home the Athenian prisoners without paying of ransom: and all of policie to make them desirous to rebell against the Macedonians. Furthermore, he made king Ptolomy a friend and confederat of the Achaians, with condition, that he should be Lieuetenant generall both by sea & by lande. For these respects Aratus was of maruelous estimation and credit with the Achaians: insomuch that where they could not yearely choose him their general, being contrary to their law: they chose him at the least euery second yeare, but in effect, all was done by his aduise and counsell. For they saw plainly, that it was nether honor, nor riches, nor friendship of kings & Princes, nor the priuate benefit of his owne citie wherein he was borne, nor any other thing els that he preferred, before the glory & increase of the common wealth of the Achaians. For he was of opinion, that cities by the selues were but weake, & being ioyned together with the chaine of common benefit, they were a strength one to preserue the other. And in like manner, euen as the parts that are in the bodies of brute beasts haue life & sustenance, being ioyned & knit together, & straight so soone as there is any seperation of them thone from thother, they liue no more & putrifie: euen so cities also were brought to decay by them that did disperse their societie among them, & in contrary manner did then againe increase, when ioyning with any other great body & city, they were gouerned with wisedom & good counsell. So Aratus seing the chiefest cities thereabouts enioy their lawes and liberties: thought it a shamefull thing to leaue the Argiues in slauery & bondage. Wherefore he practised to kil the tyrant Aristomachus that gouerned them, both to shew him selfe thankefull to the citie for his bringing vppe there: as also to ioyne that great & mighty citie vnto the tribe of the Achaians. Now there were diuers men that had the harts and corage to vndertake to doe it, of the which the chiefest were AEschylus, and Charimenes the Soothsayer, but they had no swordes: for they were straightly forbidden by the tyrant, and grieuous punishments ordeyned for them that should be found with any swordes. Aratus therefore caused certen litle short daggers to be made at Corinthe for them, the which he sowed vp in packes caried on certen beasts loden with other baggage and stuffe. But the Soothsayer Charimenes, did impart this enterprise vnto a third man, and made him one of the conspiracie with them. AEschylus being very much offended with it, beganne therefore to enter into practise by him selfe, and left their company. Charimenes perceiuing that, tooke such a toye in his head in a mad moode, that he bewrayed them as they went about to execute their enterprise. This notwithstanding, the most parte of the conspirators saued them selues, and fled to Corinthe. So the tyrant Aristomachus was slaine shortly after, by his owne men. But then another tyrant, Aristippus, a crueller man than the first, made haste to take the tyranny before he could be resisted. This notwithstanding, Aratus, with all the young men of the Achaians able to serue in the field, went sodainly thither with ayde, hoping to find them of the citie very glad to recouer their libertie. Howbeit the people being acquainted, and of long time vsed paciently to beare the yoke of bondage: there was not a man of them that would once take his part. So he returned backe againe, and did nothing, sauing that thereby the Achaians were accused, bicause that in open peace they had made warre, & therfore they were put in sute before the Mantinians, at Aristippus request, tyrant of Argos. The matter was pleaded in Aratus absence, & the Achaians were condened to pay the summe of 30. Minas. After this proofe & attept of Aratus, Aristippus being affraid of Aratus, & hating him to the death, sought waies to kil him, with the help of Antigonus, who did aide him in

A in it: and almoſt there were ſpialls in euery corner, that did nothing els but lye in wayte to execute Ariſtippus minde. Now, there is no ſuerer garde vnto a Prince, then the perfit loue and good will of his ſubiects. For, after that the nobilitie and common people haue bene vſed to feare, not him, but thoſe that for him commaund them: he then ſeeth with many eyes, heareth with many eares, and knoweth what is done farre of. Here therefore I will a litle digreſſe from my hiſtorie, to ſhewe you the manner of Ariſtippus life the tyrant, whereunto he was brought by this ſo much deſired tyrannical gouernment, and ſmoke of ſignioríe, ſo eſteemed of all men. Now, though Ariſtippus had king Antigonus his friend, and that he kept a great gard of ſouldiers about him for the ſafety of his perſon, and that there was not an enemy of his left aliue in all the citie: yet he made his ſouldiers watche and lye without his pallace, vn-

B der the cloiſters and galleries thereabouts, & after ſupper turned all his men out of the dores, & then ſhut his Court gates to him, and locked him ſelfe alone with his Concubine, in a litle hie chamber with a trappe dore, and ſet his bed vpon it, & ſo ſlept, as one that continually was affraid of him ſelfe. Then after he was come vp, his Concubines mother came to take vp the ladder, and locked it in an other chamber: and ſo did let it downe againe the next morning, and called this trymme tyrant, that went downe out of his chamber, like a ſnake that ſhould haue crept out of her hole. Where Aratus in contrary manner, not hauing obtained by force of armes, but lawfully through vertue a continuall gouernment, being ſimply apparelled with a poore gowne of ſmal price, & ſhewing him ſelf a mortal enemy vnto all ſorts of tyrants: hath left a race & noble ofspring among the GRECIANS, which remaine yet vntill this preſent day.

C Contrarily alſo, there are fewe tyrants that doe vſurpe the caſtells of free cities, that keepe ſo many ſouldiers in pay, that make ſuch prouiſion for armor and weapon, & haue ſo many gates and drawbridges for the ſafety of their perſons, that in the ende can keepe them ſelues from violent death, no more then hares: nether doe leaue alſo any poſteritie, houſe, or graue, why their memorie ſhould be honored after their death. So Aratus hauing diuers waies made ſundry attempts, both by open force, and otherwiſe ſodainely, to take the citie of ARGOS, and to thruſt out the tyrant Ariſtippus: he euer fayled of his purpoſe, but ſpecially one night among the reſt, when he entred the citie very daungerouſly, with a fewe ſouldiers with him, and ſlue the ſouldiers that came to giue ſupply to them that fought. But after that day was broken, and that the tyrant with all his forces came to ſet vpon him: the ARGIVES ſturred not at all, as if

D Aratus had not fought for their libertie, but as though they had bene Iudges appoynted to ſit to ſee the ſportes of the games Nemee, to iudge the game vnto the Conqueror without partiality, and with indifferency. Aratus in the meane tyme fighting like a valliant man, was thruſt at with a pyke, and ronne through the thighe. This notwithſtanding, at length he wanne that part of the citie where he fought, and was not thruſt out till night, what force ſoeuer the enemies made vpon him: and if he could poſſibly haue holden it out all night, he had vndoubtedly obtayned his purpoſe. For the tyrant looked for no other but to flye, and had already ſent diuers of his goods to the ſea. Howbeit no man once came to tell Aratus any newes of it, beſides alſo lacking water, and for that he could not helpe him ſelfe bicauſe of his wound, he was driuen to leade his men away, and fayled of his purpoſe. So, diſpayring that he could euer

E take it by ſtelth, he went thither with open warres, and ſpoyled and deſtroyed all the contry of ARGOS: and hauing fought a great battell againſt the tyrant Ariſtippus, by the ryuer of Chares, they blamed Aratus much, that he forſooke the victorie, and cowardly retyred out of the battell. For the reſt of his army doubtles had the better, and had followed the enemies farre in chaſe: when he fled, being affrayd, not compelled by his enemies, but miſtruſting his fortune, and retyred to his lodging. So, when they that returned from the chaſe of their enemies were offended, for that they hauing put them to flight, and alſo ſlayne a greater number moe of them then they had loſt of theirs, and yet for cowardlines ſhoulde ſuffer their enemies (whome they had ouercome and put to flight) to ſette vppe markes of triumphe in token of victorie: Aratus beeing aſhamed of it, determined to fight once agayne, for the markes of F triumphe. Whereuppon, reſting his men but one daye, he led them agayne into the field, and ſetting his armye in battell raye, offered to fight once more. This notwithſtanding, when he ſawe a great ſupply comming to his enemye, and that the tyrants men came to fight more luſtely, and with better corage then before: Aratus durſt not abyde them, but retyred, and A ſent to demaund leaue to take away his dead men to bury them. Yet he could ſpeake ſo curteouſly, and behaue him ſelfe ſo wiſely, by the experience he had in gouernment, and alſo for the good will they bare him: that they forgat the fault he committed, and he wanne the citie of Cleones vnto the Achaians, where he cauſed the feaſtes of the games Nemee to be celebrated, as belonging of great antiquitie, rather vnto the Cleonaians, then vnto the Argives. This notwithſtanding, the Argives did keepe it alſo, and then was the firſt time that the ſanctuary and priuiledge was broken, which was wont to be graunted vnto all them that came to play for the games: bicauſe the Achaians did make them priſoners that fought in Argos, as they returned through their contry, and ſold them as enemies. So maruelouſly did Aratus and the Achaians hate all ſortes of tyrants, without reſpect of pardon. Shortly after B he was aduertiſed, that the tyrant Ariſtippus did lye in wayte to ſpye oport unitie, to take the citie of Cleones from him: howbeit that he was affrayd of it, bicauſe he remayned at that tyme in Corinthe. So Aratus ſtraight ſent out commaundement into euery place, to aſſemble the army of the trybe of the Achaians, and that they ſhould bring vittells with them for many dayes: and ſo craftily came downe to the citie of Cenchrees, to intiſe Ariſtippus, by his going away ſo farre of, that in his abſence he ſhoulde attempt to ſet vpon the Cleonians, as in deede he did. For, he fayled not preſently to goe thither with his armye. But Aratus returning from Cenchrees vnto Corinthe, very late in the night, and hauing layed good watche euery way: he ſodainely brought the armye of the Achaians vnto Cleones with ſuch ſpeede and quietnes, that they were not ſeene as they came, but entred into C the citie of Cleones by night, and were ready to fight with the tyrant, before he knewe they were come. So the gates of the citie were ſet open by breake of daye, and the ſignall of battell giuen by ſound of trumpetts: and ſo ſetting vpon the tyrants men with great cryes, they ſuſpecting nothing, they were preſently put to flight. And bicauſe the place where the ouerthrowe was giuen, had many turnings: Aratus following the chaſe, tooke the way which he thought the tyrant fled in. The chaſe continued to the citie of Mycenes. There the tyrant was ouertaken by a Cretan called Tragiſcus, (as Dinias reporteth) who ſlue him: and there were ſlayne of his men alſo, aboue fifteene thowſand. But now Aratus hauing wonne ſuch a famous victorie, and loſt neuer a man: he could not yet winne the citie of Argos, nor ſet it againe at liberty. For one AEgias, and another Ariſtomachus, got into the towne with the kings D army, and kept it. But notwithſtanding, by this noble victorie Aratus did race out a great part of the reproache they gaue him, and of the ſcoffes and ſlents the flatterers of the tyrants deuiſed of him. Who to pleaſe them, reported, that when they ſhould come to fight in deede, the generall of the Achaians had the winde collicke in his belly, and a dymneſſe in his eyes with a guydines in his head, when he heard but the ſound of the trumpetts. And furthermore alſo, when he had ſet his men in battell raye, and giuen them the word of battell: he asked the generalls if he ſhould neede to be there in perſon, bicauſe he was hurt in the heele, and then would get him as farre of as he could, to ſee the ende of the battel. This talke was ſo common, that the Philoſophers them ſelues diſputing of it, to wete, whether to tremble and change cuIler in preſent daunger and perill, be ſignes of a faint hart, or of an euill complexion and cold- B nes of body: they alway vouched Aratus, that had bene a good and valliant Captaine, and yet when he began to fight, he was euer in that taking. So when he had ouercome Ariſtippus, he ſought meanes alſo to deſtroy Lyſiadas Megalopolitan, who as abſolute Lord and king of the contry, kept the city of Megalipolis. Notwithſtanding, he had no baſe minde in him, nether was he caried away with a cruell deſire of tyrannye to liue at his pleaſure, nor through extreme couetouſnes, as moſt Princes be: but being a young man, & pricked forward with deſire of honor & fame, & hauing vnaduiſedly cõceiued in his mind, (which was great & highly bent) the vaine reaſons he heard men talke of principality, as of a ſtate moſt bleſſed, & worthy of admiration: he found the meanes to make him ſelfe Lord of his contry. But afterwards, he P was ſoone weary of the daungers & troubles ſuch maner of gouernmẽt bringeth with it, & deſired to follow Aratus, whome he ſawe proſper, and of great honor. Furthermore alſo, fearing his ſecret practiſes againſt him, he tooke holde of a noble deuiſe: firſt, to rid him ſelfe of the Lyſiadas, tyran of Megalipolis.

A malice and feare of the priſon and garde of his ſouldiers: and laſtly, to be a benefactor to his contry. So he ſent for Aratus, gaue vp his gouernment, and deliuered vp his citie to the trybe of the ACHAIANS. They ſo extolled him for this acte, that they choſe him their Lieuetenant generall of all their tribe. Wherefore, Lyſiadas, ſtriuing at the firſt to excell Aratus in honor, attempted diuers things which were not very needefull: as amonge others, to make warre with the LACEDÆMONIANS. But Aratus was very much againſt him in that, though ſome thinke it was for enuy. Thereuppon they choſe Lyſiadas generall of the ACHAIANS the ſecond tyme: although Aratus openly both ſpake, and made what meanes he could to the contrary, & would haue had an other to haue bene choſen. For, he him ſelfe was euery other yeare generall. So, Lyſiadas was choſen againe generall of the ACHAIANS the third time, with euery bodies good

B will: and Aratus and he had abſolute power and gouernment by turnes, one after the other. But when they ſaw that Lyſiadas became open enemy vnto Aratus, and did ſtill accuſe him in all their counſels and aſſemblies: they fell in ſuch miſliking with him, that they reiected him. For they thought his but a coũterfeate vertue, to contend with the perfitnes of Aratus vertue. Much like vnto one of Iſopes fables, ſaying that litle birdes did aunſwer the cuckow on a tyme, asking them why they did flie from her: bicauſe we are affrayd (ſayd they) thou wilt be a ſperhawke one day. Euen ſo it ſeemeth, that there was a certaine ſuſpition in mens minds of Lyſiadas tyranny, which made them miſtruſt that he went not from his tyrannie with good will. Now Aratus on thother ſide, wanne as great praiſe and honor by his doings againſt the ÆTOLIANS. For when the ACHAIANS would needes haue fought vpon the confines of the territo-

C ry of the MEGARIANS, and that Agis, king of LACEDÆMON, being come with his army to the campe of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, did perſwade them hardily to giue battell: Aratus was ſtowtely againſt it, and did abide many mocks and tawnts they gaue him, ſaying, that it was for cowardlines he would not goe. This notwithſtanding, he would not leaue his wiſe and ſafe determination, for all that open ſhame: but ſuffered the enemies to paſſe ouer the Mountaine Gerania, and to inuade PELOPONNESVS, and would neuer fight with them. But afterwards, when he ſaw that at their firſt comming they had taken the citie of PALLENA: he then chaũged his mind, and would deferre time no lenger to tary till all his power were come together, but marched forthwith againſt his enemies, with thoſe few he had, who maruelouſly weakned them ſelues by their inſolency and diſorder after their victory, keeping no watche nor warde.

D For after they had entred the citie of PALLENA, the ſoldiers ranne into euery houſe, one thruſting in an others necke, and fighting for the goods they found. The Captaines alſo fell to rauiſhing of maides, and the PALLENIANS wiues, and put their burganets and morrions vpon their heades, that none other ſhould take them, bicauſe that by the ſame the ſouldiers ſhould know whoſe they were, and to whome the women belonged. So they being in this ruffe and iolitie: newes came ſodainly that Aratus was come. This made them quake for feare, when they ſaw they were like to be taken out of order. For before they all vnderſtoode of the daunger by their ſodaine ſetting on them, the ACHAIANS were fighting already within the ſuburbs and gates of the citie, againſt the firſt that reſiſted, whome they ſlue. They being broken, & put to flight, made the reſt ſo affraid that were gathered together to ayde them, that they wiſt not

E what to doe. In this tumult and great hurly burly, there was one of the Ladies a priſoner, that was the Daughter of Epigethes one of the nobleſt men of the citie, and ſhe a maruelous goodly woman, and paſſing fayer: who being ſet in the temple of Diana, whether a Captaine had brought her that had choſen her for him ſelfe, and had put his burganet on her head: ſhe ſodainely ranne to the gate of the temple with the burganet on her head, when ſhe heard the noyſe of them that fought, to ſee them fight. The Citizens ſeeing her in that array, found her the goodlier to behold, and of greater maieſty, then any worldly creature. The enemies on the other ſide were ſo affraid to ſee her, thinking ſhe had bene ſome ſpirit: that not a man of them durſt once defend them ſelues. So the PALLENIANS ſay, that the image of Diana all the reſt of the tyme is kept locked vp, and no body toucheth it, and that when the Nunne that keepeth

F it doth cary it diſwhere, no man dare looke on it, but euery man turneth his eyes away: bicauſe the ſight of it is not onely fearefull and hurtfull vnto men, but it alſo killeth the frute of the trees it paſſeth by, and maketh them barren. This was the cauſe that then troubled the Æ-

TOLIANS mindes so muche, bicause the Nunne remouing the image of the goddesse Diane, she turned it towards them. Howbeit Aratus in his commentaries maketh no mention of this at all, but onely writeth that when he had defeated the ÆTOLIANS, following them in chase, he entred hand ouer head with them that fled into the citie, out of the which he draue them, and slue seuen hundred of them. This noble victory hath bene esteemed amonge the chiefest afterwards: and the paynter Timanthes hath drawen and set it forth in table very liuely. This notwithstanding, bicause diuers Princes and people did immediatly prepare force against the ACHAIANS: Aratus presently made peace with the ÆTOLIANS by the practise of Pantaleon, who bare great swaye and authoritie amongest them. Furthermore, Aratus being desirous to set the ATHENIANS at libertie, he sodainly attempted to take the hauen of PIRÆA: for the which the ACHAIANS reproued him, bicause he had broken the peace they had made with the MACEDONIANS. But Aratus in his commentaries doth stowtely denye that it was he, and layeth the fault vpon Erginus, by whose meanes he wanne the castell of the Acrocorinthe: saying that it was he, that of his owne minde did set a scaling ladder to the wall, and that his ladder breaking vnder him, he fled vpon it, and perceyuing he was followed neare by the enemies, he styll cryed out, Aratus, as if he had bene there, and by this pollicye mocked his enemies, and saued him selfe. Howbeit me thinkes this aunswer is not true. For it is not credible, that Erginus a priuate souldier, and a SYRIAN borne, shoulde haue so greate an enterprise in his head, vnles it had bene by Aratus consent and commaundement, who had giuen him men, tyme, and meanes to vndertake it. And this appeared playnely afterwardes. For, Aratus did not attempt it twyse or thryse onely, but oftener then so (as those that extreamely desire a thinge) to take the hauen of PIRÆA on the sodaine, not giuing ouer for once fayling, but rather imboldening him selfe agayne with good hope, bicause he mist it but litle, and that he came so neare the taking of it. And another tyme also amongest others, flying through the playne of THRIASIA, he brake his legge, and was driuen to haue many incisions to heale it: so that he was a longe tyme together caryed in his lytter to the warres. After that king Antigonus was deade, and that Demetrius his sonne succeeded him in the kingdome: he attempted then more earnestly then euer before, to set the citye of ATHENS at libertye, making small accompt of the MACEDONIANS. Aratus therefore beeing ouerthrowen in battell neare vnto PHYLACIA, by king Demetrius Lieuetenant, called BITHYS: and the rumor running straight abroad, that Aratus was deade, or at the least that he was taken prisoner: one named Diogenes, Captaine of the hauen of PIRÆA, wrote a letter vnto CORINTHE, and commaunded the garrison of the ACHAIANS that kept it, to deliuer the towne, for Aratus was deade. But he by chaunce was at the selfe same tyme in CORINTHE: so that they which brought the letters went home with a mocke, without their purpose, and made all the companye meary. Furthermore, king Demetrius him selfe sent a gallye out of MACEDON, to bringe Aratus bound vnto him. The ATHENIANS them selues also, to please the MACEDONIANS, exceeding all lightnes of flatterye, ware garlands of their heads a whole day together, in token of common ioy, when newes was brought them of Aratus death. Aratus was so mad in his minde to heare this, that he brought his armye presently against them, euen to the very suburbes of the Academy. Notwithstanding, at their earnest requests, he did no hurt there. And afterwardes, the ATHENIANS acknowledging his valliantnes, when king Demetrius dyed: it tooke them in the heads to recouer their libertie againe. So Aratus, though that yeare another man was generall of the ACHAIANS, and that he kept his bedde, lying sicke of a longe disease: yet to further this, he was caried to ATHENS in a lytter, and so perswaded Diogenes, Captaine of the garrison there, that for the summe of a hundred and fifty talents (towards the which Aratus gaue of his owne, twenty talents) he made him deliuer the ATHENIANS the hauen of PIRÆA, the castell of MVNICHIA, the Ile of SALAMINA, and the castell of SVNIVM. After this, the ÆGINETES, the HERMIONIANS, and the moste parte of ARCADIA it selfe, did presently ioyne with the ACHAIANS: so that the MACEDONIANS beeing occupied with warres at that tyme in other places agaynst their neighbours, the power of the ACHAIANS marueilously increased, hauing also the ÆTOLIANS their confederates. Then Aratus to performe his olde promise, promiſe, and being angrie to ſee the citie of ARGOS (being ſo neere neighbour vnto them) yet kept in bondage: he ſent vnto Ariſtomachus, to perſwade him to be contented to ſet his citie againe at libertie, and to ioyne it to the tribe of the ACHAIANS, as Lyſiadas had done his towne of MEGALIPOLIS, and rather too like to be made a Generall with honor and praiſe of ſo great and famous a ſtate as the ACHAIANS: then tyran of one only citie, hated, and euerie hower of the night and day in daunger of his life. Ariſtomachus gaue eare to his perſwaſions, and ſent vnto Aratus, telling him that he had neede of fiftie talentes to diſcharge the ſouldiers he had about him. The money was ſtraight prepared. And Lyſiadas that was at that time Generall of the ACHAIANS, and that maruelouſlie deſired this matter might be brought to paſſe by his meanes: he ſecretlie ſent vnto Ariſtomachus to accuſe Aratus, and ſhewed howe he had bene alway a mortall enemy vnto tyrans, and therefore counſelled him rather to put him ſelfe into his hands, as in deede he did. For, Lyſiadas brought Ariſtomachus vnto the counſell of the ACHAIANS. There all the counſell plainlie ſhewed their good wills, and the confidence they had in Aratus: for when he ſpake againſt it, that they ſhould not receiue Ariſtomachus, they reiected him with great anger. But afterwards alſo when Aratus was wonne, and that he began to moue the contrarie to the counſell: they ſtraight agreed to receiue the ARGIVES, and the PHLIASIANS in league with them, and alſo the next yeare following, they choſe Ariſtomachus Lieutenaunt generall of all their tribe. Ariſtomachus ſeeing him ſelfe in credit nowe with the ACHAIANS, would needes inuade the contrie of LACONIA with a maine armie, and ſent for Aratus being then at ATHENS. Aratus wrote vnto him, and wiſhed him in any wiſe not to meddle with that iorney, bicauſe he would not haue the ACHAIANS to deale with Cleomenes, king of LACEDÆMON, that was a coragious and ſtowt young Prince, and maruelouſlie growen in ſhort time. Howbeit Ariſtomachus being ſelfe willed in that poynt, Aratus obeyed him, and was there in perſon all that iorney. So Cleomenes being come to them vppon the ſodaine with his armie, neere vnto the citie of PALANTIVM: Ariſtomachus woulde needes fight with him. But Aratus diſſwaded him from it. Whereupon Lyſiadas afterwards accuſed him to the ACHAIANS, and the next yere following he contended with him, ſuing to be Generall: howbeit he was reiected by moſt voyces, and Aratus choſen Generall the twelfth time. The ſelfe ſame yeare he was ouerthrowen in battell by Cleomenes, neere vnto the mountaine Lycæum, and being fled, wandered vp and downe in the night, that euerie man thought he had bene ſlaine, and it ranne for good payment among all the GRECIANS. Howbeit he ſaued himſelfe, and hauing gathered his men together againe, not contenting him that he had ſcaped with life, but wiſelie taking the oportunitie and occaſion offered, no man knowing it, nor miſtruſting his comming: he ſodainlie went to aſſaile the MANTINIANS, which were confederats of Cleomenes, and hauing taken the citie of MANTINEA, he left a great garriſon in it, and made the ſtraungers that were there, free of the citie. Thus Aratus was he alone, that being ouercome wanne the ACHAIANS that, which they them ſelues could ſcarcelie haue wonne, if they had bene conquerors. Afterwards, the LACEDÆMONIANS inuading the territories of the MEGALOPOLITANS with a great armie, Aratus ſodainlie went thither to aide them, but would hazard battell no more, nor geue Cleomenes vantage, who deſired only to fight, and ſtill conſtantlie reſiſted the MEGALOPOLITANES, that prouoked him to come to the field. For beſides that in nature he was not meete for a ſet battell, at that time alſo he was the weaker in men, and had to doe with a venterous young man, that was all fire: where his corage and ambicion on the other ſide was coole, & quiet enough. Furthermore he conſidered, that as king Cleomenes ſought honor by valliant ventering, which he had not before: euen ſo it was his parte wiſelie to keepe that which he had long ſince gotten, and to ſtande vppon his gard and ſafetie. This notwithſtanding, the light armed men being put out into the fielde, and hauing chaſed the LACEDÆMONIANS euen into their campe, & entring in with the hand ouer head: Aratus would neuer bring out his citizens, but ſtayed them in a great valley that lay betwene them both, and would not let them come on any further. Whereuithall Lyſiadas being mad with him ſelfe, and falling out with Aratus: he called for the horſemen, & ſayd that he would yet helpe them that followed the chaſe, and prayed them not to loſe the victorie ſo cowardly, of the which they were ſo ſure: nor to forſake him at a pinche, fighting for defence of their contrie. So hauing gotten a great number of choyse horsemen together, he went with great furie, and gaue charge of the right wing of his enemies battell, and hauing dispersed them, and put them to flight, he vnaduisedlie followed them with great corage, into euill fauoured crooked wayes, among trees, and great broade ditches. Whereuppon Cleomenes came, and so lustely set on him, that he slue him dead in the place, valliantly fighting and defending him selfe. The other men of armes flying also, rushed in againe into the battell of the footemen, and so disordered their rankes, that they made all their armie flie for feare. For this cause they greatly blamed Aratus, bicause he had forsaken Lysiadas: and being forced vnto it by the Achaians that went without his leaue, he followed them at length, and fled him selfe also vnto the city of Ægivm. There the Achaians sitting in counsell, they decreed that they would furnish Aratus with no more money, neither would they pay his straungers any more: & bad him pay them at his owne charge, if he would enterteine them for the warre. Aratus perceiuing they did him great wrong, stoode euen indifferent to deliuer vp his commission of Lieutenancy, and to discharge him selfe of his office: but after he had bethought him selfe better, he bare it pacientlie, and led the Achaians directlie to the citie of Orchomene. There he valliantlie fought with Megistonus, king Cleomenes father in lawe, and had the vpper hande of him: for he slue three hundred of his men, and tooke Megistonus selfe prisoner. Furthermore, where before euerie second yeare they did vse to choose him their Lieutenant generall: when his turne came about againe, they called him to geue him the office, but he refused it, and Timoxenus was chosen in his roome. Now the cause alleaged for his refusall, was sayd to be, for that he misliked of the common people. But that foundeth like a lye: for the trueth of it, to my seming was, for that he saw the state of the Achaians to decline. For king Cleomenes proceeded no more fayer and softlie as he did at the first, when he was controlled and brideled by the Ephori: but hauing slaine them, and equallie deuided the landes through all Lacedæmonia, and made the straungers free citizens of Sparta, being then absolute Lorde of Lacedæmon he straight set vpon the Achaians with all the power he coulde, and sought to conquer them. And therefore Aratus deserueth iust reproofe, for that he forsooke his contrie in such extreame trouble & daūger, that being as the maister of a shippe he gaue an other the sterne to steare, when it had bene most honorable & meetest for him to haue taken it in hand (though they would not haue giuen it him) to haue saued his contry. Or otherwise, if he had in dede vtterly dispaired of the good successe of the Achaians, he should then haue put it rather into Cleomenes handes, and not to haue poysoned Peloponnesvs againe, with the maners of the barbarous people: (bringing in as he did, the garrison of the Macedonians, filling the castell of the Acrocorinthe with Gavles and Illyrian souldiers, and making them his Lordes and maisters, whom he had so often ouercomen in warres, and deceiued of their gouernment, and of whom he also spake so muche euill in his Commentaries) nor to haue put them into townes, and calling them frends and confederates, to thinke thereby to colour and disguise his wicked practise. Admit Cleomenes had bene a tyran, and a cruell man (if I should so reame him) yet came he of the blood of Hercules, and was borne in Sparta: from whence they should rather haue chosen the meaneste man Gouernor, then the greateste king of Macedon, and those specially that preferre the honor and glorie of Græce, before straungers. Yet king Cleomenes required no more of all the Achaians, but the name onely to be their Lieutenaunt generall: and so they woulde graunt him that honor, he promised he would be verie good vnto the cities confederats to Achaia. Where Antigonus notwithstanding, when they had chosen him their Lieutenaunt generall with absolute power and authoritie, both by sea and by lande, refused the charge, vnlesse they would let him haue the castell of the Acrocorinthe for his hyer. The which was euen like to Esopes hunter, that brideled his horse. For he would not get vp vpon the Achaians that requested him, and that by their Ambassadors and decrees of counsell did referre all to him selfe: before he had first saddled and brideled them, by the garison he made them receiue, and the pledges he caused them to geue him, and yet he spake as much as might be to cleere him selfe of the accusacion against him, bearing them in hande that he was forced to it. Howbeit Polybius wryteth, that long time before, he was compelled, being affrayed of Cleomenes valliantnes, he had secretly practised that with

A Antigonus, which he was openlie ſeene in afterwards: and that he had intiſed the MEGALOPOLITANS (who were the firſt that moued it to the counſell of the ACHAIANS) to call king Antigonus to their aide, bicauſe they were neereſt neighbours to the fire, and continually harried with Cleomenes warre, that alwaies knocked at their gates to come and ſpoyle them. Thus muche is affirmed by Phylarchus in his hiſtorie, who were hardlie to be credited notwithſtanding, had not Polybius confirmed it. For he loued Cleomenes ſo well, that it ſeemed he was raviſhed with ſome ſpirite as often as he ſpake of him: and frameth his hiſtorie, as a common counſeller that ſhould pleade a caſe in lawe before the Iudges, ſtill accuſing the one, and defending the other. The ACHAIANS loſt the citie of MEGALIPOLIS againe, the which king Cleomenes tooke of them, and ouercame them in a great battell, by Hecatombæon. Where-

B withall they were ſo amazed, that they ſent Ambaſſadors preſentlie vnto him, & prayed him to come to the citie of ARGOS, & there they would make him their Lieutenant generall. But when Aratus heard he came in deede, and that he was not farre from the citie of LERNA with his armie: being affrayed, he ſent other Ambaſſadors to tell him that he ſhould ſafelie come with three hundred men only, as vnto his frends and confederats, and yet if he miſtruſted craft and euill dealing, that then they woulde geue him pledges for the ſafetie of his perſon. Cleomenes aunſwered him, that was a plaine mockerie, and an iniurie they offered him. fore, he preſentlie departed thence, and ſent a letter before to the counſell of the ACHAIANS, full of fowle words and reproaches he gaue vnto Aratus. Who likewiſe replied to him againe, bitterlie taunting eache other, that they came to talke of their mariage and wiues. After this

C letter, Cleomenes ſent defyance by a Herauld vnto the ACHAIANS, and proclaimed open warre againſt them: inſomuche as he had almoſt gotten the citie of SICYONE by practiſe of traitors. Howbeit failing of his purpoſe, he returned ſodainly, and went vnto the city of PHLIASIANS, which he tooke, and draue out the Generall of the ACHAIANS thence, and immediatlie after he wanne the cities alſo of PHENEA, and PENTELION. After that, the ARGIVES and PHLIASIANS willinglie yeelded vnto him, ſo that of all that which the ACHAIANS had conquered, and ioyned vnto their tribe, they could reckon of nothing elſe of certeinty vnto them. Then Aratus was maruelouſlie troubled in his mind, to ſee all PELOPONNESVS in tumult and vprore, and that all the cities fell to open rebellion by thoſe that practiſed chaunge and alteracion. For no man was contented with the ſtate and gouernment at that time, but diuers of

D the SICYONIANS & CORINTHIANS both were bewrayed which had ſecretlie practiſed with Cleomenes, and that of long time maliced the gouernment of the ACHAIANS, deſiring themſelues to be Lords and Gouernors of their cities. Aratus hauing full commiſſion and authoritie from the counſell of the ACHAIANS, to make inquierie of them, and to put them to death, without further triall of law: he did execute them accordingly, whom he found faultie in the city of SICYONE. Furthermore, attempting to do the like at CORINTH, he made inquiry of them, & put them to death: wherby he made the common people very angry with him, who otherwiſe of themſelues were weary of the gouernment & ſubiection of the ACHAIANS. The CORINTHIANS therfore gathering together in the temple of Apollo, they ſent for Aratus, intending to make him priſoner before they would openly enter into actuall rebellion. Aratus went

Then many roſe vp againſt him, and did both reproue & iniuriouſly intreate him. But Aratus with a ſtayed countenaunce and gentle words, prayed them to keepe their places, and not to crie out in ſuche rage vpon their feete, and withall, cauſed them alſo to come in that were at the temple dore. But as he ſpake vnto them, by litle and litle he drew backe out of the preſſe, as though he ment to haue geuen his horſe to ſome bodie to hold. So being gotten out of the preſſe, he gently ſpake without any feare vnto the CORINTHIANS he met, and bad them goe to the temple of Apollo. When he was come to the caſtell, he then ſodainly tooke his horſe backe, and commaunded Cleopater, Captaine of the garriſon of the ACHAIANS there, to looke well to the ſafe keping of the caſtell. Then he ſet ſpurres to his horſe,

F and gallopped towardes the citie of SICYONE for life, being followed onely by thirtie of his ſouldiers, all the reſt hauing forſaken him, and diſperſed themſelues here and there. Shortly after, the CORINTHIANS vnderſtanding that Aratus was gone, they followed after, but could neuer ouertake him: whereupon they ſtraight ſent for king Cleomenes, and deliuered the citie of CORINTHE into his hands, the gaine whereof pleaſed him not ſo much, as he was ſorie for the loſſe of Aratus, whom they had let go. So king Cleomenes ioyning vnto him all the people dwelling alongeſt the ſea coaſt, commonlie called the riuer of CORINTHE, who yeelded vp them ſelues, holdes and townes into his hands: he then intrenched in the caſtell of the Acrocorinthe with a great trench. Furthermore, when Aratus came to the citie of SICYONE, many of the ACHAIANS gathered about him, and holding a counſell and aſſemblie, he was choſen their Lieutenaunt generall, hauing abſolute power and authoritie to doe what he would, and gaue him of their owne citizens to gard his perſon. So, he hauing managed the affaires of the ſtate and common wealth of the ACHAIANS, the ſpace of three and thirtie yeares together, and hauing all that time bene counted of all men, the chiefeſt man of power and authoritie in GRÆCE: he then found him ſelfe in poore eſtate, forſaken, and in great miſerie, as in the ſhippewracke of his contrie beaten with ſtorme, and in great daunger of him ſelfe. For when he ſent vnto the ÆTOLIANS for aide, they flatly denied him, and would ſend him none. Furthermore, the ATHENIANS being verie deſirous to ſend aide for Aratus ſake, were diſſwaded from it through the practiſe of Euclidas, & Micion. Aratus alſo had a houſe in CORINTHE, where all his money was: the which king Cleomenes at the firſt meddled not withall, neither would ſuffer any other to touche it, but ſent for his frendes and officers, and charged them to looke well to it, to geue Aratus a good accompt of it afterwardes. Furthermore, he priuately ſent Trippylus vnto him, and his father in law Megiſtonus, and offered him great gifts, and ſpeciallie an annuall pencion of twelue talents, which was double as much as king Ptolomy gaue him, who ſent him yearely ſix talents. Beſides, he only prayed the ACHAIANS that they would make him their Lieutenāt general, & alſo that the garriſon in the caſtel of the Acrocorinthe, might be deuided in common betwene them. Aratus made aunſwere, that he had no abſolute power in his hands, and that it was in the ACHAIANS, not in him. Cleomenes thinking this but a deuiſe and excuſe of Aratus, he preſentlie inuaded the contrie of the SICYONIANS, and deſtroyed all as he came, and continued the ſpace of three moneths. Aratus in the meane time ſtoode doutfull how to determine, whether he ſhould receiue king Antigonus or not: bicauſe Antigonus would not aide him, before he deliuered him the caſtell of the Acrocorinthe into his handes. So the ACHAIANS meeting at the citie of ÆGIVM to conſult vpon it, they ſent for Aratus thither. Howebeit it was daungerous comming thither, bicauſe Cleomenes campe lay hard by the citie of SICYONE, beſides alſo that the citizens kept Aratus, and helde him by force, ſaying that they would not let him venter him ſelfe in ſuch apparaunt daunger, their enemies being ſo neere vnto them. Moreouer, the women and litle children hong about him, weeping, and compaſſing him about, as their common father and ſauior. But Aratus comforting them, bad them not be affrayed, and ſo tooke his horſe, with ten of his frends (and his ſonne that was a young ſtripling growen) and went towards the ſea, and imbarked in certaine ſhippes that roade at ancker. Thence he ſailed vnto ÆGIVM, where the diet or parlament was kept: and there it was reſolued, that they ſhould ſende for Antigonus, and deliuer the caſtell of the Acrocorinthe into his hands. And ſo it was performed; for Aratus ſent thither his owne ſonne among the other oſtages. The CORINTHIANS were ſo ſore offended withall, that they made hauocke of his goods, and gaue his houſe he had in CORINTHE, vnto king Cleomenes. So king Antigonus being onwardes on his way to come into PELOPONNESVS with his armie, bringing with him twentie thowſand footemen, all MACEDONIANS, & foure hundred horſemen; Aratus, with the greateſt ſtates and officers of the ACHAIANS, vnwitting to their enemies, went to meete him, as farre as the citie of PEGES, hauing no great truſt nor confidence in Antigonus, nor the MACEDONIANS. For he remembred verie well, that he came firſt to his greatnes, by the iniuries he had offered them: and howe that the chiefeſt cauſe of his riſing, was the malice he bare vnto olde Antigonus. Howbeit, making vertue of neceſſitie, and weying the inſtant occaſion of their preſent extremitie: (of Gouernors, to be driuen to be ſubiects) he put him ſelfe in aduenture. So, when Antigonus was tolde that Aratus was comen in perſon to him: hauing with good countenance after a common ſort ſaluted thoſe that came in his companie: to Aratus ſelfe at his firſt comming he gaue him an honorable welcome and enter-Gouernors obey neceſſitie. Antigonus honorable enterteinment to Aratus.

A enterteinment. Afterwardes alſo, finding him a good and diſcreete man: he fell into inward frendſhippe and familiaritie with him. For Aratus was not onely skilfull to geue direction in matters of ſtate touching good order and gouernment: but moreouer, his companie & conuerſation was verie pleaſaunt, to entertaine a Princes leaſure with. Wherefore though Antigonus was but young at that time, yet ſeeing throughly into Aratus nature, and that he was a meete man to be well thought of, and eſteemed about a Prince: he vſed his counſell and aduiſe more then any other mans, in all matters, not onely touching the affaires of the ACHAIANS, but of the MACEDONIANS alſo. And ſo all things came to paſſe, which the goddes had promiſed in their ſacrifices. For in a beaſt that was ſacrificed, there were two galles wrapped in one ſelfe cawle: the which the Soothſayers interpreted did prognoſticate, that two which B before were mortall enemies, ſhould nowe become aſſured frendes. But Aratus made no account of their prediction, neither did alſo geue any credit to the ſacrifices, but truſted more to his owne determination. So, the warres afterwardes hauing good ſucceſſe, and Antigonus making a feaſt in the citie of CORINTHE, where he had bidden many gheſts: he would nedes haue Aratus lye vpon him at the table, and a litle while after, commaunded his men to bring him a couerlet, and turning to him, asked him if he were not a colde. Aratus aunſwered him, it freezed. Then Antigonus bad him come neerer him: & when the ſeruaunts brought a couerlet for the king, they caſt it ouer them both. Then Aratus remẽbring the ſacrifice, fell a laughing, and told the king what a wonder he had ſeene in the ſacrifice, & what interpretation the Soothſayers made of it. This was long after. So, Antigonus and Aratus being at that time in C the citie of PEGES, they were ſworne brethren together: and then went both with all ſpeede againſt the enemies. Thus there fell out hot skirmiſhes betwene them, hard by the citie of CORINTHE. For Cleomenes was verie well fortified, and the CORINTHIANS valliantly defended them ſelues. In the meane time, Ariſtoteles of ARGOS, (Aratus frend) ſecretlie ſent him word, that he would make the citie rebell, if he came him ſelfe with any number of ſouldiers. Aratus tolde it vnto king Antigonus, who gaue him fifteene hundred men, with the which he imbarked, and paſſed ouer with great ſpeede from the Iſthmus (or barre in the ſtraight) vnto the citie of EPIDAVRVM. Howbeit the ARGIVES taried not Aratus comming, but were all vp before he came, and did ſet vpon king Cleomenes men, and had driuen them into the caſtell. Cleomenes being aduertiſed of it, and fearing leaſt his enemies (keeping the citie of ARGOS) D ſhould cut of his way from returning into his contrie againe with ſafetie if he were driuen to a ſtraight: he forſooke the caſtell of the Acrocorinthe, and went his way by night to helpe his men in the citie of ARGOS. So he came thither in time, and ouerthrewe certeine of his enemies. But ſhortly after, Aratus, and king Antigonus both being comen thither with all their aide, Cleomenes was driuen to flie to the citie of MANTINEA. After the recouery againe of the citie of ARGOS, all the reſidue of the cities of PELOPONNESVS did againe returne to the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus tooke the caſtell of the Acrocorinthe. So Aratus being choſen Generall by the ARGIVES, he counſelled them to preſent Antigonus with all the tyrans goodes, and thoſe that had bene traitors to the common wealth. And after they had cruellie tormented the tyran Ariſtomachus in the citie of CENCHREES, in the ende they caſt him into the ſea, E and drowned him. Aratus was maruelouſlie reproued for his death, that he would ſuffer the poore man to be ſo vilely handled, that was a good man, and one that had done him great pleaſure: who through his perſwaſion willinglie reſigned vp his tyrannie, and deliuered the city of ARGOS vnto the ACHAIANS. But beſides this, they blamed him for many other things elſe. For that the ACHAIANS through his meanes had put the citie of CORINTHE into Antigonus hands, as though it had bene ſome meane village: for that when they had ſacked the citie of ORCHOMENE, they ſuffered him to place a garriſon of the MACEDONIANS there: for that they had enacted by parlament, that they ſhould neither write, nor ſende Ambaſſadors any whether, without Antigonus priuitie and conſent: furthermore, for that they were compelled to geue pay to the MACEDONIANS: for that they made ſacrifices, feaſtes, and games F vnto Antigonus, as if he had bene a god, following the example of Aratus citizens, who were the firſt that began, and had receiued Antigonus into the city by the perſwaſion of Aratus, that lodged and feaſted him in his owne houſe. With all theſe faults they burdened Aratus, and considered not that after they had put the reynes of the gouernment into Antigonus hand, Aratus him selfe (whether he would or not) was compelled to follow the swing of the vnbridled Prince, hauing no other meanes to stay it, but onely the libertie of speache to admonish him: and that also was not to be exercised, without apparant and great daunger. For it is most true, that many things were done greatly against Aratus minde, as amongest others: that Antigonus caused the tyrans images of ARGOS to be set vp, which he had before pulled downe: and also that he made them to be ouerthrowen, which Aratus had set vp for those that had taken the castell of CORINTHE, and onely left Aratus owne statue, notwithstanding all the earnest intreaty Aratus made to the contrarie, yet he could get no graunt of any thing he requested. Besides also, it appeareth that the ACHAIANS delt not so frendly with the MANTINIANS, as became GRÆCIANS one to an other. For they hauing the citie in their handes by Antigonus meanes, did put all the noblest and chiefest men of MANTINEA to death, others they solde as slaues, and sent the rest into MACEDON with irons on their legges, and brought the poore women & children into bondage, and sold them for slaues: and of the money they got by spoile, they deuided the third parte among them selues, and left the other two partes vnto the MACEDONIANS. Nowe surely it can not be sayd, but this was done for some cruell reuenge. For though it was an ouergreat crueltie, in rage & passion of minde, to handle people of one selfe blood and language in this lamentable sorte: yet, as Simonides saith, when men are driuen and forced to it, it is a gentle (no cruell) thing, to ease their great stomackes inflamed with rage and malice. But for that which was done afterwards vnto the citie, no man can excuse Aratus, nor say that he was either driuen to it by necessitie, or that he had otherwise any honest occasion to doe it. For king Antigonus hauing geuen the citie of MANTINEA vnto the ARGIVES, they determined to make it a Colonie, and chose Aratus their Generall: who made a decree, that thenceforth the citie should no more be called MANTINEA, but ANTIGONIA, as it beareth name vnto this day. Thus it seemeth that gentle MANTINEA (for so the Poets called it) was vtterlie destroyed, and bare the name of an other citie through Aratus meanes, preferring the name of him that destroied the city, & did put all the inhabitants of the first to death. After that, king Cleomenes being ouerthrowen in a great battell by the citie of SELLASIA, he left the citie of SPARTA, and fled into ÆGYPT. So Antigonus hauing vsed Aratus with all kind of honorable curtesie, he returned againe into MACEDON. There falling sicke, he sent Philip that should succeede him in the kingdom (being a young strippling growen) into PELOPONNESVS, and straightly charged him speciallie to followe Aratus counsell, and to imploy him when he would speake vnto the cities, and become acquainted with the ACHAIANS. So Aratus hauing receiued him in that sorte, made him so well affected and louing towardes him, that he sent him againe into MACEDON, being throughlie determined to make warres with GRÆCE. So after the death of Antigonus, the ÆTOLIANS beganne to despise the careles nesse and cowardlinesse of the ACHAIANS (bicause that they being acquainted to be defended by straungers, and hauing bene altogether gouerned by the armies of the MACEDONIANS, they liued verie idlely & dissolutely) whereupon they tooke vpon them to make them selues Lords of PELOPONNESVS. So they assembled an armie, and by the way as they went, they onely tooke some pray and spoyle vpon the lands of the PATRÆIANS, and the DYMÆIANS: but inuading the territorie of MESSINA with all their armie, they destroyed the whole contrie before them. Aratus being angrie withall, and perceiuing that Timoxenus (who at that time was Generall of the ACHAIANS) did still tract and delay time in vaine, bicause he was vpon his going out of his yeare: he being appointed Generall for the yeare following, did anticipate his time fiue dayes before, to goe and aide the MESSENIANS. Wherefore, leauing an armie of the ACHAIANS, whose persons were nowe neither exercised in armes, nor yet had any desire to goe to the warres: he was ouerthrowen by the citie of CAPHYES. Nowe, bicause it was thought that he went somewhat too hottely and coragiouslie to the warres, he so extreamely cooled againe, and left things in such case, that all hope being cast a side, he suffred the ÆTOLIANS in maner to tread PELOPONNESVS vnder their feete, before his eyes, with all the insolencie and crueltie that might be possible, notwithstanding that they sundrie times gaue him great aduauntages of them. Thus were the ACHAIANS once againe forced to pray aide out of Mantinea, called Antigonia, by Aratus decree.

Aratus ouerthrowen in battell, by the citie of Caphyes.

A of MACEDON, and to send for young king Philippe to make warres in GRÆCE: hoping for the loue he bare vnto Aratus, and the great truſt he had in him, that he woulde vſe them gently, and doe as they woulde haue him. But then firſt of all beganne Apelles, Megareus, and a few other Courties to accuſe Aratus: vnto whome king Philippe geuing eaſie eare, he procured that one Eparatus, of contrarie faction vnto Aratus, was choſen Generall by the ACHAIANS. Howebeit this newe Generall Eperatus beinge extreamelie hated by the ACHAIANS, and Aratus alſo leauinge to deale any more with matters of ſtate: no acte was done to any purpoſe. Whereuppon king Philippe findinge his faulte, returned againe vnto Aratus, and was ruled altogether by him: and when he found that his affaires proſpered in all things he went about, he then lette him alone withall, as from whome came all his honour and B greatneſſe. Thereuppon euerie man eſteemed Aratus a wiſe Gouernour, not onely to rule a common wealth, but alſo a whole realme and kingdome. For his manners, intent, and chiefeſt purpoſe appeared, in the deedes of this young king, as a riche colour that did ſette foorth and beawtifie them. For the clemencie this young Prince Philippe vſed to the LACEDÆMONIANS, that had offended him: the great curteſie he ſhewed to the CRETANS, whereby in fewe dayes he wanne all the Ile of CRETA: and the iorney he made againſt the ÆTOLIANS, which was a wonderfull great exployt: wanne the Prince great fame, for following good counſell, and Aratus accounted to be a wiſe Gouernour, and of deepe vnderſtanding. Nowe the kings flatterers enuying Aratus more then before, and perceiuing that they got no good by ſecret backebyting of him: they then beganne with open mouth verie inſoC lentlie to reuile him at the table, and with great deriſion: inſomuch as one night going home to his tent after ſupper, they pelted him with ſtones all the way as he went. King Philippe when he knewe it, was ſo offended therewith, that he did condemne them in the ſumme of twentie talentes: and afterwardes alſo, bicauſe they troubled his affaires, he did put them to death. But king Philippe in the ende being puffed vp with the good fortune and ſucceſſe of this warre, which proſpered as he woulde haue it: he then grewe to be couetous, and beganne to ſhewe his naughtie nature, and to bewray his diſſimulacion wherewith he diſguiſed him ſelfe: and by litle and litle to make his vices plainlie to appeare. For firſt of all, he abuſed young Aratus wife, which was kept ſecret a long time, bicauſe he lay in their houſe, and beganne dayly to growe more ſeuere and cruell to the common weales: and then the D worlde ſawe plainlie, that he cared no more for Aratus. For the firſt ſuſpicion and beginning of the miſtruſt he had of Aratus, came for that which was done at MESSINA. For the MESSENIANS being fallen together by the eares, and in great ciuill warres one with an other: Aratus went thither to make peace betwene them. Howebeit king Philippe came thither the next day following, and in ſteade of pacifying the quarrell, he ſet them further out together then they were before. Firſt he asked the Gouernours of the citie, and if they had no lawes to bridle the inſolencie and ſtomacke of the common people: and priuatelie alſo talked with the heades of the faction of the people, and asked them if they had not handes to defende them ſelues from tyrannes. So both the one and the other faction truſtinge to kinge Philippe, the Gouernours woulde haue layed holde of the Orators of the ciE tie: but they riſinge with the common people, ſlewe of their Nobilitie and Magiſtrates, well neere two hundred of them. Aratus that came ſoone after this fact, ſhewed that he was greatlie offended with king Philippe, and cauſed his ſonne with open mouth ſhamefullie to reproue him. Nowe it ſeemed that this younge Aratus was in loue with king Philippe before: but then he tolde him before all the people, that for this ſhamefull acte he had done, he thought him nowe no more fayer of face, but the fowleſt creature that coulde be. Philippe made no aunſwere to it, although euerie man looked he woulde haue aunſwered him in rage, and that oftentimes as the other reproued him, he byt it in with his teeth: but as if he had not bene offended at all with the bigge words his ſonne had ſpoken againſt him, for that he was a ciuill man, and mylde of nature, he tooke Aratus the father by the hande, and F caried him out of the Theater where the aſſemblie was kept, to the caſtell of Ithome, to doe ſacrifice there to Iupiter, and to ſee the ſorte. This ſorte was of no leſſe ſtrength then the caſtell of the Acrocorinthe: and when any garriſon is in it, it keepeth all the contrie about it in obedience, and beſides, it is verie hard to driue them out of it. Now Philip being gotten vp into that caſtell, he did ſacrifice there: and when the Soothſayer had brought him the intralls of the oxe which they had ſacrificed, he tooke it him ſelfe with both his hands and ſhewed them vnto Aratus, and to Demetrius PHALERIAN, now turning to the one, then vnto the other, and asked them what they iudged of theſe ſignes of the ſacrifice: whether he ſhoulde keepe the caſtell to him ſelfe, or elſe deliuer it to the MESSENIANS. Demetrius ſmyling aunſwered him: if thou beeſt of the Soothſayers minde, then thou ſhalt deliuer it vp: but if thou haſt a kinges minde in thee, thou ſhalt then holde the oxe by both hornes. (By the oxe, he ment the contrie of PELOPONNESVS, and moreouer, that if he kept both theſe caſtells of Ithome, and the Acrocorinthe, all PELOPONNESVS were wholly at his commaundement.) Aratus ſtill held his peace, and ſayd not a word. In the end, Philip praying him to ſpeake he ſaid. A B

In CRETA, and in the contrie of the BOEOTIANS and PHOCIANS, there are many ſtrong caſtells ſcituated on high hills from the vallies. Moreouer, there are alſo many places of great ſtrength in the marches of the ACARNANIANS, both within maine land, as alſo vpon the ſea coaſt: of all the which thou haſt not taken one of them by force, and yet they all doe willinglie obey thee notwithſtanding. It is for theeues to hyde their heades in high rockes & mountaines: but a king can haue no ſtronger caſtell, then the loue, faith, and good will of men. That is it that opened the ſea of CRETA. That is it that hath brought thee into PELOPONNESVS. Thoſe are the meanes which haue made thee being ſo young a man, ſome of them to chooſe thee their Captaine, and others alſo to make thee their abſolute Lorde and Maiſter. Aratus going on with his tale, Philippe gaue the intralls againe to the Soothſayer that brought them, and taking Aratus by the hand, (as if by force he had caſt him out of the caſtell, and had alſo taken the citie of MESSINA from him) ſayd vnto him: come on then, lette vs euen take that courſe. But after that time, Aratus came as litle to the Court as might be, and ſo by litle and litle left Philippes companie. For when he went to make warre in the realme of EPIRVS, he was earneſtlie in hand with Aratus to goe that iorney with him. But Aratus prayed him to hold him excuſed, and ſo remained at home, being affrayed to be brought into an euill name with Philippes doings. For Philippe afterwards hauing ſhamefullie loſt his armie by ſea, againſt the ROMANES, & beſides, hauing had alſo verie euill ſucceſſe in all other his affaires: he returned againe to PELOPONNESVS, & thought once more to haue deceiued the MESSENIANS. But when they founde his practiſe, then he beganne with open force to ſpoyle their contrie. Aratus then flatlie fell out with Philip, and vtterly refuſed his frendſhip, for that he perceiued then the iniurie he had done his ſonnes wife, the which grieued him to the harte, but yet he made not his ſonne priuie to it: bicauſe he coulde gette no other amendes, then to knowe what iniurie had bene done to him, conſidering that he had no way nor meanes to be reuenged. For, king Philip was maruelouſly changed, and from a curteous and chaſt young Prince, becomen a vitious and cruell tyran: the which to ſpeake truely, was not a chaunge or alteracion in nature, but a manifeſt declaracion (when he was no more affrayed of any man) of his wicked and deueliſh mind, the which through feare had of long time bene kept ſecret. Now, to proue that Philips firſt loue and good will he bare vnto Aratus, was alſo mingled with feare and reuerence: that which he did afterwards vnto him did plainly ſhew it. For he being deſirous to put Aratus to death, not thinking him ſelfe free ſo long as he liued, neither king, nor tyran: he durſt not goe about to kill him him ſelfe, but procured one of his Captaines called Taurion, and commaunded him to make him away as ſecretly as he could poſſible, & ſpecially with poyſon, in his abſence. This Taurion fell in frendſhip with Aratus, and poyſoned him with no violent poyſon, but ſo tempered & qualified it, as it did by litle and litle heate the bodie, and procure a pretie coffe which brought him into a conſumption. Aratus knewe he was poyſoned, but bicauſe he ſawe it booted not to bewray it, he bare it pacientlie, and made no words of it, as if he had had ſome naturall diſeaſe about him. Yet on a time, one of his chiefeſt frends being in his chamber with him, who wondred to ſee him ſpit blood as he did: he told him, fred Cæphalon mine, this is the reward of a kings loue. So he died of this poiſon in the city of ÆGIVM, being the ſeuenteenth time choſen Generall of the ACHAIANS: who would haue had him buried in the ſelfe ſame place, and haue made ſome honorable monument for him, worthy C D E F

Yet was there an auncient law that forbad buriall within the walls of the citie, of any maner of perſon whatſoeuer: and beſides that law, they had a certaine ſuperſtitious feare in them that made them they durſt not. Whereuppon they ſent to Apollos temple at DELPHES, to aske counſell of his Nunne that gaue the Oracles, who made them this anſwere.

And there they choſe out the chiefeſt place, and buried him as their founder, father, and ſauior of their citie: and the place is called at this preſent time, ARATIVM. There they yearely make two ſolemne ſacrifices, the one the fift of Nouem-

For the firſt ſacrifice, that was done by the Prieſt of Iupiter the ſauior. The ſecond ſacrifice alſo was done by Aratus ſonne, who was girt about with a cloth, not altogether white, but mingled with purple colour. So during the ſacrifice, they ſong hymnes vpon the harpe in praiſe of him, and the maiſter of the Muſitians made a proceſſion round about, being accompanied with boyes and young men of the citie, after whom followed the Senate crowned with garlands of flowers, and other citizens that were diſpoſed to goe a proceſſion. Howbeit the moſt part of the honors that were appointed to be done vnto him, were left of by proceſſe of time, & chaunge of things that followed afterwards. Thus you ſee what the life of Aratus the father

Now Philip being a wicked man, and cruell of nature, cauſed his ſonne Aratus alſo to be poyſoned, not with a deadly poyſon, but with ſuch poyſon as troubleth a mans wits ſo, that through their deueliſh receit, he becometh a ſtarke foole without any wit at all, and maketh him to attempt ſtraunge and abhominable things, and to haue certaine ſhamefull and deteſtable deſires: inſomuch as his death (though he dyed in the pryme of his youth) could not be thought miſerable, but rather a happy deliuerance to him of all his miſeries and miſhappes. But Philip afterwards, ſo long as he liued, payed vnto Iupiter (protector of all iuſtice and friendſhip) the puniſhment his wicked life deſerued. For, after he was ouercome in battell by the ROMANES, he was compelled to yeelde him ſelfe to their mercy, by

THE LIFE OF Galba.

Iphicrates saying what maner of man a Mercenarie souldier should be.

IPhicrates the ATHENIAN Captaine sayd, that a mercenarie souldier should be couetous, a louer, and voluptuous: that to get wherewith to maintaine his pleasure, he should be the vallianter, and readier to put him selfe into any daunger. But most men thinke, that souldiers should be as one entere strong body, that sturreth not of it selfe without the mouing of the generall. And to approue this opinion, it is said that Paulus AEmylius ariuing in MACEDON, and finding the souldiers full of words and curiositie (euerie man meddling with the affaires of the General) he made open proclamacion, no man so hardy to medle with his office and affaires, but euery man only to keepe his sword sharpe, and to be quicke of hand against the enemy: and for the rest, to referre all to him, who would take sufficient order for things of his charge and gouernment. Therefore Plato, that saith it litle preuaileth to haue a good and wise Captaine, if the souldiers also be not wise and obedient, thinking it as requisite for the vertue of obedience, to haue men of a noble minde and good education, as otherwise it is meete for a Captaine to know how to direct and commaunde well, considering it is that which with lenity & mildnes doth mitigate all fury and choller: he hath diuers other examples and sufficient proofes to proue his words true, and namely, the great miseries and calamities which came to the ROMANES after the death of Nero, do plainly shew, that nothing is more daungerous nor dreadfull in an Empire, then a great armie liuing licentiouslie and disorderly. For Demades after the death of Alexander the great, compared Alexanders armie, vnto Cyclops Polyphemus after his eye was put out: considering howe blindly and looselie they were gouerned. Howebeit the Empire of ROME being deuided into sundrie factions at one selfe time, and rising against it selfe in many places, it fell into the like misfortunes and calamities fained of the Poets by the TITANS: not so much through the ambicionsnes of the Emperours, as by meanes of the couetousnes & insolency of the souldiers, who draue the Emperours out of their Imperiall seates one after an other, as one naile drieth out an other. And Dionysius also the tyrant of SICILIA, was wont to call Pheraeus, who had bene onely tyran of THESSALY tenne monethes space: a tyran in a play, deriding his so sodaine chaunge of state. But the Imperiall house of the Cæsars at ROME receiued foure Emperours, in lesse then tenne monethes space, the souldiers now putting in one, and then taking out an other, as if they had bene

A bene in a play on a ſcaffolde. So that, the ROMANES being thus grieuouſlie oppreſſed, had yet this comfort: that they needed not to ſeeke to be reuenged of them that did oppreſſe them. For they ſawe one of them murther an other, and him firſt and moſt iuſtlie of all other murthered, that had firſt of all corrupted the ſouldiers, in teaching them to make gaine of the chaunge of Emperours: and ſo deprauing a worthie deede of it ſelfe, which was their forſaking of Nero: and mingling it with briberie, made it plaine treaſon. For Nymphidius Sabinus, being Captaine of the Emperours gard, which are called the Prætorian ſouldiers, together with Tigellinus, when he ſaw Nero in diſpaire of him ſelfe & of his eſtate, & that he was readie to flie into ÆGYPT: he perſwaded the gard they ſhoulde call Galba Emperour, as if Nero had not bene at ROME, but fled and gone, and promiſed euerie one ſeuen thowſande fiue hundred

B Drachmas a peece. And to the reſt of the ſouldiers that were diſperſed vp and downe in garriſon vpon the prouinces, twelue hundred & fifty Drachmas a man. For the leauying of which ſumme, they could not poſſiblie doe it, but they muſt needes commit tenne thowſand times more extorcion to euery bodie, then Nero had done. This large promiſe made them preſently put Nero to death, and ſhortly after him, Galba him ſelfe alſo. For the ſouldiers forſooke Nero, for the hope they had to receiue this promiſed gift: and ſhortlie after they ſlewe the ſecond, which was Galba, bicauſe they receiued not their gifts in time to their contentment. Afterwards alſo, in ſeeking who ſhould ſtill feede them with like gifts, before they could obtaine their wiſhed hope, one of them deſtroyed an other by treaſon and rebellion. But nowe to ſet downe all thinges particularlie which hapned at that time, it were to wryte one whole entere

C hiſtorie: and therefore, I will content my ſelfe, not to paſſe ouer with ſilence the notableſt deedes and lamentable calamities which happened at that time vnto the Ceſars.

It is manifeſtly knowen to all men, that Sulpitius Galba of a priuate man, was the richeſt and wealthieſt that came to be in the number of the Ceſars: who, though he came of a verie noble houſe, deriuing him ſelfe from the race and family of the Seruij: yet he was honored the more, bicauſe he was a kinne vnto Quintus Catulus; who for vertue and eſtimacion, was one of the chiefeſt men of his time, albeit that otherwiſe, he willingly reſigned his authoritie and power vnto others. So Galba thereby was ſomwhat a kinne vnto Liuia, the wife of Auguſtus Ceſar, and therefore for her ſake he came out of the Emperours pallace, when he went to take poſſeſſion of his Conſulſhippe. Moreouer, it is reported, that when he had charge of the armie in GER-

D MANIE, he did valliantlie behaue him ſelfe. And in the gouernment of LIBYA alſo, where he was Viceconſul, he did as honorablie behaue him ſelfe, as any man whatſoeuer. Howbeit his meane and ſimple ordinary of dyet, voyde of all exceſſe, was imputed miſery & niggardlines in him, when he was proclaimed Emperour: bicauſe the praiſe of ſober & temperate diet which he would haue brought in vſe, was then ſo raw a thing, that it was taken for a new & ſtraunge deuiſe. He was ſent Gouernor alſo into SPAYNE by Nero, before he had learned to be afrayed of the citizens of great authority: howbeit, beſides that he was of a curteous & gentle nature, his age moreouer increaſed the opinion they had of him, that he was timerous and fearefull. For when the wretched officers of Nero did cruelly vexe & torment the prouinces, and that it lay not in Galba any way to help them: yet was it ſome comfort to them, which were iudged &

E ſold as ſlaues by the officers, to ſee that Galba did lament the miſeries & calamities they endured, as if they had bene done vnto him ſelfe. So when any ſlanderous rymes were made againſt Nero, which were ſong vp and downe in euerie place: he would neither forbid them, nor yet was offended, as Neros officers were. Therefore he was maruelouſlie beloued in the contrie, with them that were acquainted with him: bicauſe he was then in the eighteenth yere of his gouernment as Proconſul amongeſt them, at which time Iunius Vindex being Propretor of GAVLE, rebelled againſt Nero, who as it is reported, had written vnto Galba, before he entred into open action of rebellion. But Galba, did neither beleue him, nor alſo accuſe & bewray him, as diuers others which were gouernors of armies & prouinces did: who ſent Vindex letters written to Nero which he him ſelfe had written vnto them, & ſo did as much as in them lay to hinder

F the enterpriſe, who afterwards being of the conſpiracy did confeſſe they were traitors to them ſelues, as much as vnto him. Howbeit, when Vindex afterwards had proclaimed open warre againſt Nero, he wrote againe vnto Galba, & praied him to take the Imperiall crowne vpon him, and to become the head of a ſtrong and mightie bodie (which were the GAVLES) that lacked nothing but a head and Gouernor, being a hundred thowſand fighting men ready armed, and might alſo leauie a great number more of them. Then Galba conſulted thereuppon with his frends, & among them, ſome were of opinion that he ſhould ſtay a while, to ſee what change and alteracion would grow at ROME vpon this ſturre. Howbeit Titus Iunius, Captaine of the Prætorian band, ſaid vnto him: O Galba, what meaneth this ſo doutfull a deliberacion? Be not we wiſe men to call in queſtion, whether we ſhall allowe of Vindex frendſhip, or accuſe him? Yea, and with armes perſecute him, that deſired rather to haue thee Emperour, then Nero tyranne ouer the eſtate of ROME? Afterwardes Galba by bills ſet vp euerie where, appointed a day certaine, to enfranchiſe ſuche as woulde make ſute for it. This rumor flying ſtraight abroad, he gathered a great number of ſouldiers together, that were verie willing to rebell: and he was no ſooner gotten vp into the tribunall or chaire of ſtate, but all the ſouldiers did ſalute him, by the name of Emperour. Howbeit he was not content with this name at the firſt, but accuſing Nero, and lamenting the deathes of the nobleſt men whome he had cruellie put to death: he promiſed that he would imploy his beſt wit and diſcreſſion to the ſeruice and benefit of his contrie, neither naming him ſelfe Cæſar, nor Emperour, but only Lieutenant to the Senate, and ſtate of ROME. Now, that Vindex did wiſelie to call Galba to be Emperour, Nero him ſelfe in his doings doth witneſſe it. Who hauing alwayes made a countenance as though he paſſed not for Vindex, & that he wayed not the rebellion of the GAVLES: when it was told him that Galba was called Emperor, he being thē at ſupper, for ſpight he ouerthrew the table. Moreouer, though the Senate had iudged Galba an enemie, yet Nero to be pleaſaunt with his frends, made as though he was nothing affrayed of it, and ſaid, this newes made all for him, bicauſe he ſtoode in neede of money, & alſo that it was a happy occaſion offred him to helpe him withall. For ſayd he, we ſhall ſoone haue all the GAVLES goodes, as the ſpoyle of a iuſt warre, after we haue once againe ouercomen and conquered them: and moreouer, Galbaes goods alſo would quickly be in his hands, that he might ſell them, conſidering that he was become his open enemy. So he preſently commaunded Galbaes goods ſhould be openly ſold, to them that would giue moſt. Galba vnderſtanding that, did alſo by ſound of trompet ſell all Neroes goods he had in all the prouince of SPAYNE, and did alſo finde more men readier to buy, then there were goods to ſell. Daily men roſe againſt Nero in euery contry, who tooke Galbaes parte, Clodius Macer only excepted in AFRICK, and Verginius Rufus in GAVLE, both of them hauing charge of legions appointed for the ſafe keping of GERMANY: and both of them did follow ſeueral directions by them ſelues, varying in minde & intent. For Clodius Macer hauing robbed much, & put diuers men alſo to death through his cruelty & couetouſnes: he ſhewed plainly, that he ſwamme betwene two waters, as one that could neither let go his charge, nor yet kept it. Verginius alſo on the other ſide, being Generall ouer great & mighty legions, who had ſundry times called him Emperour, & did in maner force him to take vpon him the name and Empire: he notwithſtanding did euer aunſwere them, that he neither minded to take the Empire vpon him, nor yet to ſuffer any other to do it, then ſuch as the Senate ſhould chooſe and call vnto the ſame. This at the firſt ſomwhat amazed Galba. But when both the armies of Vindex and Verginius, in ſpight of their Captaines (who could not ſtay nor keepe them backe, no more then cochmen can keepe backe the horſe with their bridells) were ioyned in a great battell together, where were ſlaine twenty thowſand GAVLES in the field, and Vindex alſo ſlue him ſelfe ſhortly after: it was geuen out, that the conquerors after ſo great a victory obtained, would cōpell Verginius to take vpon him to be Emperour, or elſe that they would take Neroes part againe. Then Galba being not a litle perplexed, wrote vnto Verginius, & perſwaded him to ioyne with him, to hold vp the Empire & liberty of the ROMANES, & thereupon fled ſtraight into a city of SPAYNE called *COLONIA, rather repēting him of that he had done, & wiſhing for his wonted peaceable & quiet life wherwith he was brought vp: then otherwiſe occupying him ſelfe about any neceſſary or proffitable thing for the furtherance of his enterpriſe. Now it was about the beginning of ſommer, and one day towards euening, there came to Galba one of his ſlaues infranchiſed, a SICILIAN borne, that was comen frō ROME in ſeuen daies: who vnderſtanding that Galba was alone, went preſently to his chamber dore & opened it, & cōming

A in againſt the wils of the groomes of the chamber that ſtood at the dore, he told him that Nero being yet aliue, but ſene no more, firſt the people of ROME, & then the Senate, had proclaimed him Emperor: & that immediatly after, newes came that Nero was dead, the which he hardly beleuing notwithſtanding, went thither him ſelfe, ſaw his body layed out vpon the ground, & then made towards him with all ſpeede to bring him theſe newes. Theſe newes marueilouſly reuiued Galba, and a multitude of men thronged ſtraight about his dore, which began to be coragious, ſeing him liuely againe, although the ſpeede of the Meſſenger ſeemed incredible. Howbeit two dayes after, Titus alſo arriued, with certaine other of the campe, who told Galba perticulerly what the Senate had decreed in his behalfe. So, this Titus was called to great honor, and the ſlaue enfranchiſed had priuiledge giuen him to weare ringes of gold, and he was

B called Martianus Vicellus, who afterwards of all the infranchiſed bond men, became the chiefeſt man about his Maſter Galba. In the meane tyme, Nymphidius SABINE began at ROME, not couertly, but with open force, to take vpon him the abſolute gouernment of the Empire, perſwading him ſelf that Galba was ſo old, that he could hardly be brought in a lytter vnto ROME, being at the leaſt three ſcore and thirteene yeare olde: beſides alſo, that the army of the PRETORIANS which were in ROME, did beare him good will of long tyme, and then acknowledged none other Lord but him onely, for the large promiſe he had made them, for the which he receiued the thankes, and Galba remained the debter. So he preſently commaunded Tigellinus, his companion and Captaine with him of the army of the PRÆTORIANS, to leaue of his ſword: and diſpoſing him ſelfe to bancketing and feaſting, he ſent for all thoſe that had bene

C Conſuls, Prætors, or Proconſuls of prouinces, and made them all to be inuited in the name of Galba. So there were certaine ſouldiers gaue out this rumor in the campe, that they ſhould doe well to ſend Ambaſſadors vnto Galba, to praye him that Nymphidius might be their onely Captaine ſtill, without any companion ioyned with him. Furthermore, the honor and good will the Senate bare him, calling Nymphidius their benefactor, and going dayly to viſite him in his houſe, procuring him to be Author of all their decrees paſſed in Senate, and that he ſhould authoriſe them: this made him hie minded, and the bolder by much, inſomuch that ſhortly after, they that came to honor him in this ſort, did not onely hate and miſlike his doings, but moreouer he made them affrayd of him. Furthermore, when the Conſuls had giuen to commō purſeuants any commiſſions vnder ſeale, or letters pattents ſignifying the decrees

D of the Senate, to cary them to the Emperor, by vertue of which letters pattents, when the officers of the citie doe ſee the ſeale, they ſtraight prouide the purſeuants of coches and freſhe horſes to further their ſpeede and haſty iorney: Nymphidius was very angrye with them, bicauſe they did not alſo come to him for his letters, ſealed by him and his ſouldiers, to ſende likewiſe vnto the Emperor. But beſides all this, it is alſo reported that he was like to haue depoſed the Conſuls: howbeit they excuſing them ſelues vnto him, and crauing pardon, did appeaſe his anger. And to pleaſe the Commons alſo, he ſuffred them to put any of Neroes friends to death they could meete withall. Amonge other, they ſlue a Fenſer called Spicillus, whome they put vnder Neroes ſtatues, which they dragged vp and downe the citie. Another alſo called Aponius, one of Neroes accuſers, they threw him to the ground, and draue carts ouer him

E loden with ſtones. And diuers others alſo, whom they ſlue in that manner: of the which, ſome had done no maner of offence. Hereuppon one Mauriſcus, one of the nobleſt men of the citie & ſo eſteemed, ſayd openly in the Senate. I feare me we ſhall wiſh for Nero againe, before it be long. So Nymphidius being comen in manner to the fulnes of his hope: he was very glad to heare that ſome repyned at him, bicauſe he was the ſonne of Caius Cæſar, that was the next Emperor after Tiberius. For this Caius Cæſar, when he was a young man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had bene a fayer young woman, and the Daughter of one Calliſtus, one of Cæſars infranchiſed bond men, whome he had gotten of a Laundres he kept. Howbeit it is found contrary, that this Nymphidius was borne before Caius Cæſar coulde knowe his mother, and men thought that he was begotten by a Fenſer called Martianus, with whome his mother

F Nymphidia fell in fancie, for that he had a great name at that time in ROME, and in deede Nymphidius was liker to him in fauor, then vnto any other. So, he confeſſed that he was the ſonne of this Nymphidia, howbeit he did aſcrybe the glory of the death of Nero vnto him ſelfe, and thought him ſelfe not ſufficiently recompenſed with the honors they gaue him, nether alſo A with the goods he enioyed, nether for that he lay with Sporus whome Nero loued ſo dearely, whome he ſent for to Neroes funeralls whileſt his body e was yet a burning, and kept him with him as if he had bene his wife, and called him Poppæus. Furthermore, all this did not content him, but yet ſecretly he aſpyred to be Emperor, partly practiſing the matter in Rome it ſelfe, by the meanes of certaine women and Senators which were ſecretly his friends: and partly alſo through one Gellianus, whome he ſent into Spayne, to ſee how all thinges went there.

Howbeit after the death of Nero, all things proſpered with Galba, ſauing Verginius Rufus only, who ſtoode doubtfull yet, and made him ſorely miſtruſt him, for that he was affrayd (beſides that he was generall ouer a great and puiſant army, hauing alſo newly ouerthrowen Vindex, and ſecretly ruling the beſt parte of the Empire of Rome, which was all Gavle, and then in B tumult and vprore, ready to rebell) leſt he would harken vnto them that perſwaded him to take the Empire to him ſelfe. For there was no Captaine of Rome at that tyme ſo famous, and Verginius, a famous Captaine. of ſo great eſtimation as Verginius, and that deſeruedly, for that he had done great ſeruice to the Empire of Rome in tyme of extreamitie, hauing deliuered Rome at one ſelfe tyme from a cruell tyranny, and alſo from the daunger of the warres of the Gavles. This notwithſtanding, Verginius perſiſting ſtill in his firſt determination, referred the election of the Emperor vnto the Senate: although, that after the death of Nero was openly knowen, the common ſort of ſouldiers were earneſtly in hand with him, and that a Tribune of the ſouldiers (otherwiſe called a Colonel of a thowſand men) went into his tent with a ſword drawen in his hand, and bad Verginius either determine to be Emperor, or els to looke to haue the ſworde thruſt C into him. Yet after that Fabius Valens, Captaine of a legion, was ſworne vnto Galba, and that he had receiued letters from Rome, aduertiſing him of the ordinaunce and decree of the Senate: in thend, with much a doe, he perſwaded the ſouldiers to proclayme Galba Emperor, who ſent Flaccus Ordeonius to ſucceede him, vnto whome he willingly gaue place. So, when Verginius had deliuered vp his army vnto him, he went to meete with Galba, on whome he wayted, com-ming on ſtill towards Rome. And Galba all that time neither ſhewed him euill countenance, nor yet greatly eſteemed of him, Galba him ſelfe being cauſe of the one who feared him, and his friends of the other, but ſpecially Titus Iunius: who for the malice he bare vnto Verginius, thinking to hinder his riſing, did vnwittingly in deede further his good happe, and deliuered him occaſion to draw him out of the ciuill warres and miſchieues, (the which lighted after- D wards vpon all the other Captaines) and to bring him to a quiet and peaceable life in his age.
Furthermore, Ambaſſadors were ſent from the Senate, and met with Galba at Narbona, a ci-tie of Gavle: where after they had preſented their humble duetie, they perſwaded him to make all the haſte he could poſſible to ſhew him ſelfe to the people of Rome, who were mar-uelous deſirous to ſee him. Galba receiued them very graciouſly and curteouſly, & made them great chere, howbeit very modeſtly notwithſtanding. For notwithſtanding that Nymphidius had ſent him diuers Officers, and ſtore of Neroes moueables: yet he would neuer be ſerued with any of them, at any feaſts or bankets he made, with other then his owne ſtuffe, wherein he ſhewed his noble mind, and how he could maſter all vanitie. But Titus Iunius ſhortly after told Galba, that this noble mind and ciuill moderation, without pride or pompe, was to lowly E a manner to flatter the people, and that it was a certaine reſpect of honeſtie that knewe not it ſelfe, and became not his greatnes and maieſtie. So, he perſwaded him to vſe Neroes money & ſtuffe, and to be ſumptuous and princely in his feaſts, without niggardlines. To conclude, the
The condition of Titus Iunius. olde man Galba began plainely to ſhew that he would be ruled by Titus Iunius: who aboue all other was extreame couetous, and beſides too much giuen to women. For when he was a young man, the firſt time he went to the warres vnder Caluiſius Sabine, he brought his Captaines wife (which liked good felowſhippe) diſguiſed like a ſouldier into the campe, into his generalls tent (which the Romanes called Principia) and there was ſomewhat bold with her.
Wherefore Caius Cæſar committed him to priſon, but he eſcaped at his death. Another time, when he ſupped with Clodius Cæſar, he ſtale a ſiluer pot. Clodius hearing of it, bad him againe to F ſupper the next night: but he commaunded his men they ſhould giue him drinke in an earthen cruſe. Thus this theft (through Cæſars pleaſauntnes) ſeemed rather a matter of ſport, then

A of anger: howbeit the faultes which he committed afterwards through extreame couetouſ-nes of money, (at what time he ruled Galba, and bare all the ſwaye about him) gaue vnto ſome iuſt cauſe, and vnto others apparant culler of tragicall miſchieues, and greeuous calamities.
For Nymphidius, ſo ſoone as Gellianus was returned out of SPAYNE, whome he had ſent thither to ſee what Galba did: he enforming him that Cornelius Laco was Captaine of the gard and houſe of the Emperor, and that Titus Iunius did all in all about him, and that he could neuer be ſuffred to come neare Galba, nor to ſpeake with him a part, bicauſe thoſe which were about Galba did miſtruſt him, & euer had an eye to him to ſee what he did, he was marueloully perplexed withall. Thereuppon he called for all the Centurions, Captaines, and pety Captaines of the campe of the PRÆTORIAN army, and perſwaded them that Galba touching his owne B perſon, was a good old and diſcreete man, howbeit that he did not follow his owne aduiſe & counſell, but was ruled altogether by Iunius and Laco, who marred all: and therefore, that it were good before they came to be of greater power, and to haue ſuch great authoritie in ma-neging the affayres of the Empire, as Tigellinus had before, to ſend Ambaſſadors to the Emperor in the name of all the campe, to tell him that in putting thoſe two men from about him, he ſhould be the better welcome vnto ROME, and to all men els beſides. The Captaines vtterly miſliked this deuiſe. For they thought it too ſtraunge, and beyond all reaſon, to ſeeme to teache an old Emperor, as if he were but a child that did not know what it was to gouerne: & to appoynt him what ſeruaunts and friends he ſhould keepe, and whome he ſhould truſt or miſtruſt. Nymphidius perceiuing this, tooke another courſe, and wrote letters vnto Galba to ter-C rifie him, one tyme ſending him word that he was maruelous euill beloued of many in ROME, and that they were ready to rebell againſt him: an other tyme alſo, that the legions of GER-MANY were reuoked, and that he vnderſtoode the like from the legions in IVRY and SYRIA.
And another tyme alſo, that Clodius Macer in APRICK ſtayed all the ſhippes fraighted with corne that were bownd for ROME. But in the ende, finding that Galba made no accompt of him, and that he gaue no credit to his words nor writings: he determined firſt of all to ſet vp-on him. Howbeit Clodius Celſus, borne in the citie of ANTIOCH, a wiſe man, and his faithfull friend, diſſwaded him marueloully not to doe it: declaring vnto him, that he thought there was no one houſe nor family in ROME that would call Nymphidius, Ceſar. Howbeit in contrary manner, diuers others mocked Galba and ſpecially one Mithridates of the Realme of PONT, D that ſayd he was a bald writhen man. For the ROMANES (ſayd he) haue him in deede now in ſome eſtimation, but when they haue once ſeene him, they will thinke it a perpetuall ſhame and reproche to our tyme, that he was called Ceſar. So they thought it good to bring Nymphidius about midnight into the campe, and there openly to proclayme him Emperor. Howbeit the chiefe Tribune of the ſouldiers called Antonius Honoratus, gathered his ſouldiers together in the night, and before them all did firſt openly reproue him ſelfe, and then them, for that they had ſo often turned and chaunged in ſo ſhort time, without any wit or diſcretion, hauing no iudgement to chuſe the beſt way, but to be pricked forward and caried headlong in that ſort by ſome wicked ſpirit, which brought them out of one treaſon into another. And yet (ſayd he) our firſt chaunge had ſome countenaunce of reaſon, to wete, the horrible vices E and faultes of Nero: but now, wherein can we accuſe Galba, to haue any countenaunce to fal-ſifie our faith vnto him? hath he ſlayne his mother? hath he put her to death? hath he ſhamefully played the tumbler or common player vpon a ſcaffold in the Theater? And yet for all theſe vile parts, we neuer durſt once beginne to forſake Nero, but gaue credit to Nymphidius words, who told vs that Nero had firſt forſaken vs, and that he was fled into ÆGYPT. What ſhall we doe? Shall we kill Galba after Nero? what, ſhall we kill him that is a kinne to Liuia, to make the ſonne of Nymphidia Emperor: as we haue already ſlayne the ſonne of Agrippina? or ſhall we rather kill him that hath raſhly entred into this enterpriſe, and thereby to reuenge the death of Nero, and to ſhewe our ſelues faithfull ſouldiers vnto Galba? All the ſouldiers yelded ſtraight to the Colonells words, and therewith went to their other companions to perſwade F them to keepe their faith & promiſe they auowed vnto the Emperor: ſo that they made many of them reuolt againe from Nymphidius. Thereuppon the noyſe and cryes beeing great, Nymphidius ſuppoſing (as ſome thought) that the ſouldiers did call for him, or els hoping be-with great ſtore of torche light, and caried an oration in his hand, the which Ciconius Varro had made for him, and the which he had learned without booke to ſpeake vnto the ſouldiers.

But when he found the gates of the campe ſhut, and ſaw diuers men armed vpon the walls, he began to be affrayd: and comming nearer, asked them what they ment by it, and by whoſe commaundement they had armed them ſelues as they did. A unſwer was made him by them all, that they did acknowledge no other Emperor but Galba: the which he ſeemed to like of, and alſo commaunded them that followed him to doe the like, and therewithall drew nearer.
Whereuppon certaine of the ſouldiers that warded at the gate, did open him the gate, and ſuffred him to come in with a few men with him. Howbeit aſſoone as he was comen in, firſt there was a dart throwen at him, the which one Septimius that went before him receiued vp- B made the oration for Nymphidius, and Mithridates alſo of PONT. Howbeit, though in deede they had deſerued it, yet men thought it a very cruell part to commaund theſe men to be put to death in that ſort, which were men of ſuch qualitie and calling as they were, without due forme and order of lawe. For euery man ſtoode in good hope vpon the comming in of this C new Emperor, to haue ſeene another manner of gouernment, then they had yet ſeene: how-great armies. But for Tertullianus that was an olde man, naked, and vnarmed: truely he ſhould haue put him to his triall by law, if he would haue miniſtred iuſtice, the which he promiſed to keepe at his firſt comming to the Imperial crowne. Herein they greatly reproued Galba. Now, when he drew neare to ROME within fiue and twenty furlongs, he was compaſſed about with D a multitude of Maryners and ſea faring men, that kept the high way on euery ſide, wandring vp and downe in euery place. Theſe were the men whome Nero had gathered together into one legion, and had taken them from the ower and made them ſouldiers. So they were come thither to be ſuters to him, that he would allow them ſtill to be ſouldiers, and they preſſed ſo arrogantly vpon him, that they would not ſuffer thoſe which came to the newe Emperor, to Galba entred Rome with murder. ſee him, nor ſpeake with him: but they fell to tumult and vprore, crying out to haue enſignes for their legion, and to be appoynted a place to lye in in garriſon. Galba referred them ouer to another tyme, and bad them they ſhould then let him vnderſtand their demaund. They told him againe, that this delay was a kind of deniall, and thereuppon fell to plaine mutinie, & followed him with great cryes: inſomuch that ſome of them ſtuck not to draw out their ſwords. E Then Galba commaunded the horſemen he had about him, to ſet vpon them. So there was not a man of them that reſiſted, but ſome of them were ouerthrowen, and troden vnder their horſe feete: & others alſo ſlaine as they fled. This was a very euil ſigne and preſage for him, to enter into ROME with ſuch bloudſhed, vpon ſo many poore mens dead bodies as lay ſlayne on the ground. Howbeit, where ſome before did deſpiſe and mock him for an old & feeble man, euery man then was affraid of him, and quaked for feare. Furthermore, bicauſe he would ſhew

A ſhould require and call backe againe the gifts Nero had geuen, and beſtowed vpon common players, minſtrells, wreſtlers, and people of ſuch kinde of facultie and profeſſion, and to leaue them only the tenth parte. But he got litle by this deuiſe. For the moſt parte of thoſe that had giftes geuen them, had ſpent and conſumed it all, as men that liue without any rule or order, and ſpent at night that which they get in the day: and beſides, they were to hunt after them that had either taken or bought any thing of them, and to make them to reſtore it againe. But this was an endles worke, for things had bene ſo conueyed from man to man, that in the end it came to an infinite number of mens hands. But of all this, the ſhame and diſhonor returned to Galba him ſelfe, though the malice and hatred lighted on Titus Iunius: who only made the Emperour ſtraight laced to all others, whileſt he him ſelfe tooke vnreaſonably of all men, ma-

But Iunius perceiuing Galba to be olde and feeble, woulde wiſely take his fortune and time, while time ſerued, ſuppoſing it almoſt to be at an end, ſo ſoone as he beganne to enter into it. So in the meane time he did much diſhonor the poore old man, ouergreatlie abuſing (vnder cloke of his authoritie) the chiefeſt and waightieſt matters, in reprouing, or altogether hindering thoſe, the which the Prince him ſelfe had a good deſire to deale vprightly in, as to puniſh the officers of Nero. For he put ſome of them to death, among the which Elius was one, Galba killeth Neroes ſeruaunts and officers.
and certaine other, as Polyclitus, Petinus, and Patrobius: whereat the people maruelouſlie re-C ioiced, and cried out as they went to execucion through the market place, that it was a goodly and bleſſed proceſſion, and required Tigellinus of the goddes and men, that had bene chiefe maiſter and guide of all Neroes tyrannie. Howbeit the trimme man had gotten the vauntage, and had largely fed Iunius before: for afterwards he put poore Tertullianus to death, who had neither betrayed nor hated Nero, being as he was, & had neuer offended, nor was partaker of any of his wicked parts he played, when he was aliue. Wheras he that made Nero worthie of death, & that afterwards had alſo betrayed him: he was left alone, & nothing ſayd vnto him, being a manifeſt proofe to all others, that they ſhould not dout to hope to obteine any thing at Titus Iunius hands, ſo they fed him with gifts. For the common people of Rome neuer deſired thing ſo much, as to ſee Tigellinus to be caried to execucion: and they neuer left crying D out to demaund him in all aſſemblies of the Theater or ſhew place, vntil ſuch time as the Emperour Galba did forbid them by proclamacion, the which declared that Tigellinus would not liue long, bicauſe he was ſicke of a conſumption of the lungs, which by litle & litle did weare him to nothing: and Galba prayed the people that they would not make his Empire tyrannicall and bloodie. The people were much offended with this, but yet they ſeemed to laugh at it: and Tigellinus did ſacrifice to the goddes for his health & ſafetie, and prepared a ſumptuous feaſt. Where Iunius riſing from ſupper, being ſet by the Emperour, went vnto Tigellinus to be merie with him, and tooke his daughter being a widdow with him, vnto whom Tigellinus dranke, and offred her a gift of fiue and twentie Myriades of ſiluer: and commaunded one of his chiefeſt concubines to take a carcanet from her necke ſhe wore, and to geue it the o-E ther, being worth fifteene Myriades. After he had handled the matter thus, thoſe things that were done vprightly and with iuſtice, were reproued and taken in euill part: as the thing that was graunted to the Gaules, bicauſe they did rebell with Vindex. For men thought that they were not diſcharged of the ſubſidies & taxes they were wont to pay, and that they were made free of Rome, ſo much through the bountie and liberalitie of the Emperour, as it was by Iunius meanes, of whom they had bought it. For theſe cauſes the people hated the Emperour Galba. Howbeit the ſouldiers ſtill liued in good hope, for the gift that was promiſed them at the beginning, thinking that though they had not as muche as was promiſed them, they ſhould yet enioy as muche as Nero had geuen them. But Galba vnderſtanding that they com- The noble ſaying of the Emperour Galba.

This did ſomwhat ſmother and keepe in the ſhew of their wicked intent. But they which had before ſerued vnder Verginius, and were at that time vnder Flaccus in Germanie, thinking them ſelues worthie of great reward for the battell they had won againſt Vindex, and hauing nothing geuen them in recõpence: they would not be pleaſed with any thing their Captaine Colonells and Captaines (according to the maner of the Romanes) made prayers vnto the goddes for the health and proſperitie of the Emperour Galba: there were diuers of them that made a noyſe at the firſt, and afterwardes when the Captaines continued on their prayers, in the end the ſouldiers aunſwered, if he be worthie. The legions in like maner vnder Tigellinus charge, did oftentimes vſe ſuch inſolent partes: whereof Galbaes officers did aduertiſe him by letters. Wherefore Galba being affrayed, & miſtruſting that they did not only deſpiſe him for his age, but alſo bicauſe he had no children: he determined to adopt ſome young gentleman for his ſonne, of the nobleſt houſe of the citie of Rome, and to proclaime him his ſucceſſor in Othoes maners. the Empire. At that time there was one Marcus Otho, of a noble houſe, but euer geuen to ſen- C ſualitie and pleaſure from his cradell, as much as any Romane could be. And as Homer oftentimes doth call Paris, the husbande of the fayer Helen, naming him by the name of his wife, bicauſe he had no other commendable vertue in him: euen ſo Otho came to be knowen in Poppæa, Othoes wife. Rome, by marying Poppæa, whome Nero loued when ſhe was Criſpinus wife, howebeit bearing ſome reſpect to his wife, and being affrayed alſo of his mother, he had intiſed Otho to be his bawde vnto her. Nero loued Otho dearely, and muche delighted in his companie, bicauſe he was ſo good a fellow and free of his fleſhe: and was verie glad ſometime to heare howe he mocked him, calling him niggard. The report went, that as Nero on a time was noynting him ſelfe with pretions oyles and perfumes, he caſt a litle vpon Otho as he went by: who the next day made him a feaſt in his houſe, where ſodainlie were thruſt into the hall, diuers veſſells of gold and ſiluer full of this perfumed oyle, that ranne out of them like conduit water, and did D wette all the hall. So Otho hauing firſt poſſeſſed Poppæa, and abuſed her vnder hope of Neroes loue: he perſwaded her to be diuorſed from her husband. The which ſhe did, and he receiued her home to his owne houſe, as his lawfull wife: not being ſo well pleaſed to haue parte, as he was ſorie and angrie alſo to let an other enioy her. Now Poppæa her ſelfe (as it is reported) did not miſlike this his gealouzie, for ſometimes ſhe woulde ſhut her dore againſt Nero, though Otho were not within: either bicauſe ſhe woulde keepe Nero in breath, and in loue liking ſtill, or elſe as ſome thought, bicauſe ſhe would not haue Cæſar to her husbande, and likewiſe that ſhe would not refuſe him for her frend, bicauſe ſhe was wantonly geuen. But ſo it is, Otho was in daunger of his life by marying of Poppæa: and ſo was it alſo a ſtraunge thing, that Nero hauing put his wife and ſiſter to death, only to mary Poppæa, he did yet pardon Otho, and ſaued his E ſent to the furtheſt parte of Spayne alongeſt the Ocean ſea, to be Gouernour of Lvsitania. And there he gouerned ſo wiſely, that he was nothing chargeable nor troubleſome vnto the contry: knowing that this honorable charge was geuen him, only to mitigate and hide his baniſhent. Afterwards when Galba had rebelled, he was the firſt of all the Gouernours of the prouinces that ioyned with him, and bringing with him all his plate, both golde and ſiluer, vnto the mynt maiſter, he gaue it him to put into bullion, and ſo to be conuerted into currant coyne. Moreouer he gaue of his officers vnto Galba, thoſe which he thought the meeteſt men to ſerue a Prince: and otherwiſe, when he was tried, he ſhewed him ſelfe as faithfull and skilfull in matters of ſtate, as any one that followed the Emperours traine. Inſomuch as all the F way he went many dayes iorney in coch with Galba him ſelfe, and did maruelouſlie currie fa-uour with Titus Iunius, beſtowing great gifts vpon him, and alſo enterteining him with pleaſaunt

A ſant ſpeches: but ſpecially, bicauſe he willingly gaue him the vpper hād wherby he was aſſured to be the ſecōd perſon in credit about Galba. So in all that he did, he far excelled Iunius, for that he graūted mens ſutes frāckly & frely without one penny taking, & was beſids eaſy to be ſpokē with of euery man that had any ſute to him: but ſpecially of the ſouldiers, whom he did greatly help & further, & cauſed diuers alſo to be called to honorable office, he himſelf partly mouing the Emperor for thē, without any labor or ſute made vnto him, & partly alſo obteining thē at Iunius hāds, & of the two infrachiſed bondmē of Galba, Icelus & Aſiaticus. For, theſe three men did beare all the ſway & credit about the Emperor in the court. Moreouer, alwaies whē he inuited the Emperor to his houſe, he bribed the Prætorian gard that waited vpō him, & gaue euery ſouldier a crown. Now this in ſight, ſemed chiefly to be done to honor the Emperor with: Others credit about Galba.

Others praeſiſe, aſpiring to the Empire.

B though in deede it was a fine deuiſe to ouerthrow him, to bribe the ſouldiers in that ſort as he did. So Galba cōſulting whom he ſhould make his ſucceſſor: T. Iunius preferred Otho vnto him: the which he did not ſimply of himſelfe, nor without reward, but only with promiſe that Otho ſhould marry his daughter if Galba did adopt him his ſonne, & proclaime him ſucceſſor in the Empire. Howbeit Galba did alway ſpecially regard the cōmon wealth before his priuat liking, & ſought to adopt ſuch a one, as ſhould not ſo much pleaſe himſelf, as otherwiſe he ſhould be profitable & meete for the Empire. But ſurely in my opinion, Galba would not make Otho his heire of his goods, cōſidering what an vnreaſonable ſpēder he was, & how ſumptuous in al his things, & beſides, far gone in det: for he ought aboue fiue thouſand Myriades. So when he had heard Iunius cōſell about this adoptiō, he gētly without other anſwer, did put ouer his deter-

C minatiō vntil another time, & made Otho only Cōſul at that time, & T. Iunius Cōſul with him: whereby it was ſtraight ſuppoſed, that at the beginning of the new yere, he would proclaime him his ſucceſſor in the Empire. Which was the thing the ſouldiers moſt deſired of all other. But now, delaying ſtil his determination, the legions of the Romanes in Germany, did riſe & rebel againſt him al at an inſtant. For he was generally hated of al his ſouldiers, bicauſe he paid thē not the gift he had promiſed them. So they particularly to cloke their malicious intent, alleaged for their cauſe of riſing, that he had diſhonorably reiected Verginius Rufus: and that the Gaules which had fought againſt thē, were rewarded with great & rich priuiledges, & they that tooke not part with Vindex, had bene grieuouſly puniſhed & put to death. Moreouer, that Galba did only honor Vindex death after he was dead, as acknowledging his goodwil vnto him,

The legions in Germanie doe rebell againſt Galba.

D offring publike oblatiōs & funeral ſacrifices for him, as if by him only he had bene proclaimed Emperor. Now ſuch ſpeches & rumors ran through the cāpe amōgſt thē, whē the firſt day of the yere came, which the Romanes cal the calends of Ianuary, on which day whē Flaccus had called the ſouldiers together, to ſweare them to the Emperor according to the cuſtome: they plucked down Galbaes images, & ſware only in the name of the people, & the Senate of Rome. The captaines ſeing what courſe they tooke, were as much affraid of the daūger to be without a head, as they ſtood doutful of the miſchief of their rebelliō. So there ſtept vp one amōgſt thē & ſaid, My fellowes in armes, what do we meane? We neither chooſe any other Emperor, nor yet do allow of him that is Emperor at this preſent: wherby we ſhew plainly, that we do not only refuſe Galba, but alſo all other to be our head & Emperor that may commaund vs. Now for

The ſouldiers doe rebell againſt Galba.

E Flaccus Ordeonius, that is but Galbaes ſhadow and image: I would wiſh we ſhould let him alone there as he is. And for Vitellius, gouernor of the lower Germanie, he is not farre from vs, but one daies iorney only, whoſe father was Cenſor at Rome, and thriſe alſo Conſul, and that was in a maner a Peere and companion of Clodius Ceſar in the gouernment of the Empire: whoſe pouerty if any man miſlike in him, is a manifeſt proofe of his goodnes and magnanimity. Him therefore let vs chooſe, & let the world know that we can tell how to chooſe an Emperor, better then the Spanyards or Lvsitanians. Some of the ſouldiers that ſtoode by, confirmed theſe words, but others alſo miſliked of thē: inſomuch that amōg the reſt there was an enſigne bearer that ſtale ſecretly out of the cāpe, to cary Vitellius newes hereof, who that night made a great ſupper, & had great ſtore of good cōpany with him. Theſe newes rūning ſtraight through

F his cāpe, Fabius Valēs, colonel of a legiō, came the next morning with a great nūber of horſemē, & was the firſt mā that named Vitellius Emperor, who before ſemed to refuſe that name, as one that was affraid to take the charge of ſo great an Empire vpon him: but after dinner, being full of wine & meate, he came out amõg thẽ, & accepted the name of Germanicus which they gaue him, & refused the name of Cæsar. But therewithal incõtinently after, Flaccus souldiers leauing their goodly popular oth which they had sworne in the name of the people & Senate, they all then tooke their othes faithfully to doe what it should please the Emperour Vitellius so commaund them. Thus Vitellius was chosen Emperor in GERMANY. So Galba hearing of this new chaũge, thought it not good to deferre time any lẽger for the adoptiõ he had intended, wherfore certainly vnderstanding that those whom he trusted most about him, were parties in this matter, some taking part with Dolabella, & the most part of thẽ with Otho, he neither liking the one nor the other, sodainly without any word spokẽ to any man, he sent for Piso, (that was the yoũger sonne of Crassus & Piso, whom Nero had put to death) a yoũg man faier condicioned, & shewed by his graue & modest countenance he had by nature, that he was indued with many noble vertues. Galba came downe presently frõ his pallace, & went straight to the cãpe to proclaime Piso Cæsar, & his successor in the Empire. Howbeit at his setting out of his pallace, there appeared many great signes in the firmamẽt which followed him. And moreouer, whẽ he was also come into his cãpe, & that he began to say without booke part of his oratiõ, & partly also to read it: it lightned al the while he spake, & there fel such a great shower of raine vpon it, & a maruelous thick mist in the cãpe, & ouer al the city, that mẽ might easely se the gods did not like this adoptiõ, & that it would not prosper. The souldiers thẽ selues shewed their discõtentment by their heauy looks, & the rather, bicause at that time there was no speech of reward or liberality. And furthermore, they that were present also, maruelled much (for that they could gather by the coũtenance & words of Piso) that Piso nothing reioiced at this great fauor, although he lacked not wit & vnderstanding otherwise to acknowledge it. And on the other side also, they found easely by Othoes lookes, many signes & proofes that he was maruelously offended in his mind, to see that he was thus deceiued of his hope. For he being the mã that was first spokẽ of, & thought most worthiest of all other, & being comen also so nere vnto it: now to see himselfe thus wiped out of it, he supposed that it was a plaine proofe that Galba had no good opinion of him, & that he maliced him in his hart, so that after that time he stil stood in feare of his life. For he being affraid of Piso, hating also Galba, & being grieuously offended with T. Iunius: he wẽt his way ful of diuers thoughts in his mind. For the Soothsaiers, Astronomers, & Chaldeans which he euer kept about him, they did perswade him not to be discoraged for this, & to cast all hope aside: but specially one Ptolomy, in whom he had great cõfidence, bicause he had oftẽtimes before foretold and assured him, that Nero should not put him to death, but contrarily, that Nero should die first, & he himself suruiue him, & should become Emperor of ROME. Wherby Ptolomy hauing proued his first prediction true vnto him, he bad him be bold, & feare not that to come. But now besides him, those that secretly cõplained vnto him, did prick him forward the more, sighing to see him so euil delt with by Galba, & diuers of thẽ chiefly, which bare great authority & credit about Tigellinus & Nymphidius: who being thẽ cast of, & discoũtenãced, came all vnto him, & stirred him vp the more. As amongst others, Veturius & Barbius chiefly, of the which the one had bene Optio, and the other Tesserarius: (for so the ROMANES call those that be their messengers, spials, & officers to the Captaines) who with an infranchised bondman of his called Onomastus, went vnto the campe, and there corrupted some souldiers with ready money, & other some with faire words, being of them selues euil inclined, & expected but occasion to vtter their malice. For otherwise, had the souldiers bene all of one mind, it had not bene an enterprise to haue bene brought to passe in foure dayes space (being no more betwext the adoption and murther) to make a whole campe rebell in that sorte. For they were slaine the fifteenth day of Ianuarie, on which day Galba did sacrifice in the morning within his pallace, before his frends. But at that time the Soothsaier called Ombricius, when he had the intralls of the beasts sacrificed in his hands, & had looked vpon them: he spake not doutfully, but plainly, that he saw signes of great tumult and rebellion, and that the Emperour was in present daunger of great treason. Whereby it plainly appeared, that the goddes had put Galba into Othoes hands: for he stood at that time behind Galba, & both heard & saw all that the Soothsayer did. So he seeming to be grieued withall in his minde, and his colour chaunging oft for the feare he was in: his infranchised bondeman Onomastus came and tolde him that the masons and

A chiefe carpinters were come to ſpeake with him, and taried for him. This was the watch word agreed vppon betwene them, at which tyme Otho ſhoulde then goe vnto the ſouldiers. Then Otho ſayd, that he went to looke to an olde houſe he had bought, which was falling downe, and in decay, and that he would ſhewe it vnto the workemen. So he went his way, and came from the pallace, by the place they call Tiberius houſe, into the market place, where the golden piller ſtandeth, where alſo the greateſt high wayes of all ITALIE doe meete together. There certaine met him that firſt called him Emperour, which were not in all aboue three & twentie perſons. Thereupon, though Otho was not vnconſtant as it appeared, notwithſtanding he was ſo fine and effeminate a man, but rather reſolute and ſtout in inſtant daunger: yet feare ſo oppreſſed him at that time, that he would faine haue left his enterpriſe. Howbeit the Otho called Emperour.

B ſouldiers would not ſuffer him, but compaſſing his litter rounde about with their armes, and their ſwords drawne in their hands, they commaunded the litter men to go forward. So Otho as he went haſtening on his driuers, he often muttered to him ſelfe, I am but dead. Some hearing him as they paſſed by him, rather wondred, then that they were otherwiſe troubled, to ſee ſuch a ſmall nũber of men about him, that they durſt venter vpon ſo hard an enterpriſe. Now as he was caried through the market place, he was met withall by certaine others, and afterwards by others, by three & by foure in a company: all the which came and ioyned with him, & cried Cæſar, Cæſar, hauing their ſwords drawen in their hands. Now the Colonell appointed for that day to gard the field of Mars, knew nothing of this conſpiracy, but being amazed and affraied with their ſodaine comming, he ſuffred them to come in. So when Otho was come in,

C he found no man that reſiſted him. For they that knew nothing of the practiſe, being compaſſed in with thoſe that were made priuy to it, & had knowen it of long time: being found ſtragling here and there, by one & by two, they followed the reſt for feare at the firſt, & afterwards for good wil. This was brought ſtraight to Galba to the pallace, the Soothſayer being yet buſie about his ſacrifice: inſomuch that they which before gaue no credit to thoſe diuinations, began then to maruell much at this heauenly ſigne. Then there ran immediatly a great number of people from the market place, vnto the pallace. Therupon Iunius & Lacon, & certaine other of Galbaes infranchiſed bondmen, ſtoode to gard Galbaes perſon with their ſwordes drawen in their hãds. Piſo alſo went out to ſpeake vnto the ſouldiers that garded the Emperours perſon. Moreouer, bicauſe the ILLYRIAN legion lay out of the campe in a place called Vipſanus: they

D diſpatched away Marius Celſus with all ſpede, a very honeſt man, to get that place. Galba in the meane time ſtood in dout whether he ſhould come out of the pallace or not: for Iunius would not let him goe, but Celſus and Lacon perſwaded him to go out. Inſomuch as they fell at great words with Iunius, that went about to diſſwade him from it. In this ſturre, there ranne a rumor that Otho was ſlaine in the field. Immediatly after came Iubius Atticus, one of the nobleſt ſouldiers of all the Emperours gard, & ſhewed his ſword drawen, crying that he had ſlaine Cæſars enemie: and thruſt through the preaſe, and got to Galba, and ſhewed him his ſword bloodied. Galba looking him in the face, asked him who commaunded him to doe it. The ſouldier aunſwered him: the faith & othe he had made vnto him. Therewith all the people that ſtoode by cried out it was nobly done of him, & clapped their handes for ioy. Then Galba taking his lit-

Howbeit he was no ſoner come into the market place, but he heard contrarie newes, that Otho was Lord and Maiſter of the whole campe, and armie. Then, as it happeneth in ſo great a preaſe of people, ſome cried out to him to returne backe againe, others would haue him to goe forward; others bad him be affrayed of nothing, and others willed him to looke to him ſelfe. So his litter being thus turmoyled to and fro, as toſt vpon the ſea, ſometime borne backe, otherwhile caried forward: firſt of all they ſaw certaine horſemen, and then footemen alſo armed, comming from Paules pallace, all of them together crying out with lowd voice, hence, hence, priuat man. Then all the people ſet vpon a running, not flying diſperſedly, but in heapes vpon porches and ſtalls in the market place, as it had bene to haue ſeene ſome ſight or ſport. Then with their ſwords drawen in their hands, and neuer a man of his left with him to offer to de- A fende him, ſauing one man onely, whom the Sunne ſawe that day, amongeſt ſo many thowſands of men, worthy of the Empire of Rome: and he was called * Sempronius. He hauing re-ceiued priuately no manner of pleaſure at Galbaes handes, but only to diſcharge his othe and duetie: ſtepped before the litter, and lifting vp a vine braunche he had in his hand (with the which the Romane Captaines doe vſe to beate their ſouldiers that haue offended) he fell out with them that did ſet vpon him, and prayed them to holde their hands, and not to hurt their Emperour. But in the ende when he ſaw they would not leaue, but that they fell to it in good earneſt: he then drew his ſword, and bare of the blowes as well as he could, vntil they hought him, that he fell to the ground. Then Galbaes litter being ouerthrowen right in the place called Curtius lake: Galba lay on the ground armed in his curaces. The traiterous ſouldiers flew B vppon him, and gaue him many a wounde: and Galba holding out his necke vnto them, bad them ſtrike hardily, if it were to do their contrie good. So he had many wounds on his armes and his thighes, as it is reported: howebeit the ſouldier that ſlue him, was called Camurius, of the fifteenth legion. Others doe reporte that it was one Terentius, other alſo ſay Arcadius: And ſome other doe call him Fabius Fabulus: who hauing ſtriken of his head, wrapped it in the lappe of his gowne, bicauſe he coulde not otherwiſe take holde of it, for that he was all balde. Howebeit his fellowes and conſortes woulde not ſuffer him to hide it, but rather that his notable fact he had done ſhould be ſeene. Therefore he ſet it vpon the point of his launce, and ſo ſhaking the face of this poore olde man, (a wiſe and temperate Prince, and chiefe Bi-ſhoppe, and Conſull) he ranne vp and downe (like madde women poſſeſſed with the ſpirite C and furie of Bacchus at the feaſtes of Bacchus) bowing downe his launce being all of a goare blood. When his head was brought to Otho, it is ſayd he cried out alowd: tuſh, my fellowes, this is nothing: vnleſſe you bring me alſo Piſoes head. So not long after, they brought him his head alſo. For the young man being hurt, fled, and was followed by one called * Marcus, who ſlue him hard by the temple of Veſta. So did they alſo kill Titus Iunius: who openly confeſſed that he was one of the conſpiracie againſt Galba, and cried out to them that ſlue him, that Otho did not know they did kill him. This notwithſtanding, the ſouldiers ſtrake of his head, and Lacons alſo, and brought them both to Otho to receiue the reward. Howbeit, as the Poet Ar-chilochus ſayth:

Of ſeuen peraduenture ſlaine dead on the ground, D A thouſand will ſay, that they all gaue the wound.

So there were diuers men at that time, who being no partakers of this murther, had bloodied all their handes and ſwordes, and ſo ſhewed them bloodied to haue rewarde alſo: but Vitellius notwithſtanding made inquirie of them afterwardes, and cauſed them to be put to death. There came into the fielde alſo, one Marius Celſus, whome diuers men accuſed to haue perſwaded the ſouldiers to aide Galba, and the common people cried out, and bad he ſhoulde be put to death. Howebeit Otho woulde not ſuffer them to kill him: and yet being affrayed to contrarie the ſouldiers mindes, he tolde them they ſhould not kill him ſo raſhly, bicauſe he was firſt to learne ſome thinges more of him. So he commaunded them to binde him, and deliuered him to be kept of thoſe he truſted moſt. Afterwards, the Senate were pre- E ſentlie aſſembled: who, as if men had bene ſodainlie chaunged from them they were, or as if there had bene new goddes, they all ſware by the name of Otho, (the which othe he him ſelfe had before ſworne vnto Galba, and did not keepe it) and called him beſides, Auguſtus, and Ce-ſar, the bodies of them that were ſlaine lying yet headles on the ground in the market place, all in their Conſulls robes. And as for their heades, the ſouldiers after they coulde tell no more what to doe with them, they ſolde the heade of Titus Iunius vnto his daughter, for the ſumme of two thowſande fiue hundred Drachmas. And for Piſoes head, his wife through in-treatie, begged it of one called Veranius. On the other ſide, for Galbaes head, they gaue it vnto Patrobius and Vitellius ſeruauntes: who, after they had vſed it as vilelie as they coulde de-uiſe, they threwe it at length in a place, where their bodies are caſt, whome the Ceſars put to F death, the which they call Seſtertium. Nowe for his bodie, Heluidius Priſcus, through Othoes ſufferance, caried it away, and Argius, one of his infranchiſed bondemen, buried it by night.

Thus haue you heard the hiſtorie of Galba, a man that in nobilitie and wealth was inferiour to few ROMANES, and in them both was the chiefeſt man of all his time, and had alway liued in honorable fame and eſtimacion, in the raigne of fiue Emperours. So that he ouercame Nero by his good name, and the good opinion men had of him: and not through his owne force and power. For of them that ſtroue to make them ſelues Emperours at that time, ſome found no man that thought them worthie of it: others did put foorth them ſelues, as thinking them ſelues worthie of it. Howbeit Galba was called vnto it, and obeyed them that called him, vſing his name againſt Vindex boldneſſe: whereby he procured, that his riſing (which before was called innouation and rebellion) was then called ciuill warre, after that his faction came to haue a man to be their head, thought worthy to be their Emperour. And therefore he did not B ſo muche deſire to be Emperour for him ſelfe, as to doe good to his contrie and common wealth. But yet he erred, in ſeeking to commaunde the ſouldiers whom Tigellinus and Nymphidius had ſpoyled by their flatteries: euen as in olde time Scipio, Fabricius, and Camillus did commaund the ſouldiers of the Empire of ROME at that time. So he being now a verie olde man, ſhewed him ſelfe a good Emperour and after the old ſorte, in his behauior towardes the ſouldiers only: but in all other things elſe, being caried away with the couetouſnes of *T. Iuhim, but many that were ſorie for his death.

THe next morning, the new Emperour by breake of day went vnto the Capitoll, and ſacrificed, and there ſent for Marius Celſus to come vnto him, whom he curteouſlie ſaluted, and prayed him rather to forget the cauſe of his impriſonment, then to remember his deliuerie. Marius Celſus made him a wiſe and noble aunſwere againe, and ſayd that the matter for the which they would haue accuſed him vnto him, did witnes his behauiour, ſhewing him ſelfe faithfull vnto Galba, who neuer did him any pleaſure. Theſe words of them both did marueilouſlie pleaſe the people: & ſo did they like the ſouldiers alſo wōderfully well. Moreouer, after he had verie fauorablie and graciouſlie taken order for matters in the Senate, the reſt of the time he had to be Conſull, he imployed partely about Verginius Ruſus, and did alſo eſtabliſh them Conſuls in their place and degree, which had bene called vnto that dignitie by Nero, or otherwiſe by Galba: and he alſo honored the oldeſt Senators and of greateſt eſtimacion with certaine Prieſthoodes. Beſides all this, he reſtored vnto all thoſe Senators that were baniſhed by Nero, and called home againe, all their goodes yet vnſold. Whereupon the chiefeſt Magiſtrats and noble men of the citie that quaked before for feare, ſuppoſing that he was not a man, but rather a deuill or furie of hell that was come to be Emperour: they all became glad men, for the good hope of this ſmiling and gracious raigne they were ſo lately entred into. Moreouer, nothing pleaſed all the Romanes together more, nor wanne him the good will of all men ſo muche, as that he did vnto Tigellinus. For it was puniſhment enough for him, if he had had no more but the feare of the puniſhment euerie man threatned him withall, as a thing due to the common wealth, and alſo by reaſon of the incurable diſeaſes his bodie was infected withall. Now, though the noble men thought his vnreaſonable inſolency and luſt of the fleſh, (following naughtie packes, and common ſtrumpets, burning ſtill in filthie concupiſcence) an extreame puniſhment, comparable to many deaths, and being alſo no better then a dead man in maner, ſtill following pleaſure and ſenſualitie as long as he coulde: this notwithſtanding, all men were offended with him, that they ſhoulde ſee ſuche a wicked creature as he liue, that had put ſo many noble men to death. So Otho ſent for him, who liued verie pleaſauntlie at his houſes in the contrie, by the citie of Sinvessa, and had ſhippes euer readie vppon the ſea coaſt, to flie if neceſſitie draue him to it. Thereuppon he firſt ſought to bribe him with money, which was ſent with commiſſion to apprehend him, and perſwaded him to let him ſcape: but when he ſaw he could not frame him to his minde, yet he refrayned not to geue him gifts, and prayed him to geue him leaue to ſhaue his beard. The other graunted him. Then Tigellinus tooke a razer, and did cut his owne throte. So, Otho hauing pleaſed the people thus well, he ſought not otherwiſe to be reuenged of his priuate iniuries. Moreouer, to currie fauour with the common people, he refuſed not to be called Nero, in any open aſſemblies at the Theaters. Alſo when certaine priuate men had ſet vp Neroes images in open ſight, Otho was not offended withall: but moreouer Clodius Ruſus writeth, that letters pattents & cõmiſſions were ſent into Spayne by poſts, ſubſcribing the goodly name of Nero, with the name of Otho. Howbeit when it came to his eares that the noble men of Rome miſliked of it: he left it of, and would wryte it no more in his letters. So Otho hauing begonne in this ſorte to ſtabliſh his Empire, the ſouldiers maruelouſlie troubled him. For they continually perſwaded him to take heede to him ſelfe, and to beware how noblemen and gentlemen came neere vnto him: the which they did, either for that in deede they bearing him good will, were affrayed ſome trecherie or treaſon would be ſecretlie practiſed againſt him: or elſe it was ſome fained deuiſe to ſet all together by the eares, and to bring it to ciuill warre. For when Otho him ſelfe had ſent Criſpinus with his ſeuenteenth legion to bring him certaine priſoners, and that Criſpinus was ready before day, going to performe the effect of his commiſſion, hauing loden carts with armor and weapon for his ſouldiers: the deſperateſt and boldeſt men among them, began to crie out, and ſayd that Criſpinus ment no good in his hart, and that the Senate went about to make ſome chaunge and ſturre, and that his armor and weapons were not for Cæſar, but againſt him. Theſe wordes moued many mens conſciences, and made them to rebell: ſo that ſome layed hold vpon the carts to ſtay them, others ſlue two Centurions out of hande, and Criſpinus him ſelfe alſo that woulde haue ſtayed them. Thereuppon all of them together, one incoraging an other, went directly to Rome, as meaning to aide the Emperour. But when they came thither, vnderſtanding that there were foure ſcore Senators at ſupper with the Emperour, they ranne ſtraight to the pallace, crying out that it was a good occaſion offered them to kill all Cæſars enemies at a clappe. Hereupon all Rome was ſtraight in armes, looking immediatly after to be ſacked and ſpoyled of all that euer they had: and the people ranne vp and downe the pallace, here and there, Otho him ſelfe alſo being in great feare and diſtreſſe. For men might eaſelie ſee he was affrayed, bicauſe of his gheſtes he had bidden, not for him ſelfe, ſeeing them all amazed with the matter for feare, not ſpeaking a word vnto him, but ſtaring on him ſtill, and ſpeciallie thoſe that came and brought their wiues with them to ſupper.

A So Otho sodainly sent the Captaines vnto the souldiers & commaunded them to speake with them, & to pacifie them as well as they could: and therewithall he made them take away the borde, and conueyed his ghestes out of his pallace by secret posternes. So they saued themselues, passing through the souldiers, a litle before they entred into the hall where the feast was kept, crying out, and asking, what was become of Cæsars enemies. So the Emperour rising from his bedde, he pacified them with gentle wordes, the teares standing in his eyes, and thereby at length he sent them all away. The next morning he liberallie bestowed vpon euery souldier, a thowsande two hundred and fiftie Drachmas: and then he went into the market place, & there gaue great commendacion to the common people for their readie good wills they had shewed vnto him: howbeit, he said there were some among them, that vnder colour B and pretext of honestie, did commit many lewde partes, and made his goodnesse and grace towards them to be euill spoken of, and their constancie and faith also to be misliked of, and prayed them his griefe might be theirs, and that the offendors might be punished. They all confirmed his words, and bad him alowde he should doe it. So Otho thereuppon caused two of them only to be apprehended, supposing no man would be greatlie offended with the punishment of them, and then went his way. Those that loued and trusted him, marueled much to see this chaunge. Other were of opinion, that it stoode him vpon to doe so, to winne the souldiers hartes, bicause of the warre at hand. Now newes came flying to him out of all partes, that Vitellius had taken vpon him the authoritie to be Emperour, and posts came to him one in an others necke, to tel him that numbers of people came in daily to submit them selues vn-C to Vitellius. Others tolde him also, how the legions remayning in Panonia, Dalmatia, and Mysia, had chosen Otho. Immediatly after, frendly letters were brought him also from Mutianus and Vespasianus, the one of them being in Syria, and the other in Iudea, with great and mightie armies. Whereuppon Otho geuing credit vnto them, wrote vnto Vitellius, and bad him beware how he meddled with any deeper enterprise, then became a priuate souldier: and that he would geue him golde and siluer enough, and a great citie, where he might liue quietly, and take his pleasure. Vitellius gently aunswered him at the first, and sported with him: but afterwards they falling out one with an other, spiteful letters were sent betwext either parties, one of them reproaching an other, not falsely but fondly, and foolishly detecting eche others vices. For in deede it was hard to iudge, which of them two was most licentiously geuen, most D effeminate, least skilfull, poorer, or most indetted before. Nowe at that time they talked of wonderful signes that had bene sene: howbeit they were but flying tales, & there was no man to iustifie them. But in the Capitoll there was the image of Victorie set vppon a triumphing chariot: the which euery bodie saw did let slacke the reynes of the bridles of the horses which she had in her handes, as though she could not stay them any more. The statue of Caius Cæsar also within the Iland, which standeth in the middest of the riuer of Tiber at Rome, without any earthquake or storme of winde, turned of it selfe from the West to the East: the which (as it is reported) chaũced about the time that Vespasian began to take vpon him to be Emperour. Many also tooke the ouerflowing of the riuer of Tiber for an euil signe. For in deede it was at that time of the yeare when riuers do swell most, yet was it neuer so great before, neither had E it euer done so much hurt as it did at that time. For it had ouerflowen her bankes, and drowned the most parte of the citie, and specially the corne market: insomuche that they suffered famine many dayes after in Rome. In all this sturre, newes came that Cecinna and Valens, (two of Vitellius Captaines) had taken the mountaines of the Alpes: and moreouer in Rome, Dolabella a noble man, was suspected by the Prætorian souldiers, that he practised some treason. Now Otho, either bicause he was affrayed of him, or of some other: he sent him to the citie of Aquinum, promising him he shoulde haue no other hurte. Then choosing the choycest gentlemen which he would take with him, among others he tooke Lucius, the brother of Vitellius, and did not depriue him of any iot of his honor and dignitie. Moreouer, he was verie carefull to see his wife and mother safe, that they shoulde not be affrayed of them selues. Be-F sides all this, he appointed Flauius Sabinus, Vespasians brother, Gouernour of Rome in his absence: and did it for Neroes sake, who had affore geuen him the same honor and authoritie the which Galba had taken from him: or els to make Vespasian see, that he loued & trusted him.

The frowardnes of Otho and Vitellius ſouldiers. Captaines but the Emperour only, ſaying that he, and none other, ſhould commaund them.
In deede, the enemies ſouldiers alſo were not muche wiſer, nor more obedient to their Captaines, but were braue and luſtie vpon the ſelfe ſame occaſion: howbeit they had this aduan-tage ouer the other, that they could tell how to fight, and were all well trained in the warres, and could away with paines and hardnes, and neuer ſhronke from it. Whereas the Prætorian ſouldiers that came from ROME, were fine mealed mouthed men, bicauſe they had bene long from the warres, & had liued at eaſe in ROME, and taken their pleaſure in banketing & playes B and therefore in a brauery and iolity, they would needes haue men thinke that they diſdained to do what their Captaines commaunded them, as men that were too good to do it, and not that they were fine fingered, and loth to take paines. So that when Spurina would haue compelled them, he was in daunger of death, and ſcaped verie narowly that they ſlue him not. For they ſtucke not to reuile him, and geue him as fowle words as they could: calling him traitor, and curſing him, ſaying that he marred all Cæſars affaires. Yea and there were ſome of them that hauing their full cuppes went in the night to his tent, to aske him leaue to depart, ſaying that they would go to the Emperour, and complaine to him of him. But the flowte they had Placentia: the fertileſt towne of all Italie. geuen them by their enemies about that time, hard by the city of PLACENTIA, did ſtand Spu- rina and his affaires to great purpoſe. For Vitellius ſouldiers comming hard to the walls of the C citie, did mocke Othoes men that were at the cranewes of the ſame, and called them fine daunſers, and goodly ſtage players, that had ſeene nothing but playes and feaſts: and that for feats of armes, and battells, they knewe not what it ment: and that the greateſt act they euer did, was for that they ſtrake of the head of a poore naked olde man, meaning by Galba: and that to come to fight a battell in the fielde before men, their hartes were in their heeles. Theſe vile words galled them to the hart, and made them ſo mad withall, that they came of them ſelues to pray Spurina to commaund them what he thought good, promiſing that from thence forth they would neuer refuſe any paines or daunger he would put them to. Thereupon, there was a hotte aſſault geuen to the city of PLACENTIA, with great ſtore of ſundry engines. Howbeit Spurinaes men had the better, and hauing with great ſlaughter repulſed the aſſailants, they ſa- D ued one of the goodlieſt, the greateſt, and moſt floriſhing cities of all ITALIE. So Othoes Captaines were farre more familiar, curteous, and ciuill to deale with cities and priuate men, The praiſe of Othoes Captaines, and diſpraiſe of Vitellius Captaines. then Vitellius ſouldiers were. For, of Vitellius Captaines, Cecinna, was neither for perſon nor maners accompanyable for the people, but ſtraunge, monſtruous, & troubleſome to ſee him only, a mightie made man wearing gallie gaskons, and coates with ſleeues, after the facion of the GAVLES, and ſpake in this attire vnto the enſigne bearers, and Captaines of the RO-MANES. Furthermore, he had his wife alway with him brauely mounted a horſebacke, gallantlie apparelled, and accompanied with a troupe of the choyceſt men of armes of all the companies. The other, Fabius Valens, he was ſo couetous, that no ſpoyle of enemies, no polvnſatiable couetouſnes: whereby it ſeemeth that was the let, that comming on ſo ſlowly, he was not at the firſt battell. Howbeit others do blame Cecinna for it, that made too much haſt, for the deſire he had to haue the only honor of the victory to him ſelfe: & this was the cauſe, that beſides his other light faultes, he alſo made this, that he gaue battell out of due time and ſeaſon, and when it came to the poynt in deede, yet he fought it not out valliantly, ſo that he Cremona a goodly citie. had almoſt caſt all away. For when he had the repulſe from PLACENTIA, he went vnto CRE-MONA an other great citie. And Annius Gallus going to aide Spurina, who was beſieged in the citie of PLACENTIA: when he heard by the way that the PLACENTINES had the better, and that the CREMONENSES were in great daunger and diſtreſſe: he marched thither with his army, and went and camped hard by the enemies. After that alſo, the other Captaines of either F ſide came to aide their men. Howbeit Cecinna hauing layed a great number of his beſt ſouldiers well armed in ambuſhe, in certaine thicke groues and woddes: he commaunded his horſemen

A horſemen to march forward, and if the enemies came to charge them, that they ſhould retyre litle and litle, making as though they fled, vntill they had drawen them within his ambuſh. So there were certaine traitors that bewrayed the ambuſh vnto Marius Celſus, who came againſt them with his choyce men of armes, and did not followe them ouerrafhly, but compaſſed in the place where the ambuſh lay, the which he raiſed, and in the meane time ſent to his campe with all poſſible ſpeede to his footemen to make haſt thitherward: and it ſeemeth, that if they had comen in time, they had not left one of their enemies aliue, but had marched vpon the bellies of all Cecinnaes armie, if they had followed the horſemen in time, as they ſhould haue done. But Paulinus being comen too late to aide them, for that he came ſo ſlowly: he was burdened that he did not the duetie of a Captaine, that bare the name and countenaunce he ca-

B ried. Furthermore, the common ſouldiers accuſed him of treaſon vnto Otho, and ſtirred vp their Emperour againſt him, and ſpake verie bigge words of them ſelues, ſaying, that they had ouercomen for their owne partes, had not the cowardlines of their Captaines bene, who put them by the victory. So Otho did not truſt him ſo much, that he would not make him beleue but that he miſtruſted ſomwhat. Therefore he ſent his brother Titianus to the campe, and Proclus with him, Captaine of the Prætorian garde, who in deede commaunded all, but in ſight Titianus had all the honor, as bearing the name of the Emperours Lieutenaunt. Marius Celſus, and Paulinus followed after, bearing name of counſellers and frends only: howbeit otherwiſe they meddled with nothing, neither had any authoritie geuen them. On the other ſide, the enemies were in as much trouble as they; and thoſe ſpecially, whom Valens led. For when

C newes was brought of the conflict that was betwene them in this ambuſhe, they were angrie with him, bicauſe they were not at it, and for that he had not led them thither, to helpe their men that were ſlaine: inſomuch that he had much a doe to pacifie and quiet them, they were ſo readie to haue flowen vpon him. So Valens at length remoued his campe, & went & ioyned with Cecinna. Howbeit Otho being comen to his campe at the towne of Bebriacvm, which is a litle towne hard by Cremona: he conſulted with his Captaines whether he ſhould geue battell or not. So Proclus and Titianus gaue him counſell to fight, conſidering that the ſouldiers were verie willing to it, by reaſon of the late victorie they had wonne, and wiſhed him not to deferre it: for thereby he ſhoulde but diſcorage his armie, which was nowe willing to fight, and alſo geue their enemies leaſure to tarie for their Chiefetaine Vitellius, who came

D him ſelfe out of Gavle. But Paulinus in contrarie manner alleaged, that the enemies had all their force and power preſent, with the which they thought to fight with them, and alſo to ouercome them, and that they wanted nothing: whereas Otho looked for an other armie out of Mysia and Pannonia, as great an armie as his enemies had alreadie, ſo that he could tary his time, & not ſerue his enemies turne: and alſo, that if the ſouldiers being now but a few in number were willing to fight, they ſhoulde then be much more incoraged, when they ſhould haue greater companie, and ſhould alſo fight with better ſafetie. Furthermore he perſwaded them, that to delay time was for their auaile, conſidering that they had plentie and ſtore of all maner of prouiſion: where the enemies on thother ſide being alſo in their enemies contrie, their vittells would quickely faile them. Marius Celſus liked verie well of theſe perſwaſions.

E And ſo did Annius Gallus, who was not preſent at this counſell (but gone from the campe, to be cured of a fall he had from his horſe) but he was wrytten to by Otho to haue his opinion alſo. So Annius Gallus returned aunſwere, that he thought it not beſt to make haſt, but to ſtay for the armie that came out of Mysia, conſidering they were onwardes on their way. Howbeit Otho woulde not hearken to this counſell, but followed their mindes that concluded of battell: for the which were alleaged diuers occaſions. But the chiefeſt and likelieſt cauſe of all was, that the ſouldiers which are called the Prætorian gard (being the dayly gard about the Emperours perſon) finding then in effect what it was to profeſſe to be a ſouldier, and to liue like a ſouldier: they lamented their continuing in Rome, where they liued at eaſe & pleaſure, feaſting and banketing, neuer feeling the diſcommodities and bitter paines of warre, and did

F therefore ſo earneſtly crie out to fight, that there was no ſtaying of them, as if they ſhould at their firſt crie and ſetting forward, haue ouerthrowen their enemies. Moreouer, it ſeemed alſo that Otho him ſelfe could no more away with the feare and doute of the vncertaine ſucceſſe to come, neither could any lenger abide the grieuous thoughts of the daunger of his eſtate, A he was ſo effeminate, and vnacquainted with ſorowe, and paines. This was the cauſe that caried him on headlong, as a man that ſhutteth his eyes falling from a high place, and ſo to put all at aduenture. The matter is thus reported by Secundus the Orator, and Othoes ſecretarie. Others alſo doe report, that both armies had diuers determinations and mindes: as to ioyne all together in one campe, and ioyntly to chooſe among them, if they could agree, the worthieſt man of all the Captaines that were there: if not, then to aſſemble the whole Senate in a place together, & there to ſuffer the Senators to chooſe ſuch a one Emperour, as they liked beſt of. And ſure it is verie likely it was ſo, conſidering that neither of them both which were then called Emperours, was thought meete for the place they had: and therefore that theſe counſells and conſideracions might eaſely fall into the ROMANE ſouldiers heades, (who were B wiſe men and expert ſouldiers) that in deede it was a thing for them iuſtly to miſlike, to bring them ſelues into the like miſerable time and calamitie, which their predeceſſors before them had cauſed one an other to ſuffer, firſt for Sylla and Marius ſakes, and afterwards for Ceſar and Pompey, and now to beſtow the Empire of ROME either vpon Vitellius, to make him the abler to follow his dronkennes and gluttony: or elſe vpon Otho, to maintaine his wanton and licentious life. This was the cauſe that moued Celſus to delay time, hoping to end the warres without trouble and daunger: and that cauſed Otho alſo to make the more haſt, being affrayed of the ſame. Howbeit Otho returning backe againe to BRESSELLES, he committed an other faulte, not only bicauſe he tooke his mens good wils from thē to fight, the which his preſence, and the reuerence they bare vnto him did put in them: but bicauſe alſo he caried away with C him for the gard of his perſon, the valliantеſt ſouldiers & moſt reſolute men of all his hoſt. About that time there chaunced a skirmiſh to fall out by the riuer of Po, bicauſe Cecinna built a bridge ouer it, & Othoes men did what they could to hinder them. Howbeit when they ſaw they preuailed not, they laded certaine barges with faggots and drie wodde, all rubbed ouer with brimſtone and pitche, and ſetting them a fire, they ſent them downe the ſtreame. When the barges were in the middeſt of the ſtreame, there ſodainlie roſe a winde out of the riuer, which blewe vppon this woddeſtake they had prepared to caſt among the enemies workes of this bridge, that firſt made it ſmoke, and immediatly after fell all on a great flame, which did ſo trouble the men in the barges, that they were driuen to leape into the riuer to ſaue themſelues: and ſo they loſt their barges, and became themſelues alſo priſoners to their enemies, D to their great ſhame and mockerie. Furthermore, the GERMAINES vnder Vitellius, fighting with Othoes fenſers, which of them ſhould winne a litle Iland in the middeſt of the riuer: they had the vpper hand, and ſlue many of the fenſers. Thereuppon Othoes ſouldiers which were in BERRIACVM, being in a rage withall, and would nedes fight: Proclus brought them into the fielde, and went and camped about fiftie furlong out of the citie, ſo fondly, and to ſo litle purpoſe, that being the ſpring of the yeare, and all the contrie thereabout full of brookes and riuers, yet they notwithſtanding lacked water. The next morning they raiſed their campe to meete with their enemies the ſame day, and were driuen to march aboue a hundred furlong. Now Paulinus perſwaded them to go fayer and ſoftly, and not to make more haſt then neded, and would not ſo ſoone as they ſhould come, (being wearied with their iorney and trauell) ſet E vpon their enemies that were well armed, and beſides had leaſure & time enough to ſet their men in battell ray, whileſt they were cōming ſo long a iorney with all their cariage. Now the Captaines being of diuers opinions about this matter, there came a horſeman from Otho, one of thoſe they call the Nomades, that brought them letters, in the which Otho commaunded them to make all the haſt they could, and to looſe no time, but to marche with all ſpeede towards the enemie. So when theſe letters were red, the Captaines preſently marched forward with their armie. Cecinna vnderſtanding of their comming, was aſtonied at the firſt, and ſodainlie forſooke the worke of his bridge to returne to his campe, where he founde the moſt parte of his ſouldiers alreadie armed, and Valens had geuen them their ſignall & word of battell. And in the meane time, whileſt the legions were taking their places to ſet them ſelues in F battell ray: they ſent out before the choyceſt horſemen they had, to skirmiſh. Now there ran a rumor (no man knew how, nor vpon what cauſe) that Vitellius Captaines would turne on

Othoes

Secundus the Orator, ſecretarie vnto Otho the Emperour.

Vitellius: a dronkard and glutton. Otho: a wanton and licentious liuer.

 The towne of Breſſelles is hard by the riuer of Po.*

A Othoes side in battell. Insomuch that when these men of armes came neare to meete with the vward of Othoes armie: Othoes men did speake very gently to them, and called them companions. Vitellius men on the other side tooke this salutacion in euill parte, and aunswered them againe in rage, as men that were willing to fight. Insomuch that those that had spoke to them, were quite discouraged: and the residue also beganne to suspect their companions which had spoken to them, and mistrusted them to be traytors. And this was the chiefest cause of all their disorder, being ready to ioyne battell. Furthermore, on the enemies side also, all was out of order: for the beasts of carriage ranne in amongest them that fought, and so did put them maruellously out of order. Besides that also, the disaduantage of the place where they fought, did compell them to disperse one from another, because of sundry ditches and trenches that were B betwene them, whereby they were compelled to fight in diuers companies together. So there were but two legions onely, the one of Vitellius, called the deuowrer: and the other of Otho, called the helper: which getting out of these holes and ditches a part by them selues, in a good plaine euen ground, fought it out so a long time together in good order of battel. Othoes soul-diers were men of goodly personages, strong, and valliant of their handes, howbeit they had neuer serued in the warres, nor had euer foughten battell but that. And Vitellius men on the other side, were olde beaten souldiers, and had serued all their youth, and knew what warres & battells ment. So when they came to ioyne, Othoes men gaue such a lusty charge vpon the first onset, that they ouerthrew, & slue all the first rancke, and also wanne the enseigne of the eagle.
Vitellius men were so ashamed of it, and therewith in such a rage, that they tooke hart againe C vnto them, and ranne in so desperately vpon their enemies, that at the first they slue the colo-nell of all their legion, and wanne diuers ensignes. And furthermore, against Othoes fensers, (which were accompted the valliantest men, and readiest of hande) Varus Alphenus brought his men of armes called the Battavi, which are Germaines in the lower parte of Germany, dwelling in an Iland compassed about with the riuer of Rhein. There were few of his Fensers that stucke by it, but the most of them ranne away towards the riuer, where they founde certeine ensignes of their enemies set in battell ray, who put them all to the sworde, and not a man of them scaped with life. But aboue all other, none proued more beasts & cowards, then the Prætorian gard. For they would not tary till the enemies came to giue them charge, but cowardly turned their backs, and fled through their owne men that were not ouerthrowen: D and so did both disorder them, and also make them affrayd. This notwithstanding, there were a great number of Othoes men who hauing ouerthrowen the vward of them that made head against them, they forced a lane through their enemies that were Conquerors, and so valliantly returned back into their campe. But of their Captaines, nether Proclus, nor Paulinus, durst returne backe with them, but fled another way, being affraid of the furye of the souldiers, that they would lay all the fault of their ouerthrow vpon their Captaines. Howbeit Annius Gallus receiued them into the citie of Bebriacvm, that came together after this ouerthrow, & told them that the battell was equall betwixt them, and that in many places they had had the better of their enemies. But Marius Celsus gathering the noble men and gentlemen together that had charge in the army, he fell to consultacion what they should do in so great a calamitie, & E extreame slaughter of the Romane Citizens. For if Otho him selfe were an honest man, he should no more attempt fortune: considering that Cato and Scipio were both greatly blamed, for that they were the cause of casting away many men in Africk to no purpose, (though they fought for the libertie of the Romanes) and onely of selfe will, for that they would not yeld to Iulius Cæsar after he had wonne the battell of Pharsalia. For though fortune in all other things haue power ouer men: yet extremities happening to good men, she can not preuent them to determine the best for their safetie. These perswasions straight caried away the Capteines, who went presently to feele the mindes of the priuate souldiers, whom they found all of them desirous of peace. So Titianus perswaded them to send Ambassadors vnto the enemies to treate of peace: and Celsus and Gallus tooke vpon them the charge to goe thither, F to breake the matter vnto Cecinna, and Valens. But by the way they met with certen Centurions, who told them how all the army of the enemies were comming onwards on their way, to come directly to the citie of Bebriacvm, and that their chieftaines had sent before to offer treaty of peace. Celsus and his companion Gallus being glad of this, prayed the Centurions A that they would returne with them vnto Cecinna. But when they were come neare vnto him, Celsus was in great daunger of his life: bicause the men of armes which he had ouerthrowen certen dayes before in an ambushe, comming before, when they spyed him, they flew vpon him with great showtes. Howbeit the Centurions that were in his company, stepped before him, and closed him in: and so did the other Capteines that cryed vnto them, that they should do him no hurt. Cecinna vnderstanding what the matter was, roade thither, and pacified the tumult of these men of armes: and then saluting Celsus very curteously, he rode with him towardes BEBRIACVM. But nowe Titianus in the meane time, repenting him selfe that he had sent Ambassadors vnto the enemies, he placed the desperatest souldiers he had vpon the walls of the citie, and incoraged the rest also to doe the like, and to stand to the defense. But B Cecinna came to the wal, & being a horseback, held vp his hand vnto them. Then they made no more resistance, but those that were vpon the walles, saluted the souldiers: and they that were within the citie opened the gates, and thrust in amongest Vitellius men, who mette with them, and did no man any hurt, but curteously imbraced them, and saluted eche other. Then they all sware and tooke their othes to be true to Vitellius, and so yelded the mischiefs vnto him. So doe the most part of those that were at this battell, report the successe thereof: graunting notwithstanding, that they knew not euery thing that was done, bicause of the great disorder among them. But as I trauelled on a time through the field where the battell was striken, with Metrius Florus that had beene Consul: he shewed me an olde man that when the field was fought in that place, was younge, and against his will was at the same battell on Othoes parte. C Who told vs, that after the battell was fought, he came into the field to survey the number of those that were dead: and he found the dead bodies piled on a heape, of the height of those that came to view them. And sayd moreouer, that he made inquierie of the matter, but he nether could imagine it him selfe, nor be satisfied by others. Now in deede it is likely, that in ciuil warres betwene contry men of one self citie, where one of the two armies is ouerthrowen, that there should be greater slaughter among them, then against the other enemies, bicause they take no prisoners of either side: for those they should take, would serue them to no good purpose. But after they were slaine, one to be layed on heapes so by another, that is a hard thing to iudge. But now to the matter. The newes of this ouerthrowe came first but obscurely vnto Otho, a common thing in a matter of so great importance: but afterwardes, when some D that were hurt came and brought him certen newes of it, it was no maruell then to see Othoes friendes and familliers to comfort him, who prayed him to be of good cheere, and not to be discoraged for that. Howbeit, the wonderfull great loue and good will which the priuat souldiers shewed vnto him at that time, did passe and exceede all speech and education. For they forsooke him not, nether went they to submit them selues to their enemies the conquerors, nether tooke they any regard of them selues, to see their Emperour in that dispayre: but all of them ioyntly together went vnto his lodging, and called him their Emperour. Then he came out, and they fell downe at his feete, as men represented in a triumphe lying on the ground, & kissed his hands, with the teares ronning downe their cheekes, and besought him not to forsake and leaue them to their enemies, but to commaund their persons whilest they had one E droppe of blud left in their bodies to doe him seruice. All of them together made this petition to him. But amongest others, there was a poore souldier drawing out his sword, sayd vnto him: know, O Cæsar, that all my companions are determined to dye in this sort for thee, and so slue him selfe. But all these lamentable things did neuer melt Othoes hart: who looking with a stowte countenaunce round about him, and casting his eyes euery where, spake vnto them in this maner. I thinke this a more happy day for me, my fellowes, then that in the which you first chose me Emperour: to see you loue me so well, and doe me such honor, with so great shew of loyaltie. But yet I beseech you not to deny me of a greater fauor, which is: to dye valliantly, and honorably, for the safetie of so many honest men as you be, and so good Citizens " of ROME. If by your election you made me worthy to take vpon me the Imperiall crowne: I F gainſte the CIMBRES, to fight who ſhould be owners of ITALY: but it is againſte the RO- " MANES them ſelues. For in this ciuill warre, both the Conqueror and vanquiſhed doe offend " of the ſame may doe my contry good, for the peace and quietnes of my contry men, keeping " B ITALY thereby from ſeeing ſuch another battell, as this hath bene. So when he had made this oration vnto them, and put thoſe by, that would haue diſſwaded him the contrary: he commaunded all the Senators and his friendes that were preſent, to auoyde. Then he wrote letters to them that were abſent, and alſo vnto the cities wherethrough they paſſed, to vſe them very curteouſly, and to ſee them ſafely conueyed. Then came his Nephewe Cocceius The Emperor Othoes words to his Nephew Cocceius.

to him, who was yet but a younge boye, and he did comfort him, and bad him not to be affrayd of Vitellius, for he had ſafely kept his mother, wife, and children, and had bene as care-full of them, as if they had bene his owne: and that he would not yet adopt him for his ſonne, though he was deſirous to doe it, vntill ſuch tyme as he ſawe the ende of this warre: to thend that if he ouercame, he ſhoulde quietly raigne Emperour with him: and if he were ouer-C come, that for adopting of him, he woulde not be cauſe of his death. But this one thinge onely, I commaunde and charge thee, my ſonne, euen as the laſt commaundement that I can giue thee: that thou doe not forget altogether, nether ouer much remember, that thyne Vncle hath bene Emperour. When he had tolde him this tale, he heard a noyſe at his dore: they were the ſouldiers that threatned the Senators which came from him, and woulde kill them, if they did not remayne with him, but would forſake their Emperour. Vpon this occaſion he came out once againe among them, being affrayd leaſt the ſouldiers would doe the Senators ſome hurt, and made the ſouldiers giue backe, not by intreating of them, nor ſpeaking curteouſly to them, but looking grymly on them, and in great rage: inſomuch that they all ſhroncke backe, and went away for feare. So when night came, he was a thirſt, and dranke D a litle water: and hauing two ſwordes, he was prouing a great while which had the beſt edge.
In the ende, he put by the one, and kept the other in his armes. Then he began to comfort his ſeruaunts, and liberally to giue out his money amonge them, to ſome more, to ſome leſſe, not prodigally throwing it away without diſcretion, as being another mans money: but diſcreete-ly gaue to euery man according to his deſert. Then after he had diſpatched them away, he laid Otho in his death, ſeemed to follow Cato Vticen.
him down to ſleepe al the reſt of the night, that the groomes of his chamber heard him ſnort, he ſlept ſo ſowndly. In the morning he called one of his infranchiſed bondmen, whom he had commaunded to helpe to ſaue the Senators, and ſent him to ſee if they were all ſafe, & gone.
So when he vnderſtoode that they were all gone, and that they had all they would: come on, ſaid he then vnto him, looke to thy ſelfe I reade thee, and take heede the ſouldiers ſee thee not, E if thou wilt ſcape with life, for ſure they will kill thee, thinking thou haſt holpen me to kill my ſelfe. So aſſoone as his infranchiſed bondman was gone out of his chamber, he toke his ſword Otho ſlue him ſelfe.
with both his hands, and ſetting the poynt of it to his breſt, he fell downe vpon it, ſeeming to feele no other payne, ſauing that he fetched a ſighe: whereby they that were without, knewe that he had done him ſelfe hurt. Thereuppon his friendes made ſtraight an outcry, and all the campe and citie was incontinently full of teares and lamentacion. The ſouldiers ſodainly ran with a great noyſe to his gates, where they bitterly bewayled, and lamented his death, falling out with them ſelues that they were ſuch Villaines ſo ſlenderly to haue garded their Emperour, that they kept him not from killing him ſelfe for their ſakes. So there was not a man of them that left his body, though the enemies were hard at hand: but hauing honorably bury- The funeralls of Otho the Emperour.
F ed him, and prepared a great ſtacke of wodde, they conueyed him armed to the fire of his funeralls, euery man thinking him ſelfe happy, that coulde firſt ſet his ſhoulders to the coffyn to helpe to cary him. Others comming to it, kneeled downe on their knees, and kiſſed his wound. Others tooke and kiſſed his handes. Others that could not come neare him, honored him, and did reuerence him a farre of, and ſome there were alſo that after the ſtacke of woode was ſet a fire, ſtue them ſelues hard by the fire: who had neuer receiued benefit by him that was dead, (at the leaſt to any mans knowledge) nether had they any occaſion to be affraid of him, that was Conqueror. And truely me thinkes, neuer king nor tyrant was ſo ambitiouſly giuen to raigne, as they vehemently deſired to be commaunded by Otho, and to obeye him: conſidering that their deſire left them not euen after his death, but was ſo liuely rooted in their mindes, that in the ende, it turned to a deadely hate vnto Vitellius. But of this we will ſpeake more hereafter in time and place. Now, when they had buried Othoes aſhes, they did ſet vp a tombe for him, nether for magnificence of building, nor for glorious epitaphe, ſubiect vnto enuy. For I haue ſeene his tombe in the citie of BRESSELLES, a meane thing, and the epitaph vpon it tranſlated out of Latine, ſayeth no more but this: This is the tombe of Marcus Otho. He dyed being but ſeuen and thirty yere olde, and was Emperor but three moneths: & there were as many famous men that commended his death, as they that reproued his life. For though he liued not much more honeſter then Nero, yet he dyed farre more honorably. Furthermore, when Pollio one of the Captaines would haue compelled his ſouldiers preſently to haue taken their othes to be true to Vitellius, they fell out with him: and vnderſtanding that there were yet remayning ſome Senators, they would not medle with them, but onely troubled Verginius Rufus. For they came to his dores armed, and called him by his name, & commaunded him to take charge of them, and to goe as Ambaſſador to intreate for them. Howbeit he thought it were but a fond part of him to take charge of them that were already ouercome, conſidering he refuſed it when they had ouercome: and alſo he was affraid to goe Ambaſſador to the GERMAINES, bicauſe he had compelled them to doe thinges againſt their willes. Therefore he went out at his backe dore, and ſaued him ſelfe. So when the ſouldiers heard of it they were at length contented to be brought to be ſworne vnto Vitellius, and ſo ioyned them ſelues with Cecinnaes ſouldiers, ſo they might be pardoned for all that was paſt.

THE LIVES OF ANNIBAL AND SCIPIO AFRICAN,

Translated into French by Charles de la Sluce, and englished by Thomas North.

Annibal.

IF we doe call to mind the first PVNICK warre the CARTHAGINIANS had with the ROMANES: we shall find many Captaines, who by the glorye of their noble deedes, haue left great fame and renowme vnto their posteritie. Howbeit amongest all the Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, none are found more worthy of fame, and so commended of all Greeke and Latine Authors, then Hamilcar, Annibals father, otherwise surnamed Barcha, a valliant man doubtles, and in his time a skilfull souldier as any was. The same Hamilcar first of all made warre with the ROMANES, a longer tyme in SICILIA then was looked for, who had done greate hurte to his contrye and common wealthe. After that also in the warres of AFRICK (at what tyme the mercenarye souldiers through their rebellion did put the contrye of CARTHAGE in greate daunger) he did so valliantly appease the insurrection: that to euery mans iudgement, he was reputed the onely preseruer of his contrye. Then he was sent Gouernor and Captaine into SPAYNE, and caryed with him at that tyme, (as it is reported) his sonne Annibal, beeing but a younge boye, where he did noble seruice. In fine, in the nynth yeare of his aboade there in that prouince, he dyed fighting vallyantly agaynste the VETHEONS. After his deathe, Hasdrubal his Sonne in lawe,

The parentage of Annibal.

(whom the CARTHAGINIANS through the ayde & friendſhip of the BARCINIAN faction had made generall of all their armye) remayned gouernor there the ſpace of eight yeares. This Haſdrubal ſent for Annibal into SPAYNE, after his father Hamilcars death, againſt the minds of the chiefe of the contrary faction, to thend that as he had bene trayned from his youth in the diſcipline of warres, in his father Hamilcars life: euen ſo in like manner, that now being come to mans ſtate, he ſhould the better harden his body, to away with the paines and daungers of the warres. Now although at the firſt, the remembraunce of his father was a great helpe vnto him to winne the loue and good will of the ſouldiers: Yet he him ſelfe afterwards, through his diligence and induſtrie ſo handled the matter, that the olde ſouldiers forgetting all other Captaines, they onely deſired to chooſe him (and none other) for their gouernor. For they found in him all the perfections that could be wiſhed for, in a noble Captaine or generall. He had a preſent and ready wit to giue counſell what was to be done, in moſt greateſt attempts: & beſides, he lacked nether manhood nor induſtry to put it in execution. He had a valiant and inuincible mind, euen in greateſt daungers and aduerſities of bodye: the which are wont to ſtaye others from performing their indeuors and duety. He would watche and warde as any priuate ſouldier, and was quicke and ready to doe any kind of ſeruice, either like a valiant ſouldier, or a good Captaine. In this ſort Annibal continued in ſeruice in the warres, the ſpace of three yeares, vnder the conduct of Haſdrubal. In that time he ſo wanne the hartes of all the army, that immediatly after Haſdrubals death, he was choſen to be Lieuetenant generall, with the common conſent of all the ſouldiers: & this honor was layed vpon him without contradiction of any of the CARTHAGINIANS, through the friendſhip and good will of the BARCINIAN faction. Annibal was now ſix and twenty yeare olde, when the ſouldiers made him their Lieuetenant generall. For at what time his father Hamilcar brought him into SPAYNE, he was then but nyne yeare olde: & from that time vnto Haſdrubals death (according to Polybius declaration) it was ſeuenteene yeares more. So he was no ſooner made Lieuetenant generall of all the campe, and his contry: but he bent him ſelfe to make warre with the ROMANES, hauing long before determined it. For firſt of all, he chiefly mainteyned almoſt a common hate of all the CARTHAGINIANS againſt the ROMANES, bicauſe of the loſſe of SICILIA and SARDINIA. Beſides alſo, he bare them a ſecret malice in nature, as a thing inheritable from his father Hamilcar: who, of all the Captaines the CARTHAGINIANS euer had, was the mortalleſt enemye vnto the ROMANES. And it is written alſo, that at what time Hamilcar made his preparation to goe into SPAYNE, he compelled Annibal being but a boy, to ſweare in a ſacrifice he made, that he would be a mortal enemy to the ROMANES, aſſoone as euer he came to the ſtate of a man. So, the remembrance of theſe things were ſtill freſh in the young mans minde, as the Idea (or image) of his fathers hate, and ſtill prouoked him to ſpie out all the meanes he could, how to deſtroy the Empire of ROME. Beſides alſo, the BARCINIAN factiō neuer left to prick him forward vnto it, bicauſe by wars he might raiſe him ſelf to greatnes, & ſo increaſe his eſtate. Theſe cauſes, aſwell common as perticuler, inticed Annibal to attempt warre againſt the ROMANES, and gaue the ſtowt young man occaſion by theſe meanes to practiſe innouation. There was a people at that time called the SAGVNTINES, who confyned indifferently betwixt the ROMANES and CARTHAGINIANS: and were left free by the former peace concluded. Theſe SAGVNTINES euer after tooke part with the ROMANES: and by meanes of the league that was made betwixt them, the ROMANES alwayes found them very true and faithfull to the Empire of ROME. Annibal therfore thought with him ſelf, he could not deuiſe to make a better match to anger the ROMANES withall, and to kindle the fire of his malice alſo againſt them: then to make warre with the SAGVNTINES, their confederats. Howbeit, before he would be openly ſeene to ſet vpon them, he firſt determined to leade his armye againſt the OLCADES, and other people on the other ſide of the riuer of Iberus: and after he had ouercomen them, then to finde occaſion to moleſt the SAGVNTINES, to make it appeare that the warre was rather begonne by them, then purpoſely intended by him. So after he had ouercome the OLCADES, he did ſet vpon the VACCEIANS, ſpoyled their contry, beſieged many cities, and tooke HERMANDICE, and ARBOCOLE, greate and riche cities. Nowe he had in manner ouercome all the whole contrye, when diuers fugitiues from the citie of HERMANDICE,

A one straight againſt another, conſpired againſt him, leuied men, and incited the Olcades that were next, to take the like part. Then they ſent to the Carpetanians their neighbours, that they would all agree ſodainly to ſet vpon him at his returne. They being a people that deſired nothing more then to fight, & conſidering all that they had receiued iniuries by Annibal, did eaſily harken vnto that counſell: and ſo ſet vpon him laying a great number of men, to the number of a hundred thouſand, they went to aſſaile Annibal at his returne from the Vaccheans, by the riuer of Tagus. Where the Carpetanians diſcouered their army, they ſtaied vpon it, & were maruelouſly afraid. And doubtles, they had had a great ouerthrow, if they had fought with thoſe ſo fierce people, being affraid of their ſodaine coming, & alſo loden as they were with ſo great ſpoyles: the which Annibal deeply conſidering, like a wiſe

Then the next day following, he paſſed his army ouer the riuer with as little noiſe as he could, leauing the paſſage where the enemies might eaſilieſt come ouer, vnguarded: becauſe vnder pretence of diſſembled feare, he might inuite the barbarous people to paſſe ouer the riuer, to take the opportunitie & occaſion offred them. Now in deede as he was the doubtelleſt captaine, & had the fineſt ſtratagemes of any other captaine of his time: ſo his policy was not in vaine, and his purpoſe to good effect, in abuſing of the enemy. For the wild barbarous people repoſing too great truſt in the multitude of their men, ſuppoſing the Carthaginians had ben affraid, with great fury entred the riuer to paſſe it ouer. So they being greatly troubled, & out of order by this meanes, & ſpecially before they could paſſe all ouer the riuer, they were let vp-

After this victory, all the people inhabiting about the riuer of Iberus, yelded themſelues vnto him, ſuing the Sagontines: who, though they ſaw Annibal at hand comming towards them, yet truſting to the friendſhip of the Romanes, they prepared to defend themſelues againſt him: and therewithall ſent Ambaſſadors preſently to Rome, to ſhew the Senate in what great daunger they were, & alſo to pray aide againſt ſo great enemye, that made warres ſo hotely with them. The Ambaſſadors that were ſent to Rome, were ſcant gone out of Spayne, when Annibal made open warre on them, with all his army, & pitched his campe before the citie of Sa-

Valerius Flaccus*, & Quintus Bebius Pamphilus vnto Annibal, to will him to raiſe his ſeege from Saguntus: & if they found he would not harken to them, that then they ſhould thence repaire to Carthage, & to pray them to deliuer their generall Annibal vnto them, becauſe he had broken the peace. Polybius writeth, that Annibal did heare theſe Ambaſſadors, howbeit that he made them a ſlender anſwer. Liuius writeth in contrary manner, that they were neuer heard, nor came at any time to his campe. Howbeit they both agree thus far, that they came into Spayne, & afterwards went into Affrike, & from thence came to Carthage: where after they had deliuered their meſſage vnto the counſel, the Barcinian faction were ſo much againſt them, that they diſhonorably returned to Rome, & obtained not their deſire. Now, in Two contrary factions in the Senate of Carthage: the Barcinians, & Hannians.

E the Senate of Carthage, there were two contrary parts & factions: of the which, the firſt tooke his beginning from the gouernment of Hamilcar, ſurnamed Barcha, & ſo diſcended as it were by ſucceſſion to his ſonne Annibal, & grew afterwards vnto ſuch greatnes, that that faction (aſwel abroad, as at home) ruled all matters iudiciall. The ſecond faction came of Hanno, a graue man, & of great authoritie in the ſame common wealth: howbeit a man more giuen to embrace peace & quietnes, then otherwiſe diſpoſed to warre & trouble. It is he onely (as it is reported) who at that time when the Ambaſſadors of the Romanes came to Carthage, to complaine of the iniuries done to their confederats: that did then in manner againſt the will of all the whole Senate, counſell them to keepe peace with the Romanes, and to beware of warres, the which one day might peraduenture vtterly deſtroy their contry. Doubt-

F les, if the Carthaginians would haue followed the graue counſell of Hanno, rather then to haue giuen place to their deſires, and had followed the Author of peace, and not to haue bene ruled by them that gaue counſell to make warres: they hadde not taſted of all:

those miseries which their contry afterwards came vnto. But giuing place to the furie & ambitious mind of a young man, they heaped such misfortunes on their heads, as afterwards fell out vpon them. Therefore it is very meete for wise Magistrats & gouernours of cõmon weales, alwaies rather to haue an eye to the beginning of any matters, then to the ende: & ether to decyde all matters by aduise & counsel, before they should take any warre in hand. Now the SAGVNTINES seing themselues beseeged by Annibal, & that against all reason & equitie he made warres vpon them: they notwithstanding valiantly defended the seege, many monethes together. Yet in fine, though Annibal had many more men then they (hauing a hundred & fifty thowsand men in his campe) & that the most part of their rampars were battered & ouerthrowen: they liked rather to abide the sack of their citye, then to yeld themselues to the mercy of their mortall enemie. So some doe report, that SAGVNTVS was taken the eight moneth after seege was layed vnto it: But Liuie seemeth not to agree to that, nether to set downe any certen time of the continuance of the seege. Nowe, the taking of this so wealthie a citie, was a great furtherance diuers wayes to Annibals enterprises. For many cities taking example of the sacke of SAGVNTVS, who before misliking to be subiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, were ready to rebell: they kept themselues quiet, and the souldiers also waxed lusty and coragious, seeing the rich spoyles that were deuided in the campe. So Annibal sent great presents of the spoiles of the SAGVNTINES vnto CARTHAGE, whereby he wanne the chiefest men of the citie, and made them like the better of warres: whome he determined to leade with him against the ROMANES, not in SPAYNE, as many suppose, but into ITALY it selfe. Whilest these matters were in hande, the Ambassadors returned from CARTHAGE to ROME, and declared in open Senate, the slender answer they had receiued, in manner at the selfesame time when they had intelligence of the sacke of SAGVNTVS. Hereuppon the ROMANES greatly repented them selues, (though somewhat too late) for that they ayded not their friendes and confederats in so great a daunger. Therefore all the Senate and people together, being very sory for it, and therewith also maruelously offended, they deuided the prouinces vnto the Consuls, to wete: SPAYNE vnto Publius Cornelius, and AFRICK and SICILIA also vnto Titus Sempronius. Afterwards, certen of the noblest men of the citie were sent ambassadors vnto CARTHAGE, to make their complaints in open Senate for breache of the peace, and also to denownce vnto them the cause of the warre to come, and therewith boldly to proclaime open warre against them, after they had declared the occasion thereof to come of them selues. This was as brauely receiued of the CARTHAGINIANS, as lustely offred vnto them: but therein they were not so wel aduised, as the successe of that warre in the ende sufficiently proued it to them. Now Annibal being aduertised how things were concluded in the Senate at CARTHAGE, and thinking with him selfe that it was time to goe into ITALY, as he had determined from the beginning: he made all the possible speede he could to prepare his shippes and things ready, and so required ayde of the cities that were his best friends and confederats, and commaunded that all the bands should meete him at newe CARTHAGE. So when he came to GADES, he appoynted good garrisons in places most conuenient, in AFRICK and SPAYNE, which he thought aboue all things els to be most necessary: bicause that when he should goe into ITALY, the ROMANES should not winne it from him. Therefore he sent into AFRICK, twelue hundred horsemen, & thirteene thowsand footemen, all SPANYARDS: and besides, he brought out of diuers parts of AFRICK foure thowsand souldiers, and placed them in garrison in CARTHAGE, obteyning both hostages and souldiers by this meanes. So he left the gouernment of SPAYNE to his brother Hasdrubal, and gaue him an army of fiftye shippes of warre, two thowsand horsemen, and twelue thowsand footemen. These were the garrisons he left in both these prouinces. Nowe he thought them not sufficient to withstande the power of the ROMANES, if they bent their warres into SPAYNE, or AFRICK: but bicause he thought them stronge inough to stay the enemy from ouerrunning of the contry, vntill that hauing brought his armye by land, he had set foote in ITALY. Moreouer, he knewe that the CARTHAGINIANS were stronge inough to leady a new army if they lysted, and if neede so required, to send him ayde also into ITALY. For, after that they had driuen away this so daungerous a warre, procured against them through the spight of the mercenary souldiers, hauing euer after obteined victorie first vnder

A the conduct of Hamilcar: secondly, vnder Hasdruball: and lastlie, vnder Annibal: they were growen to such greatnes & strength, that at what time Annibal came into ITALIE, their Empire & dominions were maruelously enlarged. For they had all the coast of AFFRICKE, which lyeth ouer against the sea Mediterraneum, from the aulters of the Philenians, which be not farre from the great Syrte, vnto Hercules pillers: and conteineth in length two thowsande paces. So, after they had passed the straight which deuideth AFFRICKE from EVROPE, they possessed almost all SPAYNE, to the mountaines Pyrenei, which doe deuide SPAYNE from GAVLE. Thus order being taken for all things in AFFRICKE, and SPAYNE: Annibal returned againe to new CARTHAGE, where his armie was readie for him, and well appointed. So, meaning to delay time no longer, he called his men together, and incoraging them with great and

B large promises, he greatly commended the commodities of ITALIE: & made great accompt vnto them of the frendshippe of the GAVLES, and in the end he bad them be of good corage, and set lustely forward. Thereuppon, the next day following he departed from CARTHAGE, and brought his armie all alongest the coast, vnto the riuer of Iberus. It is reported, that the next night following, Annibal dreamed he saw a young man, of a maruelous terrible looke & stature, who bad him follow him into ITALIE: but afterwards, that he saw a snake of a wonderful greatnes, making a maruelous noyse: & being desirous to vnderstand what the same might signifie, it was told him that it betokened the destruction of ITALIE. It is not to be maruelled at, though the great care & thought he tooke in the day time for the warre of ITALIE, made his mind to run of such fansies in the night, as dreaming of victory or destructiō, or such other

C calamities of warre. For they are things that happen often, as Cicero the Orator saith: that our thoughts & words do beget such things in our dreame, as Ennius the Poet wryteth of Homer: to wit, like to those his minde most ran on, or that he talked of most. Now, after Annibal had passed ouer the mountaines Pirenei, and that he had also won the GAVLES harts with bountifull gifts: in few dayes he came to the riuer of Rhone. The head of the riuer of Rhone, is not farre from the heades of the riuers of the Rhein and Danuby, and running eight hundred furlongs, it falleth into Lacus Lemanus at GENEVA. Then it runneth from thence towardes the West, and deuideth the GAVLES a pretie way: and then being increased by the riuer of Arar (called in French, Saone) and with other riuers in the ende it falleth into the sea with diuers heades, betwext the VOLCES, and the CAVARIANS. The VOLCES, at that time inhabited

D both the sides of the riuer of Rhone, and were full of people, and the richest of all the other GAVLES. They hauing vnderstanding of Annibals comming, passed ouer the riuer, and armed them selues, & prepared on the other side to stoppe the CARTHAGINIANS, that they should not passe ouer. Now, though Annibal had wonne all the other GAVLES, yet those he coulde neuer winne neither by gifts, nor threats, to cause them rather to proue the frendship of the CARTHAGINIANS, then their force. Therefore Annibal perceiuing he was to handle such enemies rather by policy, he commaunded Hanno the sonne of Bomilcar, secretly to passe ouer the riuer of Rhone, with parte of the armie, and so to set vpon the GAVLES on the sodaine. Thereupon Hanno as he was commaunded, made a long iorney, and hauing passed ouer the riuer at passable fords: he shewed him selfe hard by the enemies campe, before they saw him,

E or that they knewe what it was. The GAVLES hearing their showtes and cries behinde them, and hauing their handes full of Annibal before them, who had many botes ready to passe ouer his men: they hauing no leasure to consult of the matter, neither to arme them selues to stande to defense, left their campe, and fled for life. So they being driuen from the other side of the riuer, the rest of the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS passed ouer it with safetie. In the meane time, P. Cornelius Scipio, that but a litle before was comen vnto MASSILIA, still heard newes of Annibals armie. Wherefore, to be more assured of the matter, he sent a bande of choyce horsemen to discouer what the enemies intent was: who making great speede as they were commaunded, met by chaunce with fiue hūdred horsemen of the NVMIDIANS, whom Annibal had also sent to bring him word of the ROMANES armie. So, they first sodainly gaue

F charge vpon the NVMIDIANS, and after a hotte and valliant conflict betwene both the parties, in the end the ROMANES ouercomming them, they made them flie, but with great losse of their men: howbeit the greatest losse and slaughter fell vpon the enemies. So Annibal by this meanes founde where the ROMANES lay, and stoode in a great doute with him selfe, whither he shoulde keepe on his way into ITALIE, or else lead his armie against the Consul that then was, and so to proue his happe & successe. At length, debating many wayes in his mind, and vncertaine which way he would determine: the Ambassadors of the BOIANS perswaded him to leaue all other deuises, and to goe on into ITALIE. For before that Annibal had passed ouer the mountaines Pirenei, the BOIANS hauing by craft taken the ROMANES Ambassadors, and done great mischiefe vnto Manlius the Praetor, and intised the INSVBRIANS also: they were reuolted from the ROMANES, and tooke parte with Annibal, and onely bicause the ROMANES had replenished the cities of PLACENTIA, and CREMONA with people, and had made them Colonies to ROME. So Annibal being ruled by their counsell, raised his campe, and keping the riuers side, still going against the ruen in few dayes he came to the place which the GAVLES doe call the Iland, the which the riuer of Arar and Rhodanus comming from diuers mountaines doe make there. So at this present, there is the famous citie of LION in GAVLE, which they say was built long time after, by Plancus Munatius. From thence he came to the contrie of the ALLOBROGES, and hauing pacified the variance betwext two brethren for the realme, he came through the contrie of the CASTENIANS and VOCONTIANS, to the riuer of Durance. The head of this riuer commeth from the Alpes, and from thence running with a swift streame, falleth into the riuer of Rhone: & as it oftentimes chaungeth her course, so hath it in manner no passable forde. Yet Annibal hauing past it ouer, he led his armie vnto the Alpes, through open and plaine contries, as farre as he coulde: howebeit as he passed through them, he had great losses, as it is reported. Insomuche that some which were liuing at that time, did affirme, that they heard Annibal him selfe say, that he had lost aboue thirtie thowsand men, and the most parte of his horsemen. For he was forced not only to fight with the inhabitants of the mountaines, but also compelled to make wayes through the straights: so that in certaine places of the highest rockes, he was driuen to make passages through, by force of fire and vineger. So when he had passed the Alpes in fifteene dayes space, he came downe into the valley, not farre from the citie of TVRINE. Whereby it seemeth to me, that he passed ouer the mountaine they commonly called Genua, the which on the one side of it hath the riuer of Druentia, and on the other side it goeth downe to the city of TVRINE. Now it is hard to say truly, what number of men he had when he was comen into ITALIE: bicause of mens diuersities of opinions. For some wryte, that he had a hundred thowsand footemen, and twentie thowsand horsemen: others also write, that he had twentie thowsand footemen, and sixe thowsand horsemen, all AFRIKANS and SPANYARDES. But others, reckoning the GAVLES and LIGVRIAS, doe count foure score thowsande footemen, and renne thowsande horsemen. Yet it is not credible, that his armie was so great, as the first men report, and specially hauing passed through so many contries, and also receiued such losse as he had: neither also could his number be so small, as the second reporters doe make it, if a man will consider the famous exploytes and great enterprises he did afterwardes. So that I like their opinions best, which keepe the meane betwene them both: considering that he brought into ITALIE, the better parte of foure score thowsand footemen, and renne thowsand horsemen, the which he had leauied in SPAYNE: as it is manifestly knowen also, that a great number of the LIGVRIANS and GAVLES came to ioyne with him, for the great malice they bare vnto the ROMANES, that gaue no place nor grounde vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. So Annibal being comen from TVRINE, into the contrie of the INSVBRIANS: he was met withall by Publius Cornelius Scipio, who marching with wonderfull speede from MASSILIA, and hauing passed the riuers of Po and Tesin, he camped not farre from the enemie. So shortly after, both the Generalls being comen into the field to view eche others campe, the horsemen of either side grew to skirmish, which continued long, and was not to be discerned which of them had the better. Howbeit in the end, the ROMANES seeing the Consul hurt, and also that the horsemen of the NVMIDIANS, by litle and litle came to compasse them in: they were driuen to geue ground, and so pretily retyred, defending the Consul the best they could to saue him, and so at length recouered their campe. It is reported that Publius Cornelius Scipio, was saued at that time through his sonnes helpe, who afterwardes was called AFRICAN, and at that time was

A but a young ſtripling: whoſe praiſe though it was wonderfull in ſo greene a youth, yet is it likelie to be true, bicauſe of the famous and valliant actes he did afterwardes. Nowe Scipio hauing proued how much his enemie was ſtronger then him ſelfe in horſemen: he determined to place his campe ſo, as his footemen might be in beſt ſafety, & alſo fight with greateſt aduantage. And therefore the next night following he paſſed the riuer of Po, and made as litle noyſe as he coulde, and went vnto PLACENTIA. The like ſhortlie after did T. Sempronius Longus, who had bene reſtored from baniſhment by the Senate, and ſent for out of SICILIA: bicauſe both the Conſuls ſhould gouerne the common wealth by one ſelfe authoritie. Annibal alſo followed them both with all his armie, and pitched his campe neere vnto the riuer of Trebia: hoping that bicauſe both campes lay ſo neere together, ſome occaſion would be of-

B fred to fight, the which he chiefly deſired, both bicauſe he coulde not long maintaine warre for lacke of vittells, as alſo that he miſtruſted the fickelnes of the GAVLES. Who, like as they ſoone fell in league and frendſhip with him, drawen vnto it with hope of chaunge, and with the fame alſo of his victorie obtained: ſo he miſtruſted that vpon any light occaſion (as if the warre ſhould continue any long time in their contrie) they would turne all the hate they bare vnto the ROMANES, againſt him, as the only author of this warre. For theſe reſpectes therefore, he deuiſed all the meanes he could to come to battell. In the meane time, Sempronius the other Conſul, met with a troupe of the enemies, loden with ſpoyle, ſtragling vp and downe the fieldes, whom he charged, and put to flight. So imagining the like ſucceſſe of all the battell, by this good fortune he had met withall: he had good hope of victorie, if once both the

C armies might come to fight. Therefore being maruelous deſirous to doe ſome noble enterpriſe before Scipio were recouered of his hurt, and that the new Conſul ſhould be choſen: he determined to ioyne battell againſt the will of his other colleague and fellowe Conſul Scipio, who thought nothing could be to leſſe purpoſe, then to put all the ſtate and common wealth in ieopardie, ſpeciallie hauing all the whole GAVLES in maner in the field againſt him. Now, Annibal had ſecret intelligence of all this variance, by ſpialls he had ſent into the enemies campe. Wherefore, he being politike and ſuttle as he was, found out a place ſtraight betwene both campes, couered ouer with buſhes and briers, and there he placed his brother Mago to lye in ambuſh, with a companie of choſen men. Then he commaunded the horſemen of the NVMIDIANS, to ſcurrie to the trenches of the ROMANES, to intiſe him to come to battell: and

D thereupon made the reſidue of his armie to eate, and ſo put them in verie good order of battell, to be readie vpon any occaſion offered. Now the Conſul Sempronius, at the firſt tumult of the NVMIDIANS, ſodainly ſent his horſemen to encounter them, and after them put out ſix thowſande footemen, and in the ende, came him ſelfe out of his campe with all his armie. It was then in the middeſt of winter, and extreame cold, and ſpeciallie in the places incloſed about the Alpes, and the mountaine Appenine. Nowe the NVMIDIANS as they were commaunded, intiſed the ROMANES by litle and litle on this ſide the riuer of Trebia, vntill they came to the place where they might diſcerne their enſignes: and then they ſodainlie turned vpon the enemies which were out of order. For it is the manner of the NVMIDIANS, often-times to flie of ſet purpoſe, and then to ſtay vpon the ſodaine when they ſee time, to charge

E their enemie more hottely and fiercely then before. Whereuppon Sempronius incontinently gathered his horſemen togither, and did ſet his men in battell ray, as time required, to geue charge vpon his enemie, that ſtayed for him in order of battell. For Annibal had caſt his men into ſquadrons, readie vpon any occaſion. The skirmiſh beganne firſt by the light horſemen, & afterwards increaſed hotter by ſupplie of the men of armes: howbeit the ROMANE Knights being vnable to beare the ſhocke of the enemies, they were quickelie broken. So that the legions maintained the battell with ſuch furie & noble corage, that they had bene able to haue reſiſted, ſo they had fought but with footemen onely. But on the one ſide, the horſemen and Elephants made them affraied, and on the other ſide the footemen followed them verie luſtely, and fought with great furie againſt famiſhed and frozen men. Wherefore the ROMANES

F notwithſtanding, ſuffring all the miſeries that vexed them on euerie ſide, with an vnſpeakable corage and magnanimitie, ſuch as was aboue their force and ſtrength, they fought ſtill, vntill that Mago comming out of his ambuſh, came and ſodainly aſſailed them with great ſhowtes on also: for he lost a great number of his men, and the most parte of all his Elephantes were slaine. After this battell, Annibal ouercame all the contrie, and did put all to fire and sworde, and tooke also certaine townes: and with a few of his men made a great number of the con-trie men flie, that were disorderlie gathered together in battell. Then at the beginning of the spring, he brought his army into the field sooner then time required: & meaning to goe into B THVSCAN, he was driuen backe by a great tempest at the verie toppe of the height of the Ap-penine, and so compelled to bring his armie about PLACENTIA: howbeit shortly after he put himselfe againe into the fields for diuers vrgent & necessary causes. For had he not saued him selfe by that policie, he had almost bene taken tardie by the ambush of the GAVLES: who being angry with him that the warre continued so long in their contry, they sought to be reuen-ged of him, as the only author & occasion of the warre. Therefore perceiuing it was time for him to auoyde this daunger, he made all the hast he could to leade his armie into some other prouince. Furthermore, he thought it would increase his estimacion much amõg straũgers, & also greatly encorage his owne people, if he could make the power of the CARTHAGINIANS to seeme so great, & also their Captaine to be of so noble a corage, as to dare to make warre so C neere to the citie of ROME. All things therefore set a part, he marched with his campe by the hasty man of nature, & one whom the people had brought to that dignity & office: so that he was become so prowde & insolent that men might see he would hazard all things without wit or iudgement. Annibal hauing intelligence hereof, thought it the best way to anger the Consul, & to do what he could possible to allure him into the field, before his fellow Consul should come to ioyne with him. Therfore, he marching forward with his campe through the contry & fall into the enemies ambush, & oftentimes do put all in hazard, bicause they will follow no destroyed and cut downe, and the houses burnt: he made great hast to lead his armie against the enemie, contrarie to all mens minds, who would haue had him taried for his companion Cn. Seruilius the other Consul. So euen at sunne set, when he was come to the straightes of F rie with the long iorney they had taken by the way. So the next morning by breake of day, making

A making no view of the contrie, he went ouer the mountaines. Then Annibal who long before was prepared for this, did but ſtay for the oportunitie to worke his feate: when he ſaw the ROMANES come into the plaine, he gaue a ſignall vnto all his men to geue charge vpon the enemie. Thereuppon the CARTHAGINIANS breaking out on euerie ſide, came before and behinde, and on the flanckes to aſſaile the enemie, being ſhut in betwene the lake and the mountaines. Now in contrarie maner, the ROMANES beginning to fight out of order, they fought incloſed together, that they could not ſee one an other, as if it had bene darke: ſo that it is to be wondered at, how, and with what minde they fought it out ſo long, conſidering they were compaſſed in on euerie ſide. For they fought it out aboue three howres ſpace, with ſuch fury and corage, that they heard not the terrible earthquake that was at that preſent time, neither B did they offer to flie or ſtirre a foote: vntil they heard that the Conſul C. Flaminius going from rancke to rancke to encourage his men, was ſlaine by a man of armes called Ducarius. Then when they had loſt their Generall, and being voyde of all hope: they fled, ſome towardes the mountaines, and others towards the lake, of the which diuers of them flying, were ouertaken & ſlaine. So there were ſlaine * fifteene thowſand in the field, & there ſcaped about ten thowſand. Furthermore the report went, that there were ſix thowſande footemen which forciblie (at the beginning of the battell) got to the mountaine, and there ſtayed on a hill till the battell was ended, and at length came downe vpon Annibals promiſe: but they were betrayed, and ſlaine, euery mothers ſonne of them. After this great victorie, Annibal did let diuers ITALIAN priſoners goe free without raunſome paying, after he had vſed them maruelous curteouſlie: C bicauſe that the fame of his clemencie & curteſie ſhould be knowen vnto all nations, whereas in deede his owne nature was contrarie to all vertues. For he was haſtie and cruell of nature, and from his youth was brought vp in warres, and exerciſed in murther, treaſon, & ambuſhes layed for enemies: and neuer cared for law, order, nor ciuill gouernment. So by this meanes he became one of the cruelleſt Captaines, the moſt ſuttell, and craftieſt to deceiue and intrap his enemie, that euer was. For as he was alway prying to beguile the enemie: ſo thoſe whom he could not ouercome in warre by plaine force, he went about to intrappe by ſlight and policie. The which appeareth true by this preſent battell, and alſo by the other he fought againſt the Conſul Sempronius, by the riuer of Trebia. But let vs returne to our matter, and leaue this talke till an other time. Now when the newes of the ouerthrow and death of the Conſul Fla- D minius was reported at ROME, hauing loſt the moſt parte of his armie: there was great mone and lamentation made through all the citie of ROME. Some bewailing the common miſerie of the common wealth, others lamenting their priuate particular loſſe, & ſome alſo ſorowing for both together. But in deede it was a woefull ſight, to ſee a world of men & women to run to the gates of the citie, euerie one priuatly asking for their kinne and frends. Some do write, that there were two women, who being very ſorie and penſiſe, diſpairing of the ſafetie of their ſonnes, dyed ſodainly for the extreame ioy they had, when beyond their expectacion & hope they ſawe their ſonnes aliue and ſafe. At the ſelfe ſame time, Cn. Seruilius, the other Conſul with C. Flaminius, did ſend him foure thowſand horſemen, not vnderſtanding yet of the battell that was fought by the lake of Thraſymene. But when they heard of the ouerthrowe of E their men by the way, and therefore thought to haue fled into VMBRIA: they were compaſſed in by the horſemen of the enemies, and ſo brought vnto Annibal. Nowe the Empire of ROME being brought into ſo great extreamitie and daunger, bicauſe of ſo many ſmall loſſes one in the necke of an other: it was ordeined, that an extraordinarie Gouernor or Magiſtrate ſhould be choſen, who ſhould be created Dictator: an office ſpecially vſed to be reſerued for the laſt hope and remedie, in moſt extreame daunger and perill, of the ſtate and common wealth. But bicauſe the Conſul Seruilius could not returne at that time to ROME, all the waies being kept by the enemie: the people contrarie to their cuſtome, created Q. Fabius Dictator, (who afterwards attained the ſurname of Maximus, to ſay, verie great) who likewiſe did name M. Minutius Generall of the horſemen. Now this Fabius was a graue and wiſe counſeller, and F of great authoritie and eſtimacion in the common wealth: inſomuche as the citizens had all their hope and confidence in him onely, perſwading them ſelues, that the honor of ROME might be better preſerued vnder the gouernment and conduct of ſuch a Generall, rather then

The office of Dictator, of what effect.

vnder the gouernment of any other man whatſoeuer. So Fabius knowing it very well, after he had carefullie and diligentlie geuen order for all thinges neceſſarie: he departed from Rome, and when he had receiued the armie of the late Conſul Cn. Seruilius, he added vnto them two other legions, and ſo went vnto the enemie. Nowe Annibal was gone from the lake of Thraſymene, and went directly towardes the citie of Spoletvm, to ſee if he could take it at the firſt aſſault. But when he ſaw that the townes men ſtoode vpon the rampers of the walls, and valliantlie defended them ſelues: he then left the towne, and deſtroyed the contrie as he went, and burnt houſes and villages, and ſo went into Apvlia, through the marches of Ancona, and the contries of the Marsians and Pelignians. The Dictator followed him at the heeles, and camped hard by the citie of Arpy, not farre from the campe of the enemie, to thend to drawe out the warre at length. For the raſhneſſe and foolehardines of the former Captaines affore time, had brought the ſtate of Rome into ſuch miſerie: that they thought it a victorie vnto them, not to be ouercome by the enemie, that had ſo often ouercome them. Whereby all thinges were turned ſtraight with the chaunge and alteracion of the Captaine. For, though Annibal had ſet his men in battell ray, and afterwardes perceiuing his enemie ſturred not, went and deſtroyed the contrie, hoping thereby to intiſe the Dictator to fight, when he ſhould ſee the contrie of his confederates ſo ſpoyled, as it was before his face: the Dictator, this notwithſtanding, was not moued withall, but ſtill kept his men cloſe together, as if the matter had not concerned him. Annibal was in a maruelous rage with the delay of the Dictator, and therefore often remoued his campe, to the ende that going diuers wayes, ſome occaſion or oportunitie might fall out to deceiue the enemie, or elſe to geue battell. So when he had paſſed the mountaine Appenine, he came vnto Samnivm. But bicauſe ſhortlie after, ſome of Campania, who hauing bene taken priſoners by the lake of Thraſymene, had bene ſet at libertie without raunſome: they putting him in hope that he might take the citie of Capva, he made his armie march forward, and tooke a guide that knew the contrie, to bring him vnto Casinvm. Nowe the guide ouerhearing Casinvm, vnderſtoode it Casilinvm, & ſo miſtaking the ſound of the word, brought the armie a cleane contrary way vnto Calentinvm, and Calenvm, and from thence about Stella. So when they came into a contry enuironned about with mountaines and riuers, Annibal knew ſtraight they had miſtaken their way, and ſo did cruelly put the guide to death. Fabius the Dictator, did in the meane time beare all this pacientlie, and was contented to geue Annibal libertie to take his pleaſure which way he woulde: vntill he had gotten the mountaines of Gallicanum, and Caſilinum, where he placed his garriſon, being places of great aduantage and commodity. So the armie of the Carthaginians was in manner compaſſed in euery way, and they muſt needes haue dyed for famine in that place, or elſe haue fled, to their great ſhame and diſhonor: had not Annibal by this ſtratageame preuented the daunger. Who knowing the daunger all his armie ſtoode in, and hauing ſpied a fit time for it: he commaunded his ſouldiers to bring forth two thowſand oxen which they had gotten in ſpoyle in the fields, hauing great ſtore of them, and then tying torches or fire linckes vnto their hornes, he appointed the nimbleſt men he had to light them, and to driue the oxen vp the hill to the toppe of the mountaines, at the reliefe of the firſt watche. All this was duely executed according to his commaundement, and the oxen running vp to the toppe of the mountaines with the torches burning, the whole armie marched after them fayer and ſoftly. Now the Romanes that had long before placed a ſtrong garriſon vpon the mountaines, they were affrayed of this ſtraunge ſight, and miſtruſting ſome ambuſhe, they ſoorthwith forſooke their peeces and holdes. Fabius him ſelfe miſtruſting alſo that it was ſome ſtratageame of the enemie, kept his men within the campe, and coulde not well tell what to ſay to it. In the meane time, Annibal got ouer the mountaine, not farre from the bathes of Sweſſa, which the contrie men doe call the tower of the bathes, and brought all his armie ſafe into Alba: and ſhortlie after, he marched directlie as though he woulde goe to Rome, howbeit he ſodainlie turned out of the way, and went preſentlie into Apvlia. There he tooke the citie of Glerenvm, a verie riche and wealthie towne, where he determined to winter. The Dictator followed him harde, and came and camped by Lavrinvm, not farre from the Carthaginians campe. So he being ſent for to Rome about waightie affaires affeires of the state, there was no remedy but he must needes depart thence with all the speede he coulde: howbeit before he went, he left Atarcus Nathan his Generall of the horsemen, his Lieutenaunt of all the armie, and commaunded him in his absence not once to fight, nor meddle with the enemie. For he was fullie bent to follow his first determination, which was not to vexe the enemy, nor to fight with him, though he were prouoked to it. How beit M. Minutius litle regarding the Dictators commaundement, his backe was no sooner turned, but he set vpon a companie of the enemies dispersed in the fielde a forraging, and slue a great number of them: and fought with the rest, euen into their campe. The rumor of this skirmish flew straight to Rome, and there was such great accompt made of it, that it was esteemed for a victorie: and the common people were so ioyfull of it, that they straight made the power of the Lieutenant, equall with the Dictator Fabius: the which was neuer heard of before. Fabius patiently bearing this extreame iniurie with a noble courage, hauing no way deserued it, he returned againe vnto the campe. Thus there were two Dictators at one selfe time (a thing neuer seene nor heard of before) who after they had deuided the army betweene them, either of them commaunded his army a parte, as the Consuls were wont to doe before. Minutius thereupon grew to such a pride and hawtie mind, that one day he ventred to geue battell, and made not his companion Fabius counsell withall: the which Annibal hauing so often ouercome, durst scantly haue enterprised. So he led his army into such a place, where the enemie had compassed them in: insomuche that Annibal slue them at his pleasure, without any hope left them to escape, if Fabius had not comen in time (as he did) to aide them, rather respecting the honor of his contrie, then remembring the priuate iniurie he had receiued. For he comming fresh with his armie to the battell, made Annibal affrayed, that the Romaine legions had libertie to retire with safetie. Whereby Fabius wanne great fame for his wilfedome and valliantnesse, both of his owne souldiers, as also of the enemies themselues. For it was reported that Annibal should say, returning into his campe: that in this battell he had ouercomen M. Minutius, but withall, that he was also ouercomen by Fabius. And Minutius selfe also confessing Fabius wisedom, & considering that (according to Hesiodus saying) it was good reason to obey a better man then him selfe: he came with all his armie vnto Fabius campe, & renouncing his authotity, came and humbly saluted Fabius as his father, and all that day there was great ioy, and reioycing among the souldiers. So both the armies being placed in garison for the winter time, after great contention about it, at length there were two newe Consuls created: L. Paulus AEmylius, and C. Terentius Varro, one that of a meane man (through the fauour of the common people) was brought to be Consul. So they had libertie and commission to leauie a greater armie then the Generalls before them had done. Whereby the legions were newly supplied, and also others added vnto them, more then were before. Now when the Consuls were come into the armie, as they were of seuerall dispositions, so did they also obserue diuers manners in their gouernment. Lucius Paulus, who was a wise graue man, and one that purposed to followe Fabius counsell and facions: he did desire to draue out the warre in length, and to stay the enemie without fighting. Varro on the other side was a hastie man, and venturous, and desired nothinge but to fight. So it chaunced, that not longe after it was knowen, to the great cost and daunger of the citie of Rome, what difference there was betwext the modestie of AEmilius, and the foolehardinesse of Varro. For Annibal beinge affrayed of some sturre and tumult in his campe for lacke of victuells, he departed from Gerrenvm, and goinge into the warmest places of Apvlia, came and camped with all his armie, by a village called Cannes. So he was followed with both the Consulls, who came and camped seuerallie harde by him, but so neere one to an other, that there was but the riuer of Aufide that parted them. This riuer as it is reported, doth alone deuide the mowntayne of the Appenine, and taketh his heade on that side of the mountayne that lyeth to the sea side, from whence it runneth to the sea Adriaticum. Nowe, Lucius Paulus findinge that it was impossible for Annibal beinge in a straunge countrey to mayntayne so greate an armie of suche sundrie nations together: he was fullie bent to tracte time, and to auoyde battell, perswadinge him selfe that it was the right and onelie way to ouercome him, being as muche to the enemies disaduantage,

as also maruelous profitable and beneficiall for the common wealth. And sure if C. Terentius Varro, had caried that minde, it had bene out of all doubt, that Annibals armie had bene ouerthrowen by the ROMANES, without stroke striking. Howbeit he had suche a light head of his owne, and was so fickle minded, that he neither regarded wise counsell, nor Paulus AEmylius authoritie: but in contrarie manner would fall out with him, and also complaine of him before the souldiers, for that he kept his men penne vp, and idle, whilest the enemie did put forth his men to the field in battell ray. So when his turne came, that he was absolute to commaunde the whole armie, (for they both had absolute power by turnes) he passed ouer the riuer of Aufide by breake of day, and gaue the signall of battell without the priuitie of his companion AEmylius, who rather followed him against his will, then willinglie, because he could doe none otherwise. So he caused a skarlet coate of armes to be put out verie early in the morning, for signall of battell. Annibal on the other side as glad of it as might be possible, (that he had occasion offered him to fight, (considering that the continuall delaying of battell did alter all his purpose) he passed his armie ouer the riuer, and had straight put them in verie good order. For he had taken great spoyles of his enemies to furnish him selfe verie brauelie. Now the armie of the ROMANES stoode Southward, insomuche that the South winde (which the men of the contrie call Vulturnus) blewe full in their faces: whereas the enemies in contrarie manner had the vauntage of the winde and Sunne vpon their backes, and their battell stoode in this manner. The AFRIKANS were placed in both the winges, (and the GAVLES and SPANIARDES set in squadron in the middest. The light horsemen first beganne the skirmishe, and after them followed the men of armes: and bicause the space betweene the riuer and the footemen was verie narrow, so as they could not well take in any more ground, it was a cruell fight for the time, though it lasted not long. So, the horsemen of the ROMANES being ouerthrowen, the footemen came with suche a lustie courage to receiue the charge, that they thought they shoulde not haue day enough to fight. Howbeit the ouer earnest desire they had to ouercome their enemies, made their ouerthrowe more miserable, then their ioy and good happe was great at the beginning. For the GAVLES and SPANIARDES, (who as we haue sayd before kept the battell) not being able any longer to withstand the force of the ROMANES, they retired towardes the AFRIKANES in the wings. The ROMANES perceiuing that, ran vpon the enemy with all the fury they could, and had them in chase and fought with them, till they were gotten in the middest of them. Then the CARTHAGINIANS that were in both wings, came & compassed them in before they were aware. Moreouer, there were fiue hundred of the NVMIDIAN horsemen, that cullerably fled vnto the Consuls, who receiued them very curteously, & placed them in the rereward of the army. They seeing their time, shewed behind the enemies, & did sodainly geue them charge. Then the army of the ROMANES was vtterly ouerthrowen, & Annibal obtained victory. Liuie writeth that there were slaine in this battell * forty thousand footmen, and aboue two thowsand seuen hundred horsemen. Polybius saith, that there were many more slaine. Well, letting this matter passe, it is certaine that the ROMANES had neuer greater losse, neither in the first warre with AFRICKE, nor in the seconde by the CARTHAGINIANS, as this ouerthrowe that was geuen at CANNES. For there was slaine, the Consul Paulus AEmylius him selfe, a man vndoubtedlie deseruing great praise, and that serued his contrie and common wealth euen to the howre of death: Cn. Seruilius, Consul the yeare before, he was also slaine there, and many other that had bene Consuls, Prætors, and others of such like dignitie, Captaines, Chieftaines, and many other Senators and honest citizens, and that suche a number of them, that the verie cruelties it selfe of the enemie was satisfied. The Consull Terentius Varro, who was the onelie author of all this warre and slaughter, seeinge the enemie victor euerie waye, he saued him selfe by flyinge. And Taditanus a Chieftaine of a bande, comminge through his enemies with a good companie of his men, he came vnto CANVSIVM. Thither came also about tenne thowsande men, that had escaped from their enemies, as out of a daungerous storme: by whose consent, the charge of the whole armie was geuen vnto Appius Pulcher, and also vnto Cornelius Scipio, who afterwardes did ende this warre. Thus was the ende of that battell fought by CANNES. Newes flewe straight to ROME of this ouerthrowe, the

A the which though they lustly filled all the citie with sorowe and calamitie, yet the Senate and people of Rome kept alwaies their countenance and greatnes, euen in this extreame miserie. Insomuch that they had not only good hope to kepe their city safe, but furthermore they leauied a new army & made young men to beare armor, & yet left not Sicilia and Spayne vnprouided in the meane time: so that they made the world to wonder at them, to consider these things how they could in so great calamity & trouble haue so noble harts, & such wise counsel. But to let passe the former ouerthrowes, & great losses they susteined at Ticinvm, at Trebia, and at the lake of Thrasimene: what nation or people could haue borne this last plague, whereby the whole force & power of the Romanes was in maner vtterly destroied and ouerthrowen: and yet the people of Rome so held it out, & that with so great wisedom & counsell: The constancy of the Romanes in extreamities.

B that they neither lacked manhood, nor magnanimity. Besides, to help them the more, Annibal being cõqueror, trifling time in taking his leisure, & refreshing his army, he gaue the Romanes leasure that were ouercomen to take breath againe, & to restore themselues. For doutlesse, if Annibal being conqueror, had immediatly after the victorie obtained, brought his armie directly to Rome: surely the Romanes had bene vtterly vndone, or at the least had bene cõpelled to haue put all in venter. So, it is reported, that Annibal oftentimes afterwardes repented himselfe he followed not his victory, complaining openly, that he rather followed their counsell which wished him to let his souldiers rest, then Maharbals aduise, generall of his horsemen; who would haue had him gone straight to Rome, and so to haue ended all this warre. But he seing Annibals delay, told him (as it is reported) this that is now cõmon in euery mans mouth: Maharball generall of Annibals horsemen.

C Annibal, thou knowest how to ouercome, but thou knowest not how to vse victory. But what: all things are not (as Nestor saith in Homer) geuen to men all together. For some had no skil to ouercome, others knew not how to follow their victory, & some also could not kepe that they had won. Pyrrhus king of the Epirotes that made warre with the Romanes, was one of the famousest Captaines that euer was: yet, as men write of him, though he was maruelous fortunate to cõquer realmes, he could neuer kepe the. Euen so in like maner, some Captaines haue bene indued with excellent vertues, & yet notwithstanding haue bene infelicit in martial affaires, deseruing praise in a Captaine: as we may read in diuers histories. Now after this battell fought by Cannes, the Atellanians, the Calatinians, the Samnites, & after this also, the Brvtians & Lvcanians, & diuers other nations & people of Italy, carled away with Maharbals saying to Annibal.

Pyrrhus could not kepe the realmes he conquered.

D the fame of this great victory: they al came & yelded vnto Annibal. And the city of Capva also, (the which Annibal was desirous to haue won long before) for taking their old frends & confederats, made new league & friendship with Annibal, the which wan him great estimacion with other nations. For at that time the city of Capva was very populous & of great power, & the chiefest city of estimacion of all Italy, next vnto Rome. Now to tel you in few words what is reported of Capva, it is certaine that it was a Colony of the Thvscanes, the which was first called, Vvltvrnvm, & after that Capva, by the name of their Gouernor called Capius, or otherwise, (as it is most likely) bicause of the fieldes round about it. For on euery side of it, there are goodly pleasaunt fieldes, full of all kindes of frutes growing on the earth, called in Greeke, Kepi. Furthermore, all the contry is confined round about with famous nations. Towards the The citie of Capua, how so called.

E sea there dwell the Svessanians, the Cvmanians, and the Neapolitans. On firme land also towards the North, are the Calentinians, and the Calenians. On the East and South side, the Davnians and Nolanians. Furthermore, the place is of a strong scituacion, and on the one side is compassed in with the sea, and on the other side with great high mountaines. Now the Campanians florished maruelously at that time: and therefore, seeing the Romanes in maner vtterly vndone by the battel they had lost at Cannes, they quickly tooke parte with the stronger, as it commonly falleth out: and furthermore, besides that they made league with Annibal, they receiued him into their city with great triumphe, hoping that the warre being ended, they should be the chiefest & wealthiest of all Italy. But marke how men are commonly deceiued in their expectacion. Now, when Annibal came into the city of F Capva, there was a worlde of people that went to see him, for the great fame they heard of him. For there was no other talke, but of his happy victories he had wonne of the enemie. So being come into the citie, they brought him vnto Pacuuius house, his verie familiar frende, who was a man of great wealth and authoritie, as any among all the CAMPANIANS. Then he A made him a notable banket, to the which no citizens were bidden, sauing onely Iubellius Taurea, a stowte man, and the sonne of Pacuuius his hoast: who through his fathers meanes, with much a doe, was reconciled to Annibal, for that Annibal hated him as he did, bicause he followed Decius Magius, who alwayes tooke the ROMANES parte. But now, let vs consider a litle I pray you, how great men sometime vnwares are subiect to great daungers and misfortunes.

Conspiracy against Annibal at Capua. For this young man dissembling his reconciliacion with Annibal, watching time & occasion notwithstanding to do him some displeasure, in the time of this feast, while they were making merie: he tooke his father aside into a secret corner of the house, and prayed him together with him, by a great good turne, to redeeme the fauor and good will againe of the ROMANES, the which they had lost through their great wickednesse. Then he tolde him howe he was de- B termined to kill Annibal, the enemy of his contrie, and all ITALIE besides. His father that was a man of great countenance, and authoritie, was maruelously amazed withall, to heare what his sonne said: wherfore imbracing him with the teares running downe his cheekes, he praied him to leaue of his sword, and to let his gheste be safe in his house. The which his sonne in the end yeelded to with great a doe. Thus Annibal hauing before withstoode all the force of his enemies, the ambushes of the GAVLES, and hauing brought with him also a great army from the sea, and the furdest parte of SPAYNE, through so many great and mightie nations: he scaped killing verie narrowlie by the hande of a young man, whileste he was at the table making merie. The next morning Annibal had audience in open Senate, where he made great and large promises, and tolde them many thinges, which the CAMPANIANS easelie beleued, and C therefore flattered them selues, that they should be Lords of all ITALIE: howbeit they reckoned beside their hoast. And to conclude, they did so cowardly submit them selues to Annibal: that it seemed they had not onely suffered him to come into their citie, but that they had also made him their absolute Lord, like men that neither remembred, nor regarded their libertie. And this appeareth plainlie by one example I will shew you amongest many. Annibal willed them to deliuer him Decius Magius, the head of the contrarie faction to him. Whereunto the Senate not only obeyed with all humilitie, but worst of all, suffered him to be brought bound into the market place, in the presence of all the people: who, bicause he woulde not forsake the auncient league and frendshippe with the ROMANES, had shewed him selfe a more faithfull citizen to his contrie and common wealth, then vnto the barbarous people. Now whileste D these thinges passed thus in CAPVA, Mago (Annibals brother) went to CARTHAGE, to report the newes of his happie victorie to his contrie men, which they had wonne of the enemies: and with all, before the Senate to declare the noble exployes of armes done by Annibal, and to proue the words true he spake, he poored out at the comming in of the Senate house, the golden rings which had bene taken from the ROMANE Knightes: of the which there were (as some doe report) aboue a bushell full, and as other some doe wryte, aboue three bushells and a halfe. After that, he praied a new supply for Annibals army: the which was graunted him by the Senate with greater ioy, the afterwards it was sent. For the CARTHAGINIANS perswading them selues by the things present, that the warre would fall out as fortunate, as the beginning was fayer: they thereuppon decreed to continue the warre, and to aide Annibals attempts, by E leauying of souldiers. Now no mā withstood this new supply to be sent to Annibal, but Hanno, a perpetuall enemie of the Barcinian faction. Howbeit the CARTHAGINIANS wayed not his counsell and aduise then, though it tended to peace, and was good counsel for them, as oftentimes before he had vsed the like. So when Annibal had made league with the CAMPANIANS, he led his campe before the citie of NOLA, hoping they would yeeld of them selues without compulsion. And certainlie so had it come to passe, had not the sodaine comming thither of Marcellus the Prætor bene, who both kept the people in, pacified the sedition, & repulsed the enemy that was comming into the citie, by a saily he made vpon him at three seuerall gates, chasing & killing them euen to their campe, with great losse. This is that noble Captaine and Marcellus victorie of Annibal at the citie of Nola. valliant souldier Marcellus, who with a noble corage made the world knowe that Annibal was F not inuincible. Annibal perceiuing that there was no other way, but to let NOLA alone till an other time: he came to ACERRAS, and tooke and spoiled it without resistance. Then going on

A further with greater power vnto CASILINVM, a fit place to offend the CAPVANS, he went about to win them that lay there in garrison: but when he saw that neither his fayer promises, nor otherwise his threates coulde preuaile, he left parte of his armie to besiege the citie, and bestowed the residue in garrisons before the winter season. Howbeit he chose for his chiefest seate and strength the citie of CAPVA, which stoode verie pleasauntlie, and had plentie of all thinges. There it was that Annibals souldiers being vsed to lye hard, and easely to away with colde, hunger, and thirst, became then of valliant men, rancke cowardes: of strong men, weaklings: and of seruiceable and ready men, timerous and effeminate persons, through the daily pleasures they enioyed at will. For sweete intising pleasures, do corrupt the strength and corage of the mind, and mans disposition also vnto vertue: moreouer they spoile his wit, and B take all good counsell from him, all which thinges are daungerous for men. And therefore Plato rightlie calleth pleasure, the bayte of all euils. And doubtlesse in this case, the pleasures of CAMPANIA did hurt the CARTHAGINIANS more, then otherwise the highest Alpes, and all the armies of the ROMANES did. For one onelie winter passed ouer in suche pleasure and wantonnes, was of such great force to extinguish the vehement corage in the souldiers: that when they were brought into the fielde at the beginning of the spring, sure you would rightlie haue sayd that they had forgotten all martiall discipline. Thus the winter being passed ouer, Annibal returned againe to CASILINVM, hoping that the citizens within would willingly yeelde vnto him, after they had abidden so long a siege. Howebeit they were bent to abide all extreamity, before they would yeeld to their so cruell an enemy, although they lacked vit-C tells. Wherefore liuing first by spelt, or beere barley, and afterwards with nuts which they had receiued of the ROMANES by the riuer of Vulturnus: they held it out so long, that Annibal in the end being angry with the continuance of the siege, he was content to take the citie vpon composition, the which he had refused before. Now this warre, in the which the CARTHAGINIANS had alwayes had great victories and good fortune, and receiued any losse worthy of memorie: began at that time to decline, and to fall to great chaunge and alteracion. For the league that was made with Philip king of MACEDON, and the newe aide and supplie that was sent from CARTHAGE, and the taking of PETILIA, CONSENTIA, & of other cities of the contrie of the BRVTIANS, kept the CARTHAGINIANS in good hope. On the other side, the great victories which the ROMANES had won vpon the enemies in SPAYNE, & SARDINIA, did great-D ly encorage them, and gaue them also good hope that their affaires would prosper better and better. They had also chosen three excellent Captaines, Fabius Maximus, Sempronius Gracchus, and Marcus Marcellus, a man most worthie of praise for martiall discipline: who so wisely gouerned the affaires of the state, that Annibal found he should make warre with an enemie, no lesse politike and wise, then hardy and valliant. For first of all, he was driuen from the citie of CVMES, with great slaughter of his men, by Sempronius Gracchus, and forced to raise his siege: and shortlie after he was ouercomen by Marcellus, in a battell he fought at NOLA. For there were slaine about a thowsand ROMANES, & * six thowsand CARTHAGINIANS, slaine, & taken flying. Now it is easily seene what great importance that battel was of: bicause Annibal immediatly vpon it, raised his siege from NOLA, & went into APVLIA to winter his army there. By E this meanes came the ROMANES to recouer againe, as out of a great sicknes, and sent a great power against the enemy: and were not content only to keepe their owne, but they durst also inuade others. So their chiefest intent was, to besiege the city of CAPVA, for the iniurie they had but lately receiued of the CAMPANIANS. For incontinently after the battel was fought at CANNES, they forsooke the ROMANES, euē in their greatest extreamity & misery, & tooke part with Annibal that was conqueror, forgetting the great pleasures their city had receiued in old time by the ROMANES. On the other side the CAMPANIANS, knowing they had made a fault, & being affraid of this new preparatiō of the ROMANES: they sent to Annibal into APVLIA, to pray him to come & aide their city (being of the number of his confederats) in their greatest necessity. Annibal departed out of APVLIA without delay, & came on with great iorneys into F CAMPANIA, & cāped by TIFATA ouer CAPVA, wherby he rather deferred til another time, thē preuēted the plague hāging ouer the CAMPANIANS heades. So spoiling the cōtry roūd about NAPLES, he began to take cōceit of a new hope, that he might take the city of NOLA by treason.

The victories of the Romanes against Annibal.

Two factions in Naples.

For in NOLA, the people and Senate were at variance the one against the other, as they were likewise in diuers other cities of ITALIE. The common people desirous of chaunge, fauored Annibal: and the noble men, and men of authority, tooke part with the people of ROME. So when Annibal went to take the citie of NOLA, Marcellus met him with his army in battell ray, as he had often done before, and failed not to fight with him, euen at the first meeting. There the ROMANES ouercame, and draue the enemie with such manhood and readines: that if the horsemen which had taken an other way had comen in in time, as Marcellus commaunded them: no question the CARTHAGINIANS had bene vtterly ouerthrowen. Annibal after he had retired his army into his campe with great slaughter, he shortly after departed thence, & went into the contry of the SALENTINIANS. For certaine young TARENTINES that had bene taken prisoners in former battells, where the ROMANES had bene ouerthrowen, and that were afterwards deliuered free without raunsome: they to shew them selues thankeful, had put Annibal in hope to deliuer him the city of TARENTVM, so he would but bring his army before the city. Annibal intised by their promises, did what he could to obteine it, bicause he might haue some city vpon the sea in his power, the which he had desired of long time. And in deede, of all the cities vpon the sea coast, there was none so meete as TARENTVM, to bring aide out of GRECE thither, & also to furnish the cãpe with many things that were to be occupied daily. So, thogh this thing was drawen out in length, by the garrison of the ROMANES that valliantlie resisted: yet Annibal neuer gaue ouer his enterprise, vntill that Nico and Philomenes the authors of the treason, had deliuered him the citie into his handes. The ROMANES kept only the castell, the which is in manner enuironned with the sea on three sides: and on the fourth side, that lay vpon the firme lande, it was verie strong with rampers and bulwarkes. Annibal perceiuing that he coulde doe no good on that side, bicause of their great strength: he determined to shut vp the mouth of the hauen of TARENTVM, hoping that was the only way to make the ROMANES yeld, when their vittells should be cut from them. Yet the enterprise seemed very hard, bicause the enemies had all the straights of the hauen in their power, and the shippes also that should besiege the issue of the hauen, were shut vp in a litle narrow place, and were to be drawen out of the hauen, at the foote of the castell, to bring them into the next sea. But when neuer a man of the TARENTINES could deuise how to bring this enterprise to passe: Annibal him selfe perceiued that these shippes might be drawen out of the hauen with certaine engines, & then to cart them through the city to the sea. So hauing set cunning workemen in hande with the matter, the shippes within few daies after were taken out of the hauen, and caried into the sea, and then came and shewed before the barre of the hauen. Thus the citie of TARENTVM being won againe, after the ROMANES had kept it the space of a hundred yeares: Annibal leauing the castell besieged both by sea and land, he returned vnto SAMNIVM. For the Consuls of the ROMANES had spoyled and stripped the CAMPANIANS that went out to forrage, and hauing brought their army before CAPVA, they determined (if it might be) to win it by siege. Wherefore Annibal being very sory for the siege of CAPVA, he came with al his army against the enemy: & seeing shortly after that the ROMANES did not refuse to fight, they both marched forward. And doutlesse to fight it would haue proued a bloody battell, had not Sempronius army seuered them as he did, which came into CAMPANIA vnder the conduct of Cn. Cornelius, after they had lost Sempronius Gracchus in the cõtry of LVKE. For, they seeing this army farre of, before they could know who they were, the ROMANES & CARTHAGINIANS both were affraied, & so retired into their campe. Afterwards the Consuls went into seuerall cõtries, the one into LVKE, and the other towards CVMES, to make Annibal remoue from CAPVA: who went into LVCANIA, & foũd occasiõ to fight with M. Centenius, who very fondly & desperatly did hazard his army left him in charge, against a suttell and daungerous enemy. The battell being begon, M. Centenius was slaine valiantly fighting, & few other escaped. After this also, there hapned an other losse. For Annibal returning shortly after into APVLIA, he met with an other army of the ROMANES, the which Fabius the Prætor led, who also intrapped that army by ambushes, & slue the most of thẽ: so that of twenty thousand mẽ, two thousand scant scaped the edge of the sword. In the meane time the Consuls perceiuing that Annibal was gone, they came with all their army vnto CAPVA, & did besiege it roũd. This being come to Annibals eare, he came with his

A his army into CAMPANIA, in very good order, & wel appointed: & at his first comming, he set vpon the campe of the ROMANES, hauing first willed the CAMPANIANS at the selfe same instant to make a salye out on the. The ROMANE Consuls at the first tumult of their enemies, deuided the army betwene them, and went against them. The CAMPANIANS were easily driuen againe into the citie: howbeit against Annibal, the battell was very bloudy. For if euer he proued him selfe a valiant Captaine or noble souldier, that day he shewed it. He attempted also to surprise the ROMANES by some stratageame. For as his men were about to breake into the ROMANES campe, he sent one thither that had the Latine tongue excellently well, who cryed out, as by commaundement of the Consuls, that the ROMANES should saue them selues in the next Mountaines, considering they had almost lost all their campe and strength. This crye B made on the sodaine, had easily moued them that heard it, if the ROMANES being throughly acquainted with Annibals suttelties, had not found out his deceit. Wherefore, one of them incoraging an other, they made the enemy retyre, and compelled him in despite of his beard to flie into his campe. When Annibal had done what he could by all deuise and practise possible to rayse their seege from CAPVA, and perceiuing all would not serue, being sory for the daunger of his confederats: he then determined to call a counsell, the which he had passed ouer a long time, hauing reserued it for the last refuge. For he trussed vp his cariage, and marched away with his army, and as quietly as he could he passed ouer the riuer of Vulturnus, and coa- Vulturnus fl. sting through the contries of the SIDICINIANS, ATIFANIANS, and CASSINIANS, he came to ROME with ensignes displayed, hoping thereby he should make them rayse their seege, be- C ing so earnestly bent to winne CAPVA. This flying straight to ROME by currers, they were so affrayd there, as ROME was neuer in the like feare it stoode in then. For they saw their mortall enemy come to them with ensignes displayed, whome they had so often proued, almost to the vtter destruction of their Empire: and now they saw him present, whome they could not resist being absent, threatning to bring the Senate and people of ROME into subiection. So all ROME being in feare and tumult, it was ordeyned that Fuluius Flaccus (one of the Consuls lying before CAPVA) should be sent for home. And that the new Consuls, Sulpicius Galba, and Sulpicius Galba, Cornelius Centimalus, Consuls. Cornelius Centimalus, shoulde lye in campe out of the citie: and that C. Calphurnius Prætor, should put a stronge garrison into the capitoll, and also that the Citizens that had borne any office or dignitie, should be appoynted by their countenaunce and authoritie, to pacifie the D sodaine tumults that might happen in the city. So Annibal marched forward without staying, till he came to the riuer of Anienes, and there camped within 24. furlong of ROME: and short- Anienes fl. ly after that, he came with two thowsand horse so neare vnto ROME, that riding from the gate Collina, vnto Hercules temple, he had leysure to view at his pleasure, the situacion and walles of so great a citie. Fuluius Flaccus seeing that, could not abide it, but straight sent out certen Annibal commeth to inuade Rome. men of armes of the ROMANES against him: who comming with great furie to giue charge vpon him as they were commaunded, they easily sent him packing. The next morning, Annibal brought his army out of the campe, and did set them in battell raye, determining to fight presently, if he could allure the enemy to battell. The ROMANES on the other side did the like, So, both armies marched one against the other with such life and corage, that to see them, E they appeared men that feared no daunger, so they might obteine the victorie that day. For on the one side, the CARTHAGINIANS were to fight (in maner) for the Empire of the world: the which they thought depended vpon this battell, as beeing the last they should fight. The ROMANES in contrary manner, they were to fight for their contry, libertie, and their goods, to see whether they could keepe them, or that they should come to their enemies handes. How- A wonder. beit there fell out a thing worthy of memorie. For, as they were ready set in battell raye, tarying but for the signall of battell to giue charge: there fell such a wonderfull great shower and storme vpon them, that both of them were driuen in spight of their teethes, to bringe backe their army into their forts againe. The next day following in like manner, vnto the which it seemed the battel had bene deferred: when they had againe both of thē set their men in battel F raye, there fell the like storme vpon them, the which did as much hurt the ROMANES & CARTHAGINIANS, as the first: so that it forced them onely to looke to saue them selues, and not to thinke otherwise to fight. Annibal perceiuing this, he turned to his friends and told them, that the firſt time he thought not to winne Rome, and that at the ſecond time the occaſion was A taken from him. So there was a thinge that greatly troubled Annibal, and that was this. That though he came ſo neare to Rome, with an army of horſemen and footemen: yet he heard that the Romanes had ſent ayde into Spayne, and that they had redeemed the contry where he had bene, at a farre greater priſe then reaſon required. Wherefore being in a rage withall, he cauſed all the goldſmithes and banckers ſhoppes of the Romane citizens to be ſold by the Cryer. But afterwards, caſting with him ſelfe what a hard enterpriſe it was to take the citie of Rome, or els being affrayde to lacke vittells: (for he had ſtored him ſelfe onely but for tenne dayes) he rayſed his campe, and remouing thence, came to the holy woode of the goddeſſe Feronia, and rifled the riche temple there, and afterwardes went thence into the contry of the Brvtians and Lvcanians. The Capvans hauing intelligence thereof, being left out of all B hope: they yelded vp their citie vnto the Romanes. The citie of Capva beeing thus yelded vp, and brought againe to the ſubiection of the Romanes, it was of great importance to all the people of Italy, and withall brought a great deſire of chaunge. Annibal him ſelfe alſo following euill counſell, did ſpoyle and deſtroy many cities he could not keepe: whereby he did ſturre vp the harts of diuers nations againſt him. For where before when he was Conqueror, he had often let priſoners goe without ranſom paying, through which liberalitie he had won the harts of many men: euen ſo at that preſent time, his barbarous crueltie made diuers cities (miſliking to be ſubiect to the Carthaginians) to rebell againſt him, and to take part with the Romanes. Amongeſt them was Salapia, the which was yelded vp vnto the Con-ſul Marcellus, by Blacius meanes, chiefe of all the Romane faction: and a band alſo of choyce C horſemen which was left there in garriſon, were in manner ſlaine euery man of them. This is Salapia, a city where Annibal fell in lone. the citie where Annibal fell in fancy with a gentlewoman, and therefore they greatly reproue his immoderat luſt and laſciuiouſnes. Howbeit there are others, that greatly commending the continencie of this Captaine, ſay that he did neuer eate lying, and neuer dranck aboue a pint of wine, nether when he came to make warre in Italy, nor after that he returned into A-frick. Some there be alſo that ſay, Annibal was cruell, and vnconſtant, and ſubiect to diuers ſuch other vices: howbeit they make no manner of mention of his chaſtitie or incontinencie.

But they report that his wife was a Spanyard, borne in Castvlo, a good towne: and that the Carthaginians graunted her many things, and truſted her very much, bicauſe of the great faith and conſtancie of that nation. Now Annibal after he had loſt (as we haue told you) D the citie of Salapia: he found the meanes to cry quittance, and to make the Romanes loſe more then he had loſt. For at the ſelfe ſame time, Fuluius Viceconſul, lay beſeeging of Her-donea, hoping to winne the citie without reſiſtance. And bicauſe he ſtoode in no feare of any enemy round about him, (for Annibal was gone into the contry of the Brvtians) he kept no watch, and was altogether negligent in martiall affayres, contrary to the nature of the Ro-mane Captaines. Annibal being aduertiſed thereof by ſpialls, would not loſe ſuch a goodly o-portunitie: and therefore comming into Apvlia with his armye ready, he came ſo haſtely vnto Herdonea, that he had almoſt ſtollen vpon Fuluius, vnprouided in his campe. Howbeit the Romanes valiantly receiued the firſt charge with ſuch corage, that they fought it out lenger then it was looked for. Notwithſtanding, in the ende, as the Romanes two yeare be- E throwen, and their Captaine ſlaine, with the moſt part of his armye. The Conſul Marcellus was at that time in the citie of Samnivm, who being aduertiſed of this great ouerthrow, deſired to be euen with him: and though it ſeemed he came too late to helpe things paſt reme-die, yet he brought his army into the contry of the Lvcanians, whether he vnderſtood Annibal was gone after his victorie, and came and camped directly ouer againſt his enemye, and ſoone after came to battell. The which the Carthaginians refuſed not, but gaue ſuch a fierce onſet on either ſide, that they fought it out till Sunne ſet, and no man knew who had the better, and ſo the night parted them. The next morning the Romanes ſhewing againe in F field in battell raye, made it knowen that the enemies were affrayd of them: For Annibal kept his men within the campe, and the next night following ſtale away without any noyſe, and went

A went into Apvlia. Marcellus also followed him foote by foote, and fought to put all to hasard by some notable battell: for he bare him selfe thus in hand, that of all the Romane Captaines there was none machable with Annibal but him selfe, either in counsell, wit, or policie: or els in martiall discipline, or warlike stratageames. Howbeit the winter following kept him, that he could not fight any set battell with the enemie: for after he had made a fewe light skirmishes, bicause he would not trouble his souldiers any more in vaine, he bestowed them in garrison for the winter time. At the beginning of the next springe, procured partly by Fabius letters (who was one of the new Consuls for that yeare,) and partly also through his owne disposition: he brought out his garrisons sooner then they were looked for, and came with his army against Annibal, who lay at that time at Canvsivm. Now it chaunced, that through the Diuers conflicts of the Romanes with Annibal.

B nearenes of both their campes, and the good desire they both had to fight: in fewe dayes they fought three seuerall times. The first battell, when they had fought it out till night, in manner with like hope of both sides, and that it could not be iudged which of them had the better: they both of purpose retyred into their campe againe. The second day Annibal was conquerer, after he had slayne almost two thowsand seuen hundred enemies, and put the residue of the army to flight. The third day, the Romanes to recouer the shame and dishonor they had lost the day before: they were the first that prayed they might fight, and so Marcellus led them out to battell. Annibal wondring at their valiantnes, sayd vnto his people: that he delt with an enemy that could nether be quiet Conquerer, nor conquered. So the battell was more bloudy and cruell then any that was before: bicause the Romanes did their best to be reuenged Annibals wordes of Marcellus.

C of their losse, and the Carthaginians on the other side were mad in their mindes, to see that the vanquished durst prouoke the vanquishers vnto battell. In the ende, the Romanes being sharpely reproued, and also perswaded by Marcellus to sticke to it valliantly like men, that the newes of their victorie might come to Rome, before the newes of their ouerthrowe: they flue in among the presse of their enemies, and neuer left fighting, till that after they had thrise broken their enemies, they made them all flie. At the selfe same time Fabius Maximus tooke the citie of Tarentvm againe, almost after the selfe same sort it was lost. This being reported vnto Annibal, he sayd: the Romanes haue also their Annibal. The next yeare following, Marcellus and Crispinus were chosen Consuls, who preparing to put them selues in readines for warre, they led both the armies against the enemy. Annibal dispayring that he was not

D able to resist them in battel, he sought all the wits he had to deuise some way to intrappe them by sutteltie, whome he could not ouercome by battel. So Annibals head being occupied thus, there was offred him a better occasion to bring this enterprise to passe, then he looked for. Betwene both campes, there was a prety groue, in the which Annibal layed certen bands of the Nvmidians in ambushe, to intrappe the enemies passing to and fro. On the other side, the Consuls by consent of them all, thought it best to send to view this groue, and to keepe it if neede required: least in leauing it behind them, the enemies should come, & so be vpon their backs afterwards. Now before they remoued their armye, both the Consuls went out of their campe, with a small company of horsemen with them, to view the situacion of this place: and so going on very vndiscreetely, and worse appoynted then became men of their authoritie &

E place, they vnfortunatly fell into Annibals ambush. So, when they saw them selues in a mome̅t compassed about on euery side with enemies, that they could not goe forward, and were also fought withall behind: they defended them selues the best they could, rather by compulsion, then of any determination they had to fight. So Marcellus was slaine fighting valiantly: and Crispinus the other Consul also very sore hurt, who hardly scaped the enemies hands. Annibal being aduertised that Marcellus was slaine, who was the chiefest man of all the Romane captaines, that had most hindered the happy successe of his victories, and had besides troubled him most: he presently went and camped there where the battell was fought, and when he had found Marcellus body, he gaue it honorable pompe and funerall. Hereby we may see how magnanimitie, and excellent vertues, are esteemed of all men: considering that the cruell and

Spinus had sent to the next townes of the mountaines, to aduertise them that Marcellus his companion was dead, and that the enemy had gotten the ringe he sealed his letters withall: wherefore he wished them to beware of any letters written in Marcellus name. Crispinus Messenger came but newly vnto SALAPIA, when letters were brought also from Annibal in the behalfe of Marcellus, to tell them that he woulde be there the next night. The SALAPIANS knowing his craft, they sent his Messenger away, & carefully looked for Annibals comming. About the fourth watche of the night, Annibal came to the citie of SALAPIA, who of purpose had put all the ROMANES that had fled, in the vauntgard, bicause that they speaking the Latin tongue, might make them beleue that Marcellus was there in person. So when the Citizens had suffred six hundred of them to come in, they shut to the gates, and with their shot and darts thrust out the rest of the armye, and then put all them to the sword they had let into the citie. Thus Annibal beeing in a maruelous rage he had missed of his purpose: he remoued thence, and went into the contry of the BRVTIANS, to ayde the LOCRIANS that were besieged by the ROMANES, both by sea and by land. After all these thinges, at the earnest request of the Senate and people, two new Consuls were created, both famous Captaines, and valiant souldiers, Marcus Liuius, & Claudius Nero: who hauing deuided the army betwixt them, went vnto their seuerall charge and prouinces. Claudius Nero went into the contry of the SALENTINIANS, and M. Liuius into GAVLE, against Hasdrubal BARCINIAN, who was come ouer the Alpes, & made haste to ioyne with his brother Annibal, bringing with him a great army both of footemen and horsemen. Nowe it chaunced at the same time, that Annibal had receyued great losse by Claudius the Consul. For first of all, he ouercame him in the contry of the LVCANIANS, vsing the like policies and fetches that Annibal did. Afterwardes againe, meeting with Annibal in APVLIA, by the citie of VENVSIA: he fought such a lustye battell with him, that many of his enemies lay by it in the fielde. By reason of these great losses, Annibal sodainely went to METAPONT, to renew his army againe. So hauing remayned there a few dayes, he receiued the army from Hanno, the which he ioyned vnto his, & then returned vnto VENVSIA. C. Nero lay not farre from VENVSIA with his campe: who hauing intercepted letters of his enemies, he vnderstoode by them that Hasdrubal was at hand with his armye. Thereuppon, he bethought him selfe night and day, what policie he might vse to preuent the ioyning of two so great armies together as these. So after he had taken aduise of him self, he followed in sight, a daungerous determination: but peraduenture necessary, as the time required. For, leauing the campe vnto the charge of his Lieutenant, he tooke part of the armye with him, and making great iorneyes, came to PICENVM (being the marches of ANCONA) so that on the sixt day he came to SENA. There both the Consuls ioyned their forces together, and setting vpon Hasdrubal by the riuer of Metaurum, they had very good lucke at that battell. For, as it is reported, there were six and fifty thowsand of the enemies slayne on that daye: so that they almost had as great an ouerthrow, as the ROMANES had receiued before at the battell of CANNES. Now Claudius Nero, after this famous victorie, returning as speedily vnto VENVSIA as he went thence, he set vp Hasdrubals head, where the enemies kept their watche: and did let certen prisoners goe, to carye newes to Annibal of this great ouerthrow. For afterwardes it was knowen, that Annibal knew nothing yet of Claudius secret enterprise, nor of the speedy execution and great slaughter he had made. Whereat sure I can but wonder, that so suttill a Captaine as Annibal, could be deceiued by Claudius, considering both their campes lay so neare together: so that he first heard the newes of the ouerthrow of his brother, and all his armye, before he vnderstoode any thing of the Consuls departure, or heard of his returne againe to the campe. Now Annibal hauing not onely receiued a generall, but also a perticular great losse by the death of his brother: he sayd then he plainely saw the chaunge & alteracion of the CARTHAGINIANS good fortune, and shortly after remoued his campe, and went thence into the contry of the BRVTIANS. For he knew that this great ouerthrow giuen by the riuer of Metaurum, was a maruelous incoragement to the ROMANES, and would also be a great logge in his way, for the succesſe of all this warre. This notwithstanding, he gathered together all his power he had left in ITALY, after so many great battells and conflicts, and so many cities taken: and mainteyned the warre with an inuincible courage. was

A was this, that through his authoritie & wisedom, he kept all his army in peace and amitie together, (being a medley of SPANIARDS, AFRICANS, GAVLES, and of diuers other nations) and neuer man heard that there was any brawle or tumult amonge them. Howbeit the ROMANES themselues, after they had ouercome SICILIA, SARDINIA, and SPAYNE againe, they could neuer vtterly ouercome him, nor driue him out of ITALY, before they had sent ouer Scipio into AFRICK: who making warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, he brought them to such great extremitie, that they were driuen to send for Annibal home out of ITALY. Annibal at that time, (as I haue sayd before) was in the contry of the BRVTIANS, making warre by inrodes and sodaine inuasions, rather then by any fought battell: sauing that once there was a battell fought in haste betwixt him and the Consul Sempronius, and immediatly after he came

B and set vpon the same Sempronius with all his armye. At the first battell, Annibal had the victorie: but at the second, Sempronius ouercame him. Since that time, I can finde in no Greake nor Latyn Author, that Annibal did any famous acte in ITALY worthy memorie. For being sent for into AFRICKE by the CARTHAGINIANS, he left ITALY, sixteene yeares after this AFRICK warre was begonne, greatly complayning of the Senate of CARTHAGE, and of him selfe also: Of the Senate, bicause that all the time he had been in his enemies contry so long, they had allowed him so litle money: and so scanted him besides with all other thinges necessary for the warres: And of him selfe, bicause that after he had so often ouercome the ROMANES, he had alwayes delayed time after the victorie, and had giuen the enemy libertie to gather force

C againe. It is reported also, that before he imbarked and tooke sea, he set vp a triumphing arche or piller, by the temple of Iuno Lacinia, in the which were briefly grauen his noble victories, both in the Punick and Græke tongue. So when he was departed out of ITALY, the wind serued him well, that in few dayes he arriued at LEPTIS, and landing all his army, he first came to ADRVMENTVM, and afterwards vnto ZAMA. There receiuing aduertisement how the affayres of the CARTHAGINIANS prospered: he thought it best to deuise some way to end this warre. For this cause he sent vnto Scipio, to pray him to appoynt him some conuenient place where they might both meete, and talke together, of matters of great importance. Now it is not certainely knowen, whether Annibal did this of his owne head, or by commaundement from the Senate. Scipio refused not to come to parley. Wherefore at the day appoynted, there met two

D famous generalls of mighty nations, in a great plaine together, either of them hauing his Interpreter, to talke together of diuers matters touching peace and warre. For, Annibal was altogether bent to peace: bicause he saw the affayres of the CARTHAGINIANS ware worse & worse euery day: that they had lost SICILIA, SARDINIA, and SPAYNE: bicause the warre was brought out of ITALY into AFRICK: bicause Syphax (a mighty king) was taken prisoner of the ROMANES: and also bicause that their last hope consisted in the army he had brought into AFRICK: which was the onely remayne and reliefe of so long a warre as he had made in ITALY: and also bicause that the CARTHAGINIANS had so small a power left (both of straungers, and also of Citizens) that there were scarse men enough to defende the citie of CARTHAGE. So he did his best to perswade Scipio, with a long oration he made, rather to agree to peace, then to resolue of warre. Howbeit Scipio that liued in hope to bring this warre

E to a good ende, he would not seeme to giue eare to any peace. Wherefore after they had long debated the matter of either side, in the ende they brake of, and made no agreement. Shortly after, was this famous battell striken by the citie of ZAMA, in the which the ROMANES obtayned victorie. For first of all, they made the CARTHAGINIANS Elephants turne vpon their owne army, so that they did put all Annibals horsemen out of order. And Lelius and Masinissa who made both the winges, increasing their feare, gaue the horsemen no leysure to gather them selues in order againe. Howbeit the footemen fought it out a long time, & with a marueilous great corage: insomuch that the CARTHAGINIANS (trusting in their former victories) thought that all the safetie and preseruation of AFRICK, was all in their handes, and therefore they layed about them like men. The ROMANES on the other side had as great harts

F as they, and besides, they stoode in the better hope. Howbeit one thing in deede did the ROMANES great seruice to helpe them to the victorie: and that was, Lelius and Masinissa returne from the chase of the horsemen, who rushed in to the battell of the enemie with great furye, and did put them in a maruelous feare. For at their comming, the CARTHAGINIANS harts were done, and they saw no other remedie for them, but to hope to scape by flying. So it is reported, that there were slayne that day, aboue twenty thowsand CARTHAGINIANS in the field, and as many more prisoners: Annibal their generall, after he had taryed to see the ende of the battell, fled with a few of his men out of the great slaughter. Afterwardes when he was sent for to CARTHAGE, to helpe to saue his contry: he perswaded the Senate not to hope any more in warres, but did counsell them, that setting all deuises a part, they should send vnto Scipio the ROMANE Captaine, to make peace with him vpon any condicion. When the same Ambassadors had brought the capitulacion and agreement vnto CARTHAGE of the articles of peace: it is reported that there was one Gisgo, who misliking to heare talke of peace, he made an oration, and perswaded all he could to renew warre against the ROMANES. Wherefore Annibal perceiuing that diuers men confirmed his opinion, and being much offended to see such beasts, and men of no vnderstanding, to dare to speake of such matters, in so daungerous a time: he cast him downe headlong, whilest he was yet in his oration. So when he sawe that the Citizens, and all the whole assembly, thought this too presumptuous a part of him, & vnmeete altogether for a free citie: he him selfe got vp into the pulpit for orations, and sayd. Let no man be offended, if a man that from his youth hath bene alway out of CARTHAGE, & brought vp all his life time in warres, be ignoraunt of the lawes and ordinaunces of the citie. After that, he spake so wisely to the articles of peace, that the CARTHAGINIANS being immediatly moued by the authoritie of so great a person: they all agreed to accept the condicions which the vanquisher, & the necessitie of time offred them. The articles out of dout were very extreame, and such as the vanquished are wont to receiue with all extreamitie by the conquerors. But besides all other things, the CARTHAGINIANS were boūd to pay the ROMANES an annuell tribute, vntill a certen time were ronne out. So when the daye came that the first pencion was to be payd to the ROMANES, and that euery man grudged when the subsedy was spoken of: some saye that Annibal being offended with the vaine teares of the CARTHAGINIANS, he fell a laughing. And when Hasdrubal Hedus reproued him bicause he laughed in such a common calamitie of all the citie, he aunswered: that it was no laughture nor reioycing from the hart, but a scorning of their fond teares, that wept when there was lesse cause (and onely bicause it touched euery priuate mans purse) then before, when the ROMANES tooke from the CARTHAGINIANS their shippes, armor, and weapons, and their spoyles of the great victories which they had wonne before, and now gaue lawes and ordinaunces vnto them that were vanquished. I know some Authors write, that Annibal immediatly after he had lost the battell, fled into ASIA, for that he was affrayde they woulde deliuer him into Scipioes hands, that perhaps might demaund him of them. But whether that was done sodainely, or some time after the battel was lost at ZAMA, it makes no great matter: considering that all the world knoweth, that when he sawe things brought to extremitie, he presently fled into ASIA vnto king Antiochus. So is it most true, that king Antiochus receiued him with great curtesie, and vsed him very honorably: insomuch as he made him of counsell with him all in all, both in priuate and publike causes. For the name of Annibal caried great reputacion with all men: besides that, he had a common and mortal hate to the ROMANES, which was a pricking spurre still to moue warre against them. And therefore it seemeth that he came in happy hower into that contry, not onely to pricke forward the courage of the king against them, but also to set warres at libertie against the ROMANES. So he tolde him, that the onely way to make warre with the ROMANES, was to goe into ITALY to leauy ITALIAN souldiers, by whome onely, that victorious contry of all other nations might be subdued. He requested of the king a hundred shippes, sixteene thowsand footemen, and a thowsand horsemen onely. With this small army he promised to inuade ITALY, and that he would maruelously trouble the ITALIANS, whome he knew yet to stand in no small feare of him, for the very sound of his name onely: bicause of the late warres he had made there, so freshe yet in memorie. Futthermore, he tooke hart againe vnto him to renew the warres of AFRICK, if the king would licence him to sende men vnto CARTHAGE, to stirre vp the BARCINIAN faction, whome he knew hated the ROMANES to death. When he had gotten the king to graunt him his request, he called Ariston

A Tyrian vnto him, a fine ſuttell fellowe, and meete for ſuch a purpoſe: to whome he made large promiſes, and perſwaded him to goe to Carthage to his friends, and to cary them letters from him. Thus Annibal being a baniſhed man, and fled out of his contry, rayſed warre in all partes againſt the Romanes. And ſurely his counſell had taken good effect, had king Antiochus rather followed his aduiſe, as he did at the firſt, then the vaine perſwaſions of his fine Courtiers. But enuy, a common plague frequenting Princes Courts, bred Annibal great enemies. For they beeing affrayd that by his counſells he ſhould growe in great fauor with the king, (for he was a wiſe and politike Captaine) and that thereby he ſhould beare great ſway and authoritie: to preuent it, they lacked no deuiſe to bringe him in diſgrace with the king. Hereuppon his priuie enemies tooke occaſion to accuſe him, and withall, the king him ſelfe became ſo ielous of it, that from thence forth he neuer more called him to counſell. At the ſelfe-ſame time alſo, as ſome doe report, P. Cornelius Scipio African (who was one of the Ambaſſadors ſent vnto king Antiochus) talking familliarly with Annibal, prayed him amongeſt other thinges to tell him truely, whome he thought the worthieſt Captaine of all others. Annibal aunſwered him. Firſt he thought Alexander, king of Macedon the chiefeſt: next vnto him, Pyrrhus king of the Epirotes: and thirdly, him ſelfe. Then Scipio African ſmyling, asked him: what wouldeſt thou ſaye, Annibal, if thou haddeſt ouercome me? Truely ſayd he, then I would be chiefeſt my ſelfe. This aunſwer pleaſed Scipio maruelous well, bicauſe he ſaw he was nether diſpiſed, nor yet brought

C to be compared with the other, but left alone as peereles, by ſome ſecret flattery of Annibal. After theſe things, Annibal found occaſion to talke with king Antiochus, and beganne to lay open his life vnto him from his youth, and to bewray the malice he had alwayes borne vnto the Romanes: whereby he ſo ſatisfied the king, that he was againe receiued into his grace and fauor, which he had almoſt vtterly loſt. Thereuppon the king was determined to haue made him Admirall of his armye by ſea, the which he had put in readines for Italy, and alſo to make proofe of his great corage and ſeruice, whome he knewe to be a worthy man, and a mortall enemy to the Romanes. But one Thoas, Prince of the Ætolians, thwarting this opinion, either for malice, or els for that his fancye was ſuch: he altered the kinges minde, and cleane changed his purpoſe, the which was a matter of greate importance for the warre he

D pretended to make. For he gaue counſell vnto Antiochus, that he ſhould goe him ſelfe into Græce, and direct his owne affayres: and that he ſhould not ſuffer another to cary away the honor & glory of this warre. So king Antiochus ſhortly after went into Græce, to make warre with the Romanes. Within fewe dayes after, when he conſulted whether he ſhoulde make league with the Theſſalians, Annibals opinio̅ was ſpecially asked: who ſpake ſo wiſely touching the ſtate of the Theſſalians, & the chiefeſt matter of importance, that they all went with his opinion, and gaue their conſents vnto it. Now his opinion was, that they ſhould not neede much to care for the Theſſalians, but rather to make all the meanes they could, to get king Philip of Macedon to take their part: or els to perſwade him to be a Newter, and to take nether parte. Furthermore, he gaue counſell to make warre with the Romanes in their

Wherefore euery man maruelled, that ſuch a Captaine as he, that had ſo many yeares made warre with the Romanes (who had in maner cōquered all the world) ſhould then be ſo light ſet by of the king, when it ſpecially ſtood him vpon, to haue ſuch a mans help & coūſel. For, what captaine liuing could a man haue foūd more skilful or politike, or meeter to make war with the Romanes, then him? Howbeit the king made no reckoning of him, at the firſt beginning of this warre: but ſhortly after, diſdaining al their coūſell, he cōfeſſed that Annibal only ſaw what was to be done. For after the Romanes had obtained victory in the war he made in Græce: Antiochus fled out of them. But Annibal, who knewe the power and ambition of the ROMANES, perſwaded the king to hope for any thing rather then peace, and bad him truſt to it, that the ROMANES would neuer ſtay, till they had proued whether they could enlarge the dominions of their Empire, into the third part of the world, as they had done in AFRICK, and EVROPE. Antiochus perſwaded by the authority of ſuch a man, ſtraight commaunded Polyxenidas, a very ſeruiceable man, and skilfull in ſea ſeruice, that he ſhould goe meete with the army of the ROMANES that was comming thither. Then he ſent Annibal into SYRIA, to leauy a great number of ſhippes together, and afterwards made him, and Apollonius, (one of his fauored Courtiers) generalls of this armye by ſea: who notwithſtanding that Polyxenidas was put to the worſt by the ROMANES, they went and ſet vpon the RHODIANS, that were confederats with them. Annibal in this battell aſſayling Eudamus the Captaine of the RHODIANS, that led the left wing: he had already compaſſed in the Admirall galley, and doubtles had obtayned the victorie, but that the other wing came in to reſcue, after they had followed Apollonius in chaſe, and tooke the victorie from him, that was his owne. After this battell by ſea, which had no great good ſucceſſe: we doe not find that Annibal did any thing worthy memorie. For king Antiochus being ouercome, beſides other condicions, the ROMANES offred him: they deſired that Annibal (the mortall enemy of their contry) ſhould be deliuered vnto them. Annibal foreſeeing this long before, he ſodainely ſtale from Antiochus, after this notable battell that was fought by MAGNESIA, where the kings power was ouerthrowen. So, after Annibal had wandred vp and downe a long time, he fled at length vnto Pruſias, king of BITHYNIA, for ſuccor. Nowe he did not ſo much truſt to his friendſhippe, but bicauſe he ſought for the meeteſt place he coulde come by, as alſo for the ſafeſt, the which he moſt deſired: conſidering that the ROMANES had the moſt part of the ſea and land in their ſubiection. Some ſay, that after king Antiochus was ouercome, Annibal went into CRETA vnto the GORTYNIANS: and that the rumor ranne immediatly, he had brought a great maſſe of gold and ſiluer with him. Wherefore being affrayd leaſt the CRETANS ſhould offer him ſome violence, he deuiſed this ſhifte to ſcape the daunger. he filled earthen pots with lead, gilt, and ſent them into the temple of Diana, ſayning that he was maruelous carefull for them, as though all his treaſure had bene there. On the other ſide he had hid all his gold in images of braſſe, the which he had left carefly lying on the groūd in the houſe. In the meane time, whileſt they watched the temple carefully, that theſe earthen pots ſhould not be caried away without their priuitie: Annibal hoyſed ſayle, and fled into BITHYNIA. In BITHYNIA there is a village vpon the ſea ſide, which the contry men call LIBYSSA, of the which by ſome mens ſaying, there ranne an olde oracle and prophecy in this ſort.

Annibal made generall of Antiochus army by ſea, together with Apollonius.

Annibal fled to Pruſias king of Bithynia.

The land of Libyſſa ſhall couer vnder mouulde The valliant corps of Annibal, vvhen he is dead and colde.

There Annibal lay, not ſpending his time idely, but paſſing it away in exerciſing of the maryners, riding of horſes, and trayning of his ſouldiers. Some Authors alſo do write, that at that time Pruſias made warre with Eumenes, king of PERGAMVM, who was a confederate and friend of the ROMANES: and that he made Annibal his Lieuetenant generall of his army by ſea: who aſſayling Eumenes with a new found and vnknowen deuiſe, wanne the victory of the battell by ſea. For before they began to fight, it is reported that Annibal had gotten an infinite number of ſnakes into earthen pots, and when the battell was begonne, and they buſily tending their fight: he threw thoſe pots with ſnakes into the enemies ſhippes, and that by this fearefull and ſtraunge deuiſe he made them flie. Now whether this was true or not, the olde chronicles do make no manner of mention, but onely AEmylius and Trogus. And therefore I report me to the Authors. So, the newes of the diſſention betwixt theſe two kings, (Pruſias, and Eumenes) being brought to ROME: the Senate ſent T. Q. Flaminius Ambaſſador into ASIA, whoſe name was famous for the noble victories he had obtayned in GRÆCE, to the ende (as I coniecture) to make peace betwixt theſe two kings. Flaminius being come vnto king Pruſias, he was maruelouſly offended, and ſory in his mind to ſee Annibal yet aliue, (that was the mortalleſt enemy of the ROMANES) after the cōqueſts of ſo many nations, & the ſacking of ſo many people: therfore, he was very earneſtly in hand with king Pruſius, to deliuer him Annibal. Annibal from the firſt beginning miſtruſted king Pruſias inconſtancye very much, and therefore had digged Annibal, king Pruſias generall by ſea, againſt Eumenes, king of Pergamum. A ſtraunge deuiſe of ſnakes put in earthen pots, and throwen into the enemies ſhippes. Titus Quintius Flaminius ſens Ambaſſador into Aſia.

A diuers vaults in his house, and made seuen seuerall vents to flie out at, if he were sodainely taken. The report of Flaminius cõming did encrease his suspition the more, for that he thought him the greatest enemy he had in ROME: both generally for the hate he bare vnto all the ROMANES, as also perticularly for the remembraunce of his father Flaminius, that was slayne in the battell fought by the lake of Thrasymene. So Annibal being full of care and griefe (as it is reported) he found deuises to escape, the which stood him to no purpose against such a great power. For when the kings gard which were sent to take him, had cõpassed his house about, Annibal thought to flie at their first comming, and to saue him selfe by the secretest vault he had. But when he found that the place was kept by the gard, then he determined to rid him selfe out of the ROMANES handes, by destroying him selfe. So, some doe report, that he was

B strangled by one of his men, whome he had commaunded to helpe to dispatche him. Others write againe, that he had droncke bulles bloud, and when he had droncke it, dyed, as Clitarchus, and Stratocles doe falsely report of Themistocles. Howbeit Titus Liuius, that famous Historiographer writeth, that Annibal called for the poyson he had ready for such a mischiefe, and that holding this deadly drinke in his hand, before he dranke he sayd: Come on, let vs rid the ROMANES of this payne and care, sith their spight and malice is so great, to hasten the death of a poore old man that is halfe dead already. The auncient ROMANES aduertised Pyrrhus king of the EPIROTES, who came with enseignes displayed to the very walls of the citie of ROME, that he should looke to him selfe, and beware of poysoning: and these ROMANES nowe doe make a friende forgetting his kingly state and faithfull promise, vilely to betraye his

C poore ghest. After he had sayd, bitterly cursing king Prusias, he poysoned him selfe, being three score & tenne yeare olde, as some writers doe testifie. His body was buried in a tombe of stone by LIBYSSA, on the which was ingrauen no more but this: Here lyeth Annibal. The ROMANES

A beeing aduertised of his death, euery man sayde his opinion, as his fancye serued him. Some greatly blamed T. Q. Flaminius crueltie, who to make him selfe famous by some notable acte, (as he thought) made a poore olde man put him selfe to death, that was in manner half dead by age, and besides, was past doing the state of ROME any more hurt, they being Conquerors in manner of all the world. But some againe on the other side, commended Flaminius for it, & sayd it was a good deede of him, to rid the ROMANES of their mortall enemye: who though he had but a weake body, yet he lacked no wit, wise counsell, and great experience in warres,

D to intise king Prusias to make warre, and to molest all ASIA besides with newe warres. For at that time, the power of the king of BITHYNIA was so great, that it was not to be lightly regarded. For after that, Mithridates king of the same BITHYNIA, did marueilously molest the Ro-

B MANES both by sea and by land, & moreouer fought battells with L. Lucullus, and Cn. Pompey, famous Captaines of the ROMANES. And so the ROMANES might also be affrayd of king Prusias, and specially hauing Annibal his Captaine. So some iudge, that Q. Flaminius was specially sent Ambassador vnto king Prusias, secretly to practise Annibals death. Howbeit it is to be supposed, that Q. Flaminius was not so desirous to haue Annibal so sodainely put to death, as he would haue bene glad otherwise to haue brought him againe to ROME, that had done such mischiefe to his contry: and this had bene a great benefit for ROME, and much honor also vn-

E to him selfe. Such was the death of Annibal the CARTHAGINIAN, a famous man doubtles, & highly to be commended for martiall prayse, setting his other vertues a side. So we may easily iudge, of what power and force his noble mind, his great wisedom and corage, and his perfit skill of martiall discipline was in all thinges. For in all the warre the CARTHAGINIANS had so vehemently, and with such great preparation enterprised: they neuer thought them selues ouercome, till Annibal was ouerthrowen at that great battell by ZAMA. So it appeareth, that all their strength and skill of warres began, & also ended, with

Scipio African.

The parentage of Scipio.

Publius Scipio a PATRICIAN, of the familye of the Cornely, who was the first ROMANE Captaine against whome Annibal fought in ITALY: was the father of Cornelius Scipio afterwards surnamed AFRICAN, the first so called, bicause he had conquered that nation. The same Scipio, after he had obtayned many great victories in SPAYNE, and done notable feates of armes: was in the ende slayne with a wound he had in a battell against his enemies, as he was plying and incoraging of his men from place to place, thronging in the greatest daunger and fury of the battell. Shortly after did his brother Cn. Scipio also ende his life, much after one selfe manner, and was slayne valiantly fighting. So these two Captaines, besides the fame they achieued by their noble deedes, left behind them great prayse of their faithfulnes, modestie, and corage: the which made them not onely wished for of their souldiers that were then liuing, but also of all the SPANYARDS besides. Cn. Scipio had a sonne called P. Cornelius Nasica, one that had bene Consul and had also triumphed: who being but a younge man, was thought the meetest man of all the citie of ROME to receyue Idea, the mother of the goddes. This Publius had two sonnes, the so famous Scipioes: of the which the one was called ASIAN, bicause he conquered ASIA: and the other AFRICAN, bicause he subdued AFRICK at that famous battell of ZAMA, where he ouerthrewe Annibal and the CARTHAGINIANS; as we sayd before. Whose life we purpose nowe to write, not so much to make the glory of his name (so famous by all the Græke & Latyn Authors) the greater by our history: as for that we would make all men know the order of his noble deeds, & moral vertues, so thend that all Princes & noble Captaines in reading it, should behold the liuely image of perfit vertue, which may moue an earnest desire in the to follow the example of P. Cornelius Scipioes life, who from his childhod gaue great hope & shew of a noble nature, & excellent vertue, after he followed the instruction of martiall discipline, vnder the conduct of his father. He was caried into the field at the beginning of the second warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, followed the campe being but seuenteene yeare old, & in a very short time grew so toward, & forward in al things, in riding, in watching, in taking all maner of paynes like a soldier, that he wan great cõmendacion of his own father, & besides, great estimation also of all the army. Furthermore, he shewed such tokens of a sharp wit, & noble corage: that it made him beloued, & also feared of his

A his enemies. For this Scipio was present at the battell of the horsemen, where P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul fought with Annibal, by the riuer of Thesin: & some writers doe affirme, that Cornelius the father being hurt, was almost taken by the enemye, had not his sonne Scipio saued him, who had then but a litle downe on his beard, he was so young. After that also, at the battel that was fought by CANNES, to the great losse, & in maner vtter destruction of the Empire of ROME, when the ten thowsand men that fled to CANVSIVM, had all together with one cōsent referred the gouernment of the army vnto Appius Pulcher, that had bene Ædilis, and vnto Cornelius Scipio, that was yet but very young: the same Scipio shewed then by his deedes, what noble mind and corage was in him. For when he saw certen young men consulting together betwene them selues to forsake ITALY: he thrust in among them, & drawing out his sword, made B them all sweare they would not forsake their contry. These, and such like deedes done by him with a liuely corage & noble mind, being then but a young man: wanne him such fauor with the ROMANES, that not respecting his young yeares, nor their auncient custō, they called him forward, & laid offices of great charge & gouernment vpon him. Insomuch that when he sued for the office of Ædilis before his due time, notwithstanding that the Tribunes of the people were against his sute, bicause he was so younge a man: yet the people suffered him to be brought from tribe to tribe, & so was presently chosen Ædilis with the most voyces. So after his father & Vncle, (both famous and noble Captaines) had bene slaine one after the other in SPAYNE, & that the ROMANES were in consultacion to appoynt some worthy captaine in the C roome: they could finde no man that durst vndertake this so daungerous warre, considering the losse of two so great captaines before. Wherfore the whole assēbly being called to choose a Viceconsul, all the other Princes & peeres of the Realme being silent at so worthy a motion: Scipio onely of all the rest, being but foure & twenty yeare old, stoode vp in the middest of thē, & said, with a good hope & confidence he would willingly take the charge vpon him. He had no sooner offred this promise, but he was presently made Viceconsul of SPAYNE, with the wōderful good wil & fauor of the people, who gaue him all their voyces. Howbeit the Senators afterwards considering better of the matter, against what captaines & natiōs he should make warre: they thought it vnpossible so younge a man coulde performe so waighty a charge. Wherefore mens minds were wonderfully chaunged againe on the sodeine, as if the wibes of the people had repented them of their voices & election. Scipio perceiuing it, called an assem-D bly presently, & made such an oration of his age, and discipline of warres, that euery man that heard him wondred at him, & the people began againe to renew the good hope they had of him for the warres. For he had not only a noble corage in him, beeing indued with many singuler vertues, but he was also a goodly gentleman, & very comly of person, and had besides a pleasaunt countenaunce: all which things together, are great meanes to winne him the loue and good will of euery man. Moreouer, euen in his gesture and behauior, there was a certaine princely grace. Now, the glory of martiall discipline, being ioyned vnto those his rare gifts of mind and nature: it was to be doubted, whether his ciuil vertues made him more acceptable vnto straungers, then wonderful for his skil in warres. Furthermore, he had filled the common peoples harts with a certen superstitious feare, bicause he did daily (after he had take the mans E gowne) vse to goe vp to the Capitoll, & so into the church without any company: insomuch that all men began to thinke that he learned some secret thinges in the temple, which others might not know, as they were perswaded long before, that Numa Pompilius was taught by the Nymphe AEgeria. Furthermore, it seemeth that some had the like opinion of Scipio, as in olde time they had of Alexander king of MACEDON, to wete: that oftentimes there was a snake seene in his mothers chamber. But let these things go. Scipio departing out of ITALY with ten thowsand footemen, & a fleete of thirty gallies, euery one of the hauing fiue owers to a bank he sailed into SPAYNE, & in few dayes arriuing at EMPORIA, he landed his men, and marched by land to TARRACON. There he kept a counsell, and many Ambassadors of the cities their confederats came thither, who being curteously receyued, returned to their lodgings with F such answer as they liked. After this, Scipio beeing carefully bent to prosecute the warre he had taken vpon him, he thought it best to ioyne the remayne of the olde bandes with his army, which had bene saued through the manhood and valiantnes of Lucius Martius. For after both the Scipioes were slayne, and both SPAYNES almost lost, and the ROMANE legions also A ouerthrowen and put to flight: L. Martius a ROMANE Knight, hauing gathered together the remnant of both armies, resisted (beyond all hope of man) the enemies puffed vp with glory of the victorie they had gotten, and with great valiantnes, and vnspeakeable industry he main-teyned warre in SPAYNE, against three Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS. Now Scipio being comen to this army that lay in garrison for the winter time, euery man did certainly perswade them selues that the warre should prosper: and when they sawe him, they remembred their old Captaines, insomuch that there was neuer a souldier could haue his fill, with looking vp-on this young man. Howbeit, after he had commended the souldiers for their noble corage, not dispayring for the calamitie of their contry: he greatly honored Lucius Martius, to shewe, that who so trusteth in his owne vertues, neede not enuy the glory of another man. So winter B being past, he tooke the old and newe bands out of the garrisons, and first of all determined to goe and lay siege vnto new CARTHAGE. For of all the cities of SPAYNE it was the wealthiest, and none more meeter to make warre both by sea & land, then that. Moreouer, the captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS had bestowed in this citie all their munition, and greatest treasure: and left a strong garrison, both in the citie, and castel. But the Captaines them selues were de-uided in diuers contries, to the end that they three might kepe the whole region from spoile, least of all looking then that CARTHAGE should be beseeged. So Scipio hauing put all in rea-dines, he came to beseege new CARTHAGE with all his army both by sea and land. This semed to be a maruelous hard enterprise, and would continue long, both bicause the citie was very strong of it selfe, and also for that the men within it were so coragious: that they did not one- C ly thinke them selues able to defend the citie, but their harts serued them also to make salyes out vpon the enemie, and to skirmish with them, euen to the very trenches of the ROMANES campe. Howbeit it happeneth often, that what a man can not attaine by force, he may winne by industrie. Now Scipio knew, that the lake or mer which is not farre from the walls of CAR-THAGE, did ebbe and flowe with the tyde, and that it was passable by forde on that side where they might easliest come to the walles: So, he thinking to imbrace this occasion, and that he could not possibly meete with a better deuise to take CARTHAGE: when he saw his time, he set his men in battell ray, and hauing deuided them into seuerall squadrons, gaue a more desperat assault vnto the citie, then he had done before. In the meane time, he chose out a band of the valianteste men he had, and commaunded them to wade ouer the lake, and to scale the walles D on that side, where they within the towne made least accompt of it. So, these souldiers that were commaunded to giue this attempt, after they had passed ouer the lake without any let or trouble: they found that part of the wall without any watche or garde, bicause the greatest fury of the fight, was on the other side of the citie. Therefore they easily getting vp on the wal, came and assayled the enemies behind them. The citizens, and those of the garrison, perceyuing they were vnwares fallen into that great daunger: they immediatly forsooke the walles, and seeing them selues charged on euery side, betooke them to their legges, and fled. The RO-MANES pursued them so hottely, that they wanne the citie, and sacked it: where they found a wonderfull great spoyle, and aboundance of all things necessary for warre. Scipio greatly praysed his souldiers, & did reward them, for that they had done so valiant seruice. Howbeit when E he should come to giue the scaling crowne of the wals, vnto the first man that got vp vpon the wall: there were two souldiers at such variance for the matter, that all the army was in daunget of diuision and mutinie vpon that occasion. Thereuppon Scipio called his men together, and in open assembly told them, that he knewe they both got vp on the wall together, and so gaue them both a scaling crowne: & by this meanes their tumult was presently pacified. Afterwards he sent vnto all the cities of SPAYNE, the hostages that were found in the city, which were a maruelous number: the which wanne him great fame for his curtesie and clemency, whereby he allured many nations to yeld them selues vnto the ROMANES, and to forsake the CARTHAGINIANS. But one thinge aboue all the rest, chiefly increased his prayse, and wanne him great loue and good will, as a myrror and example of all vertue. There was a young Lady F taken prisoner, that in beautie excelled all the women in CARTHAGE: whome he carefully caused to be kept, and preserued from violence and dishonor. And afterwards when he knew Mago, Haſdrubal Barcinian, Haſdrubal Giſgo, the three famous Captaines of the Carthaginiās.

The three Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS (Mago, Haſdrubal BARCINIAN, and the other Haſdrubal, the ſonne of Giſgo) knowing that the loſſe of new CARTHAGE did them great hurt, as well in the impairing of their credit with other ſtraunge nations, as alſo by the coniecture diuers made of the ſucceſſe of this warre: they firſt practiſed to diſſemble the loſſe of it, and then in ſpeach to make light of it as much as they could. Scipio hauing ioined vnto him diuers

B nations and Princes of SPAYNE, (among the which were the two litle kings, Mandonius, and Indibilis) vnderſtanding where Haſdrubal BARCINIAN lay: he marched towards him with his armie, to fight with him, before Mago and the other Haſdrubal came to ioyne with him. Haſdrubal BARCINIAN lay in campe by the riuer of Beſula, & was verie deſirous to fight, truſting wholly to his ſtrength and army. But when he heard that Scipio was at hand, he left the valley, and got to a hill of pretie ſtrength. The ROMANE legions followed him, and gaue him no reſpit, but purſued ſo neere, that they came and aſſaulted his campe at their firſt comming. So they fought it out vpon the trenches and rampers, as if they had bene at the aſſault of a citie. The CARTHAGINIANS truſting to the ſtrength of the place, and driuen vnto it of neceſſitie, (the which maketh cowards moſt deſperat) they valliantly reſiſted their enemies the beſt they

The ROMANES in contrarie maner, being valliant, and full of good hope, fought it out luſtely like men, and the fight was ſo muche more cruell, for that it was in the ſight of their Generall Scipio, and of all the armie beſides: inſomuch that their valliant ſeruice there could not be hidden. Therefore they neuer gaue ouer the aſſault, vntill that hauing done their vttermoſt endeuor, they got vp vpon the rampers, and entred in diuers places into the enemies campe, and made them flie. Haſdrubal, Captaine of the CARTHAGINIANS, ſaued him ſelfe by flying, with a few with him, before the ROMANES entred into their fort. After this battell, Scipio according to his maner, cauſed all the ſpaniſh priſoners to be brought before him, and then gaue them libertie to depart, without paying of raunſome. Among the priſoners, there was a young gentleman of the kings blood, and nephew vnto Maſiniſſa, whom when he had

D vſed verie honorably, he ſent vnto Maſiniſſa, with great and rich gifts: to ſhew thereby, that a Generall of an army ſhould be as bountifull & full of ciuill vertues, as otherwiſe skilfull & expert in martiall diſcipline. For the ende of warre is victorie: the benefit whereof conſiſteth in bountie, and clemencie. From thence commeth the glorie and all other praiſes due to Captaines: as it happened in thoſe things whereof we now treate. For a great number of SPANYARDS being preſent, wondering at the great clemencie of the Generall of the ROMANES: they coulde doe no leſſe but call him king, to honor and recompence his vertue. But Scipio ſtrake that word dead ſtraight, the which was no common ſound to the ROMANES eares, and therefore he would by no meanes allow that title, which he knewe to be hateſull to the noble men of his contrie, and alſo vnmeete for the libertie of the ROMANES. E NYARDS, that if they had any mind & deſire not to ſhew them ſelues vnthankefull to him: that then they would be faithfull and louing to the people of ROME. So whileſt theſe things were done by Scipio, the other two Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, (Mago, and Haſdrubal, the ſonne of Giſgo) after they vnderſtoode of the ouerthrowe of their men by the riuer of Beſula: they made all the ſpeede they could to ioyne together, and ſhortly after came and met with Haſdrubal BARCINIAN, to conſult together, and to take order for the warre. So after they had layed their heades together, and conſidered all thinges, they concluded thus: that Haſdrubal

F CARTHAGE, & ſhould not fight with the ROMANES vntill all their forces looked for were aſſembled, and ſo might make a great and puiſant armie. When Haſdrubal was gone into ITALIE, Hanno was ſent from CARTHAGE in his place. But practiſing in his iorney to make the CELTIBERIANS to rebell, M. Syllanus came and ſet vpon him by Scipios commaundement, and was so fortunate, that he ouercame him in battell, and tooke him prisoner. Nowe there A was a citie which the contrie men called ORINGE, the which was verie wealthie, and meete to renewe the warre. Lucius Scipio was sent thither with parte of the armie to besiege it: but finding it a verie strong scituacion, and too well manned to take it at the first assault, he enuironned the towne, and within few dayes tooke and sacked it. Winter came on a pace, and the time of the yeare made them both to retire into their garrisõs, for the winter. So Scipio hauing had so good fortune in this warre, he went vnto TARRACON: Mago, and the other Hasdrubal, the sonne of Gisgo, went to the sea side. The next sommer, warres growing more bloody and cruell then before in the lower SPAYNE, the ROMANES and CARTHAGINIANS met, and ioyned battell by the riuer of Besula, and fought set battells. After they had fought a long time together, Scipio at length got the victorie, & made the enemies flie: (of the which there were B slaine a great number in the field) and geuing them no leasure to gather together againe, and to make head against him, he fought with them, and followed the chase so hottely, that Hasdrubal and Mago were driuen to leaue the maine land, and to flie to GADES, after they had lost all their armie. In the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS, there was a young man of a noble corage, and verie wise, called Masinissa, who finding meanes to haue secret conference with Syllanus, he was the first man that offred him frendshippe, either being brought to it through Scipioes liberalitie, or else bicause he thought the time was come, that it was the sureste way to take part with the ROMANES, which were the conquerors. It is that Masinissa that afterwards, Masinissa offereth his frendshippe vnto the Romanes.

(through the goodnes of the ROMANES) became the great and mighty king of NVMIDIA, and in deede he was diuers wayes a profitable frende vnto the ROMANES. Furthermore, the selfe C same yeare, (which was the fourteenth of the seconde warre with the AFRICANS) SPAYNE was the first nation and people of the vpland men dwelling in the hart of the realme, that was conquered vnder the happie conduct of the Viceconsul Scipio: howbeit it was the last realme that was made a prouince long time after, by Augustus Cæsar. Now Scipio not contenting him self with the great victories he had obteined, in verie short time in SPAYNE (for he had an imagination & good hope also to cõquer AFRICKE) he thought that his best way, to make all the meanes he could possible to get Syphax, king of the MASÆSYLIANS, a frend to the ROMANES.

Wherefore after he had felt the kinges minde, perceiuing that he was well inclined to make league with the ROMANES: he presently set all his other affaires aside, and sailed into AFRIKE with two gallies onely, at fiue owers to a bancke. At the selfe same time also came Hasdrubal, D the sonne of Gisgo thither, from GADES: so that both these valliant & lusty Captaines came of purpose to the king, enuying one the other, to craue the kinges good will, vnto their contrie and common wealth. Syphax welcomed them both into his Court, and did vse them verie honorably and curteouslie, and appointed that they should both eate at one table, and lye in one selfe chamber, bicause the one shoulde not thinke his enterteinment better then the other. It is reported, that Hasdrubal wondering at the magnanimity and great wisedom of Scipio that was present, he considered with him selfe the great daunger the citie of CARTHAGE and all AFRIKE besides was in, through that mans meanes: for he saw him yet a young man, quicke, and excellent in all manner of great vertues, and that had continuallie obtained such victories, and therefore considering the lustie youth of this gentleman, he imagined that it E was vnpossible to perswade him to imbrace peace, rather then warre. Besides, he was affraied also that Syphax, moued by the personage and authoritie of him that was present, would take parte with the ROMANES: and in deede his minde gaue him rightlie, for so it happened. For though Syphax at the first shewed him selfe indifferent to them both, and had moued talke to end the warre betwext the ROMANES and the CARTHAGINIANS: yet afterwards when Scipio tolde him he coulde conclude no peace without consent of the Senate of ROME, he reiected Hasdrubal, and inclining to Scipioes requeste, he made league with the people of ROME. So Scipio being returned againe into SPAYNE, him selfe partely by force, and partely also by L. Martius meanes, conquered ILITVRGIVM, CASTVLO, and certaine other places that refused to yeeld them selues vnto the ROMANES. And to the end nothing should be lacking for all kinde F of sports and pleasures, after he had so fortunatelie obtained so many famous victories: when

The fight was verie lamentable & grieuous to the beholders: but the death of him that was ſlaine, troubled them much more, for they were both couſin germaines. After all this, Scipio hauing his mind ſtill occupied in matters of greater waight and importance, then thoſe which he had already brought to paſſe: he fell ſicke. His ſickenes being caried through all SPAYNE, and as it happeneth often, his diſeaſe being reported to be muche greater and daungerous then it was in deede: thereuppon, not only the nations of SPAYNE beganne to riſe in hope of chaunge, but

Afterwardes alſo, the report of his ſickenes, and daunger of his life being ſpred abroad in the armie, raiſed ſuche a rebellion among them: that ſome of them litle regarding the authoritie and commaundement of the head Captaines of the bands, they draue them away, and choſe two meane ſouldiers for their Captaines, who preſumptuouſlie tooke vpon them the name geuen vnto them by men of no authority, and yet with more arrogancie, made the bundells of roddes and axes to be caried before them. Such follie doth furie and vaine ambicion oftentimes worke in mens minds. On the other ſide, the SPANYARDS ſlept not, and ſpecially Mandonius and Indibilis: who aſpiring to the kingdom of SPAYNE, came to Scipio when he was conqueror, after he had taken newe

So after they had heard, not onely of Scipios ſicknes, but alſo how he was at deathes dore, and did beleue it: they preſentlie leauied an armie, and went and made warre with the SVESSITANS which were confederates of the ROMANES. But Scipio being recouered againe of his ſickenes, like as vpon the falſe rumor of his death euery man beganne to riſe: euen ſo after the truth was knowen in deede of his recouerie, they were all put downe againe, and not a man of them durſt proceede any further in their rebellion. Scipio being more skilfull in martiall diſcipline, then acquainted with ſedition and

The ſouldiers obeyed his commaundement, ſome of them making their fault leſſe then it was, as men doe often flatter themſelues: others alſo trofting to the Captaines clemencie, as knowing him not to be extreame in puniſhment. How beit the next day after they were come into the towne, they were brought into the market place: where their armor and weapons being taken from them, they were enuironned with all the legions armie. Then the ROMANE Generall ſitting in place of iudgement, ſhowed him ſelfe before all the compani in as good health & good diſpoſition of bodie, as euer he was in all his youth. Then he made a ſharp & bitter oration, full of grieuous complaints: inſomuch as there was not one of all the ſouldiers that were vnarmed, that durſt caſt vp their eyes, or looke their Generall in the face, they were ſo aſhamed. For their conſciences did accuſe them for the fault they had committed, and the feare of death did take their wits and ſences from brought forth before the whole assembly, who, after they had bene whipped according to the maner, were presently beheaded, the which was a fearefull and lamentable sight to the beholders. These matters thus pacified, Scipio made all the other souldiers to be sworne againe, and then went and proclaimed warre against Mandonius and Indibilis. For they considering with them selues, howe the ROMANE souldiers that had rebelled in the campe, were put to death: they were out of hope to obtaine any pardon. Therefore they had leauied an army of twentie thowsand footemen, & two thowsand horsemen, and came downe with them against the ROMANES. Scipio hauing intelligence thereof, before that the kings could increase their army, & that other nations could rebel: he departed from CARTHAGE, & went with as great speede as he could to meete with the enemy. The kings were camped in a very strong place, and trusted so to their army, that they were not determined to prouoke the enemy, nor also to refuse the battel if it were offred them. Howbeit it chaunced by the nerenes of both campes, that within few dayes, they being prouoked by the ROMANES, came downe & set their men in battell ray, & ioyned battell with Scipio: so that a good while together, the fight was very bloody & cruel. But at length the SPANYARDS seeing them selues compassed in behinde, and being driuen to fight in a ring to defend the enemy on euery side, they were ouercome: so that the third parte of them scarcely saued them selues by flying. Mandonius & Indibilis seeing them selues vtterly vndone, & that there was no hope nor remedy left: they sent Ambassadors vnto Scipio, humbly to pray him to receiue them to mercy, and to pardon them. But Scipio knowing right well how greatly they had offended him, and the ROMANES, yet thinking it more honorable to ouercome the enemie by curtesie and clemency, then by force: he did pardon them, and only cõmaunded them to geue him money to pay his souldiers. In the meane time Masinissa came from GADES, & landed: bicause he would him selfe in person confirme the frendship he had offered Scipio in his absence, by the meanes of M. Syllanus, and also speake with him face to face, whom he iudged to be a worthie man, for the famous victories he had obteined. And in truth Masinissa was not deceiued in the opinion he had of the valliantnes & vertues of Scipio, but found him the selfe same man whom he before had imagined him to be in his minde: the which but seldom happeneth so notwithstanding. For besides the great rare giftes of nature that Scipio had aboue all others, there was in him also a certaine Princely grace and maiestie. Furthermore, he was maruelous gentle & curteous vnto them that came to him, and had an eloquent tongue, and a passing gift to winne euerie man. He was verie graue in his gesture and behauiour, and euer ware long heare. Masinissa being come to salute him, when he sawe him, he had him in suche admiration as it is reported, that he could not cast his eyes of him, nor haue his fill of looking on him. So he thanked him maruelously for sending his Nephewe vnto him, and promised him that his deedes shoulde confirme and witnesse the frendshippe agreed vpon betwene them: the which he euer after inuiolablie kept vnto the ROMANES, euen to the hower of his death. So all the nations of SPAYNE became subiect to the Empire of ROME, or at the least their confederates: whereupon those of GADES also following the example of others, came and yeelded them selues vnto the ROMANES. This is a verie auncient nation, and if we may credit the reporte of it: as CARTHAGE was in AFRIKE, and THEBES in BOEOTIA, so was GADES vpon the sea, a Colony of the TYRIANS. Scipio after he had conquered all SPAYNE, and driuen out the CARTHAGINIANS, considering that there remained nothing more for him to doe: he left the gouernment of the prouince vnto L. Lentulus, and to Manlius Acidinus, and returned to ROME. When he was arriued at ROME, the Senate gaue him audience out of the citie, in the temple of Bellona. There, when he had particularly told the of the things he had valliantly, & fortunately brought to end: & further, that he had ouercome foure Captaines in diuers fought fields & also put to flight foure armies of the enemies, & driue the CARTHAGINIANS out of both SPAYNES, & that there was no nation left in all those parts, but was subdued to the ROMANES, the Senate gaue iudgement, that all these things were worthy of a noble triumphe. But bicause neuer man yet was suffred to enter into ROME in triũphe, for any victories he had obtained, whileft he was only but Viceconsul, and had not yet bene Consul: the Senators thought it not good, and Scipio him selfe also made no great sute for it, bicause he would not be an occasion to bring in any newe custome,

A and to breake the olde. So when he came into the citie, he was afterwardes declared Consul, with the great good will and consent of the whole assemblie. It is reported that there neuer came such a world of people to Rome, as were there at that time, not only for the assemblies sake, but more to see P. Cor. Scipio. Wherefore, not the Romanes onely, but all the straungers also that were there, all their eyes were vpon Scipio, and sayd both openly and priuately: that they should send him into Afrike, to make warre with the Carthaginians, at home in their owne contrie. Scipio also being of the same opinion, said, that he would aske aduise of the people, if the Senate would be against such a worthie enterprise. For amongest the peres and Senators, there were some that vehemently inueyed against that opinion, and among the rest, Fabius Maximus speciallie, a man of great fame and authoritie. Scipio went forward with B the matter, and thwarted him, and shewed many reasons that there was no way to ouercome the Carthaginians, and to driue Annibal out of Italie, but that only: and that all other counsells were in vaine, and vnproffitable. After this matter was long debated in counsell, Sicilia was appointed vnto Scipio: and the whole Senate gaue him commission to go with all his armie into Afrike, if he thought it meete and proffitable for the common wealth. The decree of the Senate being published, euerie mans minde ranne of so great enterprises, that they perswaded them selues Afrike was alreadie their owne, and had great hope to end this warre. Howbeit Scipio saw it a hard matter to make his preparation for this iorney, bicause of the pouertie of the common treasure, and for lacke of young men: the flower and choyce of the which was vtterlie gone, by the former great losses and ouerthrowes Annibal had geuen C them. Howebeit to satisfie euerie mans expectacion of him, he made all the possible speede he could, to prepare thinges necessarie for the warres. So diuers people of Thvscan, and of the Vmbrians, offered to helpe him to their best power: some of them gaue him timber to builde his shippes, others holpe him with armor, and others also furnished him with corne, and all other kinde of vittells and munition for his armie. The shippes being built, and all the armie by sea put in readines, in the space of fiue and fortie dayes, a thing incredible to many: Scipio departed out of Italie, and sailed towards Sicile. But when he came to take muster of his armie, he speciallie chose those that had serued long time in the warres, vnder the conduct of M. Marcellus, the which were all esteemed for verie expert souldiers. And for the Sicilians, he partely wanne them by curtesie, and partely by compulsion compelled them to D geue him aide for the warre he tooke in hand, the which he ment to make in Afrike, when the time of the yeare should serue for it. Among other things, it is reported that Scipio chose out of diuers cities, three hundred young gentlemen of the noblest houses of all the sayd prouince, and commaunded them to meete at a certaine day appointed, euerie man with horse and armor. Then comming at the day appointed, according to his commaundement: the Consul bad them choose whether they would followe him in the warres of Afrike, or else deliuer vp their armor & horse, to as many other Romanes as they were in number. So when they all prayed they might be dismissed from the warre, Scipio appointed three hundred other young Romanes in their places, whom he had brought out of Italie with him vnarmed, bicause he would mount and arme them at the Sicilians cost, as in deede it chaunced. Af-
E terwards, they did him great seruice in Afrike, in many great battells. Now time was come on for Scipio to put his armie in garrison for the winter time, when he came to Syracvsa, taking order not only for the preparation of warre, but also for the affaires of Sicilia. There when it was tolde him by complaint of diuers, that there was a great companie of Italian souldiers in that citie, who would not restore the spoiles which they had gotten in the warres, but kept them stil in their hands, notwithstanding that the Senate had enioyned them by speciall commaundement to make restitution to the Syracvsans: he straight compelled them by proclamation, to accomplishe the Senates commaundement. Whereby he wanne all the peoples hartes of Sicilia, and was reported to be a iust and vpright Consul. In the meane time he was aduertised by Caius Lælius, that returned out of Afrike with great spoyle: howe F king Masinissa was very desirous of his comming thither, and that he instantly prayed him he would come into Afrike, as soone as he coulde possible, so it were without the preiudice of the common wealth. Moreouer, that diuers nations and people of Afrike had the like desire: who hating the gouernment of the CARTHAGINIANS, desired nothing more, then some good occasion to rebell. Nowe this iorney was not deferred through Scipioes fault or negligence, considering that such a Captaine could hardly be founde that was more carefull and diligent in his charge then he. Howbeit the affaires of SICILIA, and the oportunitie he had to recouer LOCRES againe, did hinder him that he coulde not bring his purpose to passe according to his minde. Furthermore, his Lieutenaunt Pleminius disorder grieued him much: bicause that hauing left him at LOCRES, he fell to all sortes of insolencie, as to deflowre women, and to spoyle the poore citizens: insomuch that they being maruelously offended with these infinite troubles and villanies offered them, they determined rather to suffer all other things, then to be subiect to the gouernment of so vile & wicked a man. So the Ambassadors of LOCRES being arriued at ROME, and exhibiting their complaintes in open Senate of the great wrongs and iniuries Pleminius did them: the noble men tooke the matter so grieuously, that they made bitter decrees, not only against the same Pleminius, but also against P.C.Scipio himselfe. Wherupon Scipioes enemies hauing gotten matter enough to accuse him, they were then so bold to affirme, that he was acquainted with the iniuries offred the LOCRIANS, with the licentiousnesse of Pleminius, and with the rebellions of his souldiers also: and that he had suffred all these things more negligently, then became the office or duety of a Consul. They added thereto moreouer, that his army he had in SICILE was altogether vnruly & vnseruiceable, & regarded not the ordinances of the campe: and that the Captaine him selfe was careleſſe, & altogether geuen ouer to pleasure and idlenes. But aboue all others, Fabius Maximus was his heauy enemy, and so vehement against him in his words, that he exceded the bounds of all modesty and reason, and thought good to call him presently home out of SICILIA, and to dismisse him of his charge. This decree was thought of all men very straight, & extreame. Wherefore following Quintus Metellus counsell, the Senators appointed ten Ambassadors to go into SICILIA, to make diligent inquiery, whether the accusations obiected against Scipio were true: and if they found him in fault, that then they should commaund him in the name of the Senate presently to returne into ITALY. And on the other side, if they foūd that he was vniustly accused, and only through the procurement of his malicious enemies & detracters: then that they should send him to his armie, and encorage him valliantly to go forward with this warre. So when the Ambassadors were arriued in SICILIA, after they had made diligent inquiery according to the articles of their commission: they coulde not finde that Scipio was faultie in any thing, sauing that he had too lightly passed ouer the wrongs and iniuries Pleminius had done vnto the LOCRIANS. For Scipio was verie liberall in rewarding of his men, and exceeding curteous and mercifull also in punishing of them. But when they saw his army, his shippes, and all his other furniture and munition for warre: it is reported that they wondred so much to see the great aboundance and good order taken for all thinges, that when they returned to ROME, they greatly commended Scipio, and reiecting all the accusations of his accusers, they did promise the Senate and people of ROME, assured hope of victory. So when all these home troubles at ROME were taken away, there chaunced other outward troubles a broad that grieued him much. For the Ambassadors of king Syphax came and told him that their maister had made new league with the CARTHAGINIANS, & was become frend to Hasdrubal, whose daughter he had maried: and therefore that he wished him if he ment to do his contry good, to make no attempt vpon AFRIKE, for he was determined to reckon the CARTHAGINIANS frends his, & also to set vpon them whom the CARTHAGINIANS account their enemies. Scipio quickelie returned the Ambassadors againe vnto Syphax, bicause the effect of their comming should not be blowen abroad in his campe: & gaue them letters, in the which he praied king Syphax, that remembring his league and faithfull promise, he should beware he attempted nothing vnworthy the name of a ROMANE, and faith of a king. Afterwards calling his men together, he told thē, that the Ambassadors of king Syphax were come into SICILE, to complaine of his long tarying, as Masinissa had done before. Therefore he was to hasten his iorney to goe into AFRIKE, and thereupon cōmaunded all his souldiers to put them selues in readines, and to prouide all things necessary for their iorney. The Consuls commaundement being published through all SICILE, there repaired immediatlie vnto Lilybea a multitude of people Scipioes nature.

King Syphax reuolteth frō the Romanes.

A people,not only of thoſe that were to ſaile into AFRIKE,but of others alſo that came to ſee the fleete & army of the ROMANES: bicauſe they neuer ſaw an army better furniſhed, nor ſet out with all things neceſſary for warre, nor better repleniſhed with ſouldiers,then that. So Scipio, all things being ready,imbarked at LILYBEA with ſo earneſt a deſire to paſſe ouer the ſea,that neither owers nor wind did content his minde. Yet he was brought in few daies ſailing, to the promontory or mountaine called ſayer, and there he put all his men a land. The newes of his arriual flying ſtraight to CARTHAGE,all the city was preſently in ſuch an vprore,that ſodainly they ſounded the alarom,and garded the gates & walls,as appeareth by teſtimony of ſome in writing. For from M. Regulus time,vnto that preſent day,it was almoſt fifty yeares ſpace ſince any ROMANE Captaine euer entred AFRIKE with force of armes. And therefore it was no
B maruell though they were affrayed,and grew to vprore. The name of Scipio did encreaſe their feare the more, bicauſe the CARTHAGINIANS had no Captaine matchable with him. Haſdrubal the ſonne of Giſgo had the name at that time of a luſty Captaine, whom they knew had notwithſtanding bene ouercome, and driuen out of SPAYNE by Scipio. Howbeit putting all the hope & ſafety of their contry in him,& in king Syphax that mighty king:they neuer left intreating the one,nor perſwading the other, to come & helpe the affaires of AFRIKE, with all the ſpede they could poſſible. So,whileſt they two were preparing to ioyne both their armies together, Annibal the ſonne of Hamilcar, being appointed to kepe the next contry adioyning to it,came againſt the ROMANES. Scipio after he had deſtroyed the contry, & enriched his army with great ſpoyle:he camped by the city of VTICA,to ſee if it were poſſible for him to win
C ſo noble and wealthy a city, and being beſides ſo commodious for the warres both by ſea and land. At the ſelfe ſame time Maſiniſſa came to the ROMANES campe, and was inflamed with a vehement deſire to make warre againſt king Syphax, by whom he had before bene driuen out of his kingdom & inheritance. Scipio, that had knowen him in SPAYNE, a young Prince of an excellent wit, and quicke & valliant of his hand: he ſent him to diſcouer the army of the enemies, before the CARTHAGINIANS could gather any greater power, and willed him to vſe all the deuiſe and meanes he coulde poſſible to intiſe Hanno to fight. Maſiniſſa as he was commaunded,began to prouoke the enemy,and drawing him out by litle & litle, he brought him where Scipio lay with all his legions armed, looking for a good hower to fight. The armie of the enemies was nowe wearied, when the ROMANES came to ſet vpon them with their freſhe
D army. Hanno at the firſt onſet was ouercomen, & ſlaine, with moſt of his men: and all the reſt fled,and diſperſed them ſelues here and there,where they thought they might beſt ſcape. After this victory, Scipio returning backe againe to beſiege the city of VTICA: the ſodaine comming of Haſdrubal and king Syphax,made him to leaue of his enterpriſe,for that they brought with them a great army both of footemen & horſemen,and came and camped not farre from the ROMANES. Scipio perceiuing that, raiſed his ſiege immediatly, and came and fortified his campe vpon a hill,from whence he might go & fight with the enemy,and moleſt them of VTICA,and alſo keepe his ſhippes ſafe that road at ancker. Howbeit the time of the yeare being comen, that both armies were to diſpoſe their men in garriſons for the winter ſeaſon: he determined to ſend vnto king Syphax to feele his minde,and to make him leaue the frendſhippe E of the CARTHAGINIANS if it were poſſible. For he knew well it was his mariage with Sophonisba, that through her flattering perſwaſions had brought him to that furie, that he had not only forſaken the frendſhippe of the ROMANES,but alſo ment to deſtroy them,contrary to his faith and promiſe: and that if he had once ſatisfied the heate of his loue with her, he thought then he might be called home againe. Syphax hauing vnderſtoode Scipioes meſſage ſent him, he anſwered,that in dede it was time not only to leaue the league with the CARTHAGINIANS, but alſo to geue vp all thought of warre: and ſo promiſed, that he would be a good meane to make peace. Scipio gaue good eare vnto it, and caught holde of an excellent fine deuiſe. He choſe the valliantеſt ſouldiers in his army, apparelled them like ſlaues, and made them waite vpon the Ambaſſadors, and gaue them inſtructions what they ſhoulde doe. Theſe fellowes, F whileſt the Ambaſſadors and king Syphax were in talke together,about the articles and condicions of peace, and that the conſultation helde lenger then it was wont to doe: they went and walked vp and downe through the enemies campe, to ſee all the wayes and entries into it, according vnto Scipioes inſtructions. After they had done this diuers times, they came a- A gaine to Scipio. Truce was taken for a time, the which being expired, Scipio ſeemed to make preparation for warres, (as being out of hope of any peace) & to make his army ready by ſea, preparing engines of batterie to returne to beſiege VTICA, as he had done before. He gaue out this rumor through all the contry, to perſwade his enemies that it was true: howbeit hauing called the Captaines & pety Captaines of his army together, he made them priuy to his intent & enterpriſe. He told them that both the enemies campes lay not farre a ſunder, of the which, the one of them had all their tents & cabbons of wodde: and the building of the other campe was all of reedes, ſo that they were both eaſie to be burnt. Wherupon hauing ſent for Maſiniſſa, and Caius Lælius to come vnto him, he gaue them charge about midnight to geue alarom vnto Syphax campe, and to ſet it a fire: and that he him ſelfe on the other ſide, would ſet B vpon the CARTHAGINIANS campe. They two obeying Scipioes commaundement, performed his will without delay, & came at the hower appointed thē to aſſaile the NVMIDIANS campe, and ſo did ſet the houſes of reedes afire, which tooke fire in ſuch ſort, as the flame was immediatly rounde about the campe. The NVMIDIANS at the firſt, thinking the fire had comen by misfortune, ranne thither ſtraight vnarmed to quench it. But when they found them ſelues among the legions of the ROMANES, and that there was nothing but killing downe right, ſeeing them ſelues ſo compaſſed in on all ſides, they ſaw their beſt remedie was to flie. On the other ſide alſo, where Scipioes army was: the CARTHAGINIAANS campe was almoſt all burnt, A maruelous great ſlaughter of the Carthaginiās. an the enemies put to flight with ſuch cruell ſlaughter, that ſome wryters affirme there were ſlaine that night about fortie thowſand men, as well CARTHAGINIANS as NVMIDIANS. This C great ouerthrow and ſlaughter being caried to CARTHAGE, did put the citizens there in ſuch a feare and terror, that ſome thought beſt to ſend for Annibal out of ITALIE: and others gaue aduiſe to make peace with Scipio. Howbeit the BARCINIAN faction which was rich and wealthy, & altogether againſt the peace makers: they ſo preuailed, that they leauied a new power to begin warre againe. King Syphax and Haſdrubal, hauing leauied a great multitude of footemen and horſemen againe, renewed their armie ſooner then was looked for, and came againe to pitche their campe directly ouer againſt the enemies. Scipio hauing vnderſtanding of that, would not tary, but determined to geue them battell, whileſt his men were in good hart, and willing to fight. So it chaunced at the firſt, by the neerenes of both their campes, that there were certaine skirmiſhes: but in the end, the armies came to ioyne battell, and the ROMANES D fought with ſuch corage & terror, that at the firſt onſet, they made the NVMIDIANS & CARTHAGINIANS flie, and ſlue the moſt part of them. Haſdrubal and Syphax ſcaped, by flying out of the ſlaughter. Scipio ſent Maſiniſſa, & Caius Lælius with the light horſemen to giue them chaſe. Syphax being comen into NVMIDIA, & from thence into his owne realme & kingdom he leauied an army in haſt, of all ſorts of people, & came to meete with Maſiniſſa & Caius Lælius, and was not affrayed to geue them battell. But it was a fond parte of him, conſidering that he was nothing like ſo ſtrong as his enemy, neither for nūber of fighting men, nor yet in likelyhood of ſouldiers. For neither the ſouldiers, nor Captaines of his army were matchable with the ſouldiers & Captaines of the ROMANES cāpe: & therfore king Syphax was eaſily ouercome by ſuch whom Maſiniſſa wold hardly haue looked for: & thē they were brought vnto Scipio. At the firſt there was a maruelous ioy amōg thē, when it was told thē that king Syphax ſhould be brought priſoner vnto the cāpe: but afterwards when they ſaw him bound, they were al ſory to ſee him in ſuch pityfull ſtate, remēbring his former greatnes & regall maieſty. For they called to mind how famous the name of this king had bene but a litle before, what wonderful great wealth he had, & alſo the power of ſo great a realme & kingdom. Howbeit Scipio the ROMANE Conſul, receiued him very curteouſly, & gently asked him what he ment to chaunge his mind in that ſort, & what moued him to make warre with the ROMANES. Then the king remēbring his former frendſhip & faithful promiſe broken, he boldly told him, that it was the loue he bare to his wife Sophonisba, who only had procured him to deale ſo diſhonorably with the ROMANES: how- F beit, that he had ſo ſmarted for it, as all others might take example by him, and beware how they breake their promiſe. And yet, that this was a great comfort to him in his extreame miſery,

A fery, to see that his mortall enemy Masinissa was also taken with that frantic and mad humor, wherewith he before was possessed. For after Syphax was ouercome and taken, Masinissa went vnto CYRTHA, the chiefe city of the realme, the which he wan, and found Sophonisba there, with whom he fell in fancy: who after she had finely wrapped him in with her deceitfull flatteries and kindnes, he promised her also to deliuer her out of the ROMANES handes: & bicause he might the better performe his promise made, he tooke her to his wife, & married her. Whe Scipio was informed of these things, it grieued him maruelously. For it was knowen to all men, that Syphax was ouercome vnder the conduct, & through the ROMANES meanes: and therefore all that was belonging to Syphax, was at the disposition of the ROMANES. Wherefore if Masinissa had without Scipioes consent, vndertaken to defend Sophonisbaes quarrell: then it appeared plainly, he despised the authority of the Consul, & the maiesty of the people of ROME. Furthermore, his filthie lust did agrauate his fault the more, the which seemed so much more intollerable, by how much the continency of the ROMANE Consul was the greater, the which Masinissa saw daily before his eyes, and might haue bene a paterne and example vnto him. For Scipio, besides many other proofes and shewes of his vertues, in all places where he obtayned victory, he alwayes kept the women vndefiled, which were taken prisoners. So, Scipio being much offended with Masinissa, (though he shewed it not before company) receiued him very louingly at his returne to the campe: yet afterwards notwithstanding, taking him aside, he so sharply reproued him, that he made him know what it was to obey a moderate, and also a seuere Captaine. Whereupon Masinissa went into his tent and wept, & could not tell what way he should take: howbeit shortly after, perceiuing that it was vnpossible for him to keepe promise with Sophonisba, which grieued him to the hart: he sent her poyson, & a message withall, the which she dranke immediatly, & so willingly made her selfe away. Furthermore the CARTHAGINIANS after they had receiued such wonderfull great losses and ouerthrowes, one after an other, perceiuing that their affaires were brought to suche a straight and extreamitie, that they were no more to looke after the inlarging of their dominions, but only to cõsider which way they might keepe their owne contry: they sent for Annibal to come out of ITALIE. Who returning with great speede into AFRIKE, before he did any thing else, he thought good first to talke with P. Scipio about peace: either bicause he was affrayed of the good fortune of this young man, or else for that he mistrusted he coulde not otherwise helpe his contrie and common wealth, which he saw decaying, & like to be destroied. Wherfore a place was appointed, where they might meete according to his desire: where when they were both met, they had long talke together about the ending of this warre. In the end, Scipio offred Annibal such condicions of peace, that by them it appeared the ROMANES were not wearie of warre, and that Scipio him selfe being a young man, had better hope to obtaine victorie, then great desire to hearken to peace. So, all hope of peace being set aside, they brake of their talke, and the next morning two famous and worthie Captaines of the most noble nations that could be, prepared them selues to battell, either to geue or take away in short time from their cõmon weales, the seigniorie and Empire of all the worlde. The place where they imployed all their force, and where this famous battell was fought, as it is reported, was by the citie of ZAMA: in the which the ROMANES being conquerors, did first make the Elephants flie, then the horsemen, and in the ende brake so fiercely into the footemen, that they ouerthrew all the armie. It is reported that there were slaine and taken by the ROMANES, aboue fortie thowsande CARTHAGINIANS. Annibal fled out of the fury of the battell, & saued him selfe, though that day he had shewed him selfe like a valliant and famous Captaine. For at this battell he had set his armie in better order then euer he had done before, and had strengthened it, both with the commoditie of the place, and relefe besides: and euen in the verie furie and terrur of the battell he so bestirred him selfe among his souldiers, that the enemies them selues did commend & praise him, for a noble Captaine. After this victory, Scipio meeting with Vermina king Syphax sonne, that brought aide to the CARTHAGINIANS: he put him to flight, and came and brought his army to the walls and hauen of CARTHAGO, thinking (as in deede it fel out) that the CARTHAGINIANS would sue to him for peace. For, as the CARTHAGINIANS before had bene very good souldiers, & readie to make warres: so were they now become timorous & faint harted, specially when they saw their Generall Annibal ouercomen, in whom they chiefly repoſed all A their hope and truſt, for defenſe of their contrie. Wherefore they being (as I haue ſayed) out of hart, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Scipio, to pray him that according to his accuſtomed clemencie he woulde graunt them peace. Nowe was great ſute made at ROME, to haue the go-uernment of the prouince of AFRIKE, and one of the newe Conſuls made haſt to come and make warre, with ſuch charge and preparation as was meete for his dignitie and calling: and therefore Scipio doubting that an other ſhoulde carie away the glorie for ending of ſo great a warre, he was the better contented to yeeld to the CARTHAGINIAN Ambaſſadors requeſtes.

So, the capitulaciō of the articles of peace was offred vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, according to the conquerors mind: and beſides all other things, the whole fleete of all their ſhippes and gallies (in the which conſiſted much their hope) were taken from them. For when the whole B fleete was burnt, it was ſuch a lamentable ſight vnto them all, that there was no other thing but weeping and lamenting through the whole city, as if CARTHAGE had bene deſtroied and raſed to the very ground. For as ſome doe write, there were fiue hundred ſhippes burnt of all ſortes. Theſe things therefore ſhould make vs all beware of humaine frayeltie, the which we often forget in our proſperitie. For they that before perſwaded them ſelues to conquer the world, after they had wonne ſo many great battells and victories of the enemie, and in maner conquered all ITALIE, and ſo valliantly beſides beſieged the city of ROME: were in ſhort time after brought to ſuch miſery and extreamity, that all their power and force being ouercome, they had left them no more but the walls of CARTHAGE, and yet they were not ſure to keepe them, but through the ſpeciall grace and fauor of the enemie. After theſe things were done, C Scipio by decree of the Senate, did not only reſtore king Maſiniſſa to his realme againe, but alſo adding thereunto the beſt part of all king Syphax contrie, they made him one of the mightieſt kings of all AFRIKE: and afterwards he gaue honorable gifts vnto euery man as he had deſer-ued. In fine, after he had ſet all the affaires of AFRIKE at good ſtay, he brought his army backe againe into ITALIE: at what time there came to ROME a world of people, to ſee ſo great and famous a Captaine, returning from ſuch wonderfull great victories. So he entred into ROME with pompe of triumphe, Terentius Culeo following of him with a hatte on his head, bicauſe that through his fauor and frendſhip he was taken out of bondage. Polybius wryteth, that king Syphax was led in triumphe: howbeit ſome ſay he dyed before Scipio triumphed. In deede di-uers that did triumphe, ſome before him during the warres of the CARTHAGINIANS, and o- D thers afterwards in the warres of MACEDONIA & ASIA, they made greater ſhew of plate, both of gold and ſiluer in their triumphe, and led alſo a greater number of priſoners: howbeit one onely Annibal that was ouercome, and the glorie of ſo great a warre ended, did make the triumphe of P. Scipio ſo excellent and famous, that it farre paſſed all the golde and magnificent pompe of all others triumphes. For after AFRIKE was conquered, no nation then was aſha-med to be ouercome by the ROMANES. For he made this prouince, as it were a bridge and open paſſage to increaſe and enlarge the Empire of ROME, both in MACEDON, and alſo in A-SIA, and in other parts of the world beſides. Now Scipio (whom I may rightly call AFRICAN, after the conqueſt of AFRIKE) being returned to ROME, he lacked no temporall dignities nor honors. For in the counſell holden for the election of Cenſors, although there were diuers o- E thers of the nobleſt houſes of ROME that ſued for that office: yet he him ſelfe, and AElius Pe-tus were preferred before all the reſt, and after they were created Cenſors, they did gouerne in their office like good men, and with good quietnes. Afterwards the Cenſors that followed them, did ſtill one after an other chooſe Scipio AFRICAN Prince of the Senate: the which dignitie was wont to be geuen to them only, that obtained the type of all honor, through their great conqueſts and benefits done to their contry. Shortly after, he was againe choſen Con-ſul with Sempronius Longus, the ſonne of that Sempronius whome Annibal ouercame in that great ouerthrow, at the battell by the riuer of Trebia. They two were the firſt (as it is reported) that deuided the noble men and Senators from the people, in the ſhowe place to ſee paſtime. This ſeparation was verie odious to the people of ROME, and they were marueilouſlie F offended with the Conſuls for it: bicauſe they tooke it, that increaſing the honor of the ſtate of the Senators, they thereby did diſcountenaunce and imbaſe them. Some ſay alſo, that

A Scipio AFRICAN afterwardes repented him ſelfe that he had taken away the olde cuſtome, and brought in a newe. At that time there fell out greate variaunce betweene Maſiniſſa and the CARTHAGINIANS touching their borders and confines. Whereupon the Senate ſent Scipio thither with two other commiſſioners: who after they had heard the cauſe of their quarrell, they left the matter as they founde it, and would proceede no further in it. And this they did, bicauſe that the CARTHAGINIANS being troubled with ciuil warres at home, ſhoulde take vpon them no other warres abroade, neither ſhoulde haue leaſure to attempt any alteracion otherwiſe. For the ROMANES had great warre with king Antiochus, & Annibal CARTHAGINIAN was there with him, who ſtill ſtirred vp the olde enemies againſt the ROMANES, and practiſed to raiſe vp new enemies againſt them, & in all thinges to counſell the CARTHAGI- The craftie counſell of Scipio.

B NIANS to caſt away the yoke of bondage, which the ROMANES had brought them into vnder the title of peace, & to proue the frendſhip of the kings. Howbeit ſhortly after, the ROMANES hauing obtained victorie, and driuen king Antiochus out of GRÆCE, they intended alſo to conquer ASIA: and therefore all their hope was in Scipio AFRICAN, as a man that was borne to ende warres of great importaunce. Howbeit Lucius Scipio, and Caius Lælius were Conſuls, & either of them made ſute for the gouernment of ASIA. The matter being conſulted vpon, the Senate ſtoode doubtfull what iudgement they ſhould geue, betweene two ſo famous men. Howbeit, bicauſe Lælius was in better fauour with the Senate, and in greater eſtimacion: the Senate beganne to take his parte. But when P. Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the elder brother of Lucius Scipio, prayed the Senate that they would not diſhonor his houſe ſo, and tolde them

C that his brother had great vertues in him, and was beſides verie wiſe, and that he himſelfe alſo woulde be his Lieutenaunt: he had no ſooner ſpoken the wordes, but the Senators receiued him with great ioy, and preſentlie did put them all out of doubt. So it was ordayned in open Senate, that Lucius Scipio ſhoulde goe into GRÆCE to make warre with the ÆTOLIANS, and that from thence he ſhoulde goe into ASIA, if he thought good, to make warre with king Antiochus: and alſo that he ſhoulde take his brother Scipio AFRICAN with him, bicauſe he ſhoulde goe againſt Annibal, that was in Antiochus armie. Who can but wonder at the loue and naturall affection of Publius Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the which he firſt The naturall loue of Scipio African to his brother L. Scipio.

D ſhewed from his youth vnto his father Cornelius, and afterwardes alſo vnto his brother Lucius Scipio, conſidering the great thinges he had done? For, notwithſtanding he was that AFRICAN by name that had ouercomen Annibal, that had triumphed ouer the CARTHAGINIANS, and excelled all others in praiſe of martiall diſcipline: yet of his owne good nature he made him ſelfe inferiour to his younger brother, bicauſe he might haue the honour of obtayninge the gouernment of that prouince from his fellowe Conſul Lælius, that was ſo well beloued, and of ſo great eſtimacion. Lucius Scipio the Conſul brought great honor to his contrie by that warre, for that he followed the ſownde and faithfull counſell of his brother. For firſt of all goinge into GRÆCE, he tooke truce for ſixe monethes with the ÆTOLIANS, through the aduiſe of his brother AFRICAN: who counſelled him, that ſetting all thinges a parte, he ſhoulde ſtraight goe into ASIA, where the warre was ryfeſt. Afterwards alſo he wanne Pruſias king of BITHYNIA from Antiochus frendſhippe, who before

E was wauing vp & downe, doubtfull which ſide to take, and all through his brother AFRICANS meanes and practiſe. So the authoritie of the AFRICAN was verie great, and all thoſe that woulde obtaine any thing of the Conſul, came firſt to the AFRICAN to be their meane and interceſſor. Nowe when he came into ASIA, Antiochus Ambaſſador, and Heraclides BIZANTINE, came vnto him to offer to make peace, and after they had openly tolde their meſſage, perceiuing that they could not obtaine reaſonable condicions of peace: they priuately talked with Scipio AFRICAN, as they were commaunded, and practiſed the beſt they coulde to make him king Antiochus frende. For they tolde him, that Antiochus would ſende him his younger ſonne which he had taken, and furthermore that he woulde willinglie make him his companion in the gouernment of all his realme, only reſeruing the name and title of the king.

F Howbeit P. Scipio, excelling no leſſe in faithfulneſſe and bountie, then in many other vertues, after he had aunſwered them to all other matters, he tolde them, that for his ſonne he woulde take him for a maruelous frendlie gifte: and that for a priuate good turne, The fidelitie and loue of P. Scipio to his countrie.

he would doe the best he could to requite him with the like. Howbeit, that he would counsell A the king aboue all things to leaue of thought of warre, and to receiue those offers and condi-cions of peace, which the Senate and people of ROME would offer him. Shortly after, Antio- chus sent P. Scipio his sonne according to his promise: who (as it is reported) had bene taken prisoner from the first beginning of the warre, as he went from CHALCIDE, vnto ORICVM: or as other wryters say, as he passed by in a pinnase. Yet some holde opinion, that he was taken as he went to discouer the counsell of the enemies, and that he was then sent againe vnto his father, lying sicke at the citie of ELEA. This great curtesie of king Antiochus was mar-uelous well thought of of the AFRICAN, and not without cause: for to see his sonne after he had bene away so long, it did greatlie lighten his spirites, and diseased bodie. But P. Scipio, to shewe some token of a thankefull minde, prayed the Ambassadors that came vnto him, B greatlie to thanke king Antiochus for the exceeding pleasure he had done him, to sende him his sonne. Afterwardes he gaue Antiochus aduise also that he should not geue battell, till he vnderstoode of his returne from ELEA to the campe. So Antiochus being perswaded by the authoritie of so worthie a man, he kept close in his campe for a certaine time, and determined to drawe the warre out at length, hoping in the ende that he might come to speake with the Consul, by the AFRICANS meanes. But afterwardes, the Consul camping hard by MA-GNESIA, did so vexe and prouoke the enemie, that the king came out to battell, and sette his men in battell raye. It is reported that Annibal him selfe was present at the battell, being one of the Generalls for the king. So Antiochus being ouercome, and his armie discomfited, perceiuing that there was no helpe in his affaires: he came vnto the AFRICAN, (who being C newlie recouered of his sickenes, came to the campe within a litle after the field was wonne) and by his meanes obtayned of the Consul to be contented to talke of peace. When Antio- chus Ambassadors were come to the campe, and that they had humblie craued pardon in the behalfe of their king, and also prayed that they would geue them suche condicions of peace, as they best liked of. Scipio AFRICAN with the consent of them all aunswered them, that it was not the manner of the ROMANES to yeeld to aduersitie, neither also to be prowde in prosperitie: and therefore that he nowe made him the selfe same offers and condicions of peace, which he did before the victorie. That the king shoulde not meddle with EVROPE, that he should surrender vp all he had in ASIA from the mountaine Taurus, vnto the riuer of Tanais: that he shoulde pay tribute twentie yeres together: that he shoulde also put in suche ostages D as the Consul would choose out: and that specially aboue all the rest, they should deliuer An- nibal CARTHAGINIAN vnto the Consul, who was the only author and procurer of this warre.
But he, as we haue wrytten in his life, perceiuing that king Antiochus armie was ouerthro-wen both by sea and by lande, escaped the ROMANES handes, and went vnto Prusias king of BITHYNIA. Antiochus hauing accepted the offers and condicions of peace, sayd, that the RO-MANES vsed him verie fauourablie, to ridde him of so great care, and to appoint him so small a kingdome. For great kingdomes, and ouermuch wealth which euerie man coueteth, are full of great and sundrie troubles: insomuch that Theocritus wordes are as true, as otherwise excellently written.

So when the mightie king of ASIA was ouercomen, and that so great a warre was so ea-sylie ended beyonde all mens opinion: the Consul L. Scipio returned to ROME, and made his entrie into the citie, shewing a great and honorable triumphe. He also deserued the surname of the prouince and contrie subdued by him. So that as his elder brother before was

Scipioes

A Scipioes and Cornelians floriſhed, with ſupreame degree of honor: and the authoritie of Scipio AFRICAN was growen to ſuch height and greatnes, as no priuate man could wiſhe to be any greater in a free citie. Howbeit the ſecret malice of wicked harts, which could no longer abide this greatnes and authoritie, began at length to burſt out, and to light vpon thoſe that were the authors of ſo great things. For two Tribunes of the people, ſuborned (as it is reported) by Porcius Cato: they accuſed P. Scipio AFRICAN for keeping backe king Antiochus money, and bicauſe he brought it not into the common chamber or treaſurye. Scipio AFRICAN knowing his innocencie, being called by the Magiſtrate, ſhewed him ſelfe obedient, and came into the market place with a bold countenaunce, and there made an oration, declaring what thinges he had done for the benefit and commoditie of his contry and common wealth. The reherſal
B of theſe thinges did not miſlike the common people that were preſent: bicauſe he did it rather to auoyd the daunger prepared for him, then otherwiſe for any vaine glory or oſtentation. Howbeit the Tribunes not being ſo contented, were vehement againſt him, and ſpared no iniurious words, but accuſed him as though he had in deede bene in fault, howbeit vpon ſuſpition, rather then of any due proofe. The next morning being commaunded to come before them againe, he appeared at the hower appoynted, and being well accompanied with his friends, he came through the whole aſſembly, and went vp to the pulpit for orations. When he ſaw that euery man kept ſilence, then he ſpake in this manner. I remember my Lordes, that on ſuch a day as this, I wanne that famous victory of Annibal and the CARTHAGINIANS, and therefore leauing aſide this contention, I thinke it good we go vnto the Capitol to giue God
C thankes for the victorie. So he departed thence, and all the whole aſſembly followed him, not onely to the Capitoll, but alſo to all the other temples of the citie, leauing the two Tribunes all alone with their Sergeaunts. That daye was the very laſt daye of all the AFRICANS good fortune, for the great aſſembly and multitude of people that wayted vpon him, and for the great good will they bare him. For from that day forward he determined to get him into the contry, farre from all ambition, and the company of people: and ſo went vnto LINTERNVM in a maruelous rage, that for reward of his ſo great ſeruice, and ſo ſundry benefits as he had brought vnto his contry, he receiued but ſhame and reproache: or els, for that in deede being as he was of a noble minde, he thought it more honor willingly to giue place to his enemies, then to ſeeke to mainteyne his greatnes by force of armes. So when the Tribunes did accuſe D him of contempt, and that his brother Lucius did excuſe his abſence by reaſon of his ſickenes: Tiberius Gracchus, one of the Tribunes that was againſt the AFRICAN, tooke his excuſe (beyond all mens opinions) for good payment, and did ſo well defende Scipioes cauſe, ſometime honorably praiſing him, another time alſo threatning his enemies that the Senate afterwards thanked him very greatly for it. For they were maruelouſly offended for the great iniurie they did him. Some doe write, that P. Scipio him ſelfe, before he went vnto LINTERNVM, did with his owne hands teare the booke his brother had brought vnto the Senate, to deliuer the accompt of his charge: and that he did it not for any deceit nor pride, but with that ſelfe boldnes of mind he had aforetime vſed to the treaſurers, when he did againſt the lawe require the keyes of the common treaſure, to ſupply the preſent neede of the ſtate. Howſoeuer there be E alſo that ſaye, it was not the AFRICAN, but Scipio ASIAN that was accuſed before the Tribunes: and that Scipio AFRICAN was ſent in commiſſion at that time into TVSCIA. Who, vnderſtanding of his brothers accuſation at his returne to ROME, and finding his brother Lucius condemned, and the Sergeaunts waiting on him to carry him, being bound, into priſon: he was in ſuche a rage withall, that he reſcued his brother by force out of the Sergeaunts hands, and from the Tribunes of the people. And they report beſide, that Tiberius Gracchus one of the Tribunes, complayning firſt that the authoritie of the Tribuneſhip was troden vnder feete by a priuate perſon: he afterwardes letting fall all the malice and enuy he bare vnto the Scipioes, defended their cauſe, bicauſe the Tribunes ſhould rather ſeeme to be ouercome by a Tribune, then by a priuate perſon. They ſayd moreouer, that the ſelfe ſame daye the Se-F nate ſupped in the Capitoll, he perſwaded the AFRICAN to let Tiberius Gracchus marry his younger Daughter. This promiſe was no ſooner made, but P. Scipio comming home to his houſe, tolde his wife that he had beſtowed their Daughter: Whereuppon ſhe being angry, told him againe, that he should not haue married her without consent of her mother, though he could haue bestowed her vpon Tiberius Gracchus. This aūswer liked Scipio maruelous wel, when he saw that his wife was of his mind, touching the mariage of their Daughter. I knowe it is thought of some, that it was attributed to Tiberius the sonne, and to Appius Claudius his father in lawe. For Polybius, and other auncient writers affirme, that Cornelia, the mother of Caius and Tiberius Gracchi, was maried vnto Gracchus after the AFRICANS death. For Scipio AFRICAN was maried vnto AEmylia the Daughter of L. Paulus AEmylius Consul, that was slayne at the battell of CANNES. By her he had two Daughters, of the which the eldest was maried vnto P. Cornelius Nasica, and the younger vnto Tiberius Gracchus, either before, or after the death of his father. Nowe towching his sonne, there is litle mention made of him in writing, that a man may write of certainty to be true. We haue spoken of his younger sonne that was taken by king Antiochus, and afterwards franckly sent vnto his father: of whome notwithstanding afterwards I find no mention in writing, sauing that some say he was afterwards Prætor, and that he came to this office by meanes of Cicereius his fathers Secretary. There appeareth in writing also, that the younger AFRICAN was adopted by the sonne of P. Scipio. Cicero in his booke intituled Cato Maior sayth, how weake (sayd he) was the sonne of P. AFRICAN that adopted thee his sonne? And in his sixth booke also de repub. AEmylius the father exhorteth Scipio his sonne, to follow iustice and piety, as his grandfather Scipio AFRICAN had done. And touching the death of P. Scipio AFRICAN, writers doe diuersly varye: for some say that he dyed, and was buryed at ROME. And for proofe thereof they doe bringe forth the monument that was set vp for him by the gate Capena, ouer the which stoode three statues or images, two whereof were the images of P. and Lucius Scipio, and the third was of Q. Ennius the Poet. And surely that which Cicero wrote, seemeth to confirme it true: our Ennius, sayd he, was maruelously beloued of AFRICAN the great, and therefore it is thought that he was buryed in Scipioes tombe. Other authors write also (and surely they agree best with the common report) that Scipio AFRICAN dyed at LINTERNVM, and that there he was buried at his owne appoyntment: bicause his contry so vnthankfully acknowledging his seruice, should do him no honor at his death: and that there they set him vp a tombe, and his statue vpon that, the which afterwards was blowen downe by a tempest of wind, and the which Liuie him selfe witnesseth he saw. Furthermore, by CAIETA this Epitaphe was grauen in a plate of copper, set in a marbell tombe.

Now touching the time of his death, hauing made great searche for it, I haue found in certaine Greeke Authors, that the AFRICAN liued foure and fifty yeares, and dyed shortly after. Furthermore, he was a noble Captaine, and worthy of all commendacion for martiall discipline, and besides excelled in all other vertues: the which did so delight his mind, that he was wont to say, he was neuer lesse idle, then when he tooke his ease: nether more solitary, then when he was alone. For some times he would withdraw him selfe out of the assembly, & from all mens company, and thought him self safe when he was alone. The fame of his noble deedes was so great, that whersoeuer he went, all sortes of people would come and see him. The common report went, that when he was at LINTERNVM, there came certaine rouers vnto him to see so famous a man, and to kisse that so faithfull and victorious a hand. For vertue hath great force and power with all sortes of people: bicause it doth not onely make the good but the euil also to loue and honor it.

NOW let vs compare Annibal and Scipioes deedes together, as touching their ciuill discipline. First, if we remember their deedes in warres, it is manifest that both of them haue bene great and famous Captaines in warre, and that they haue not onely bene comparable with the noblest Kinges and Princes in their time (being also in that age when warres florished most) but with those also that were before their time. One thing maketh me wonder much at them, that they hauing great and heauy enemies in their contry, (who fought to ouerthrow all their doings and enterprises) could possibly goe thorough with so great matters, and to obtayne such happie and famous victories in straunge and forreyne warres. Therefore passing ouer all other matters, what a doe had P. Scipio, before he could obtayne to be sent into AFRICA, to make warre with the CARTHAGINIANS? Fabius Maximus, and other noble men of the citie being greatly against it? Againe, what enemy had Annibal of Hanno, who was Prince and head of the contrary faction against him? Now, they both hauing ouercomen such great troubles at home, did notwithstanding bringe thinges to end worthy perpetuall memorie: not by chaunce, as it hapneth vnto many, but through their industrie, great wisedom, and counsell. So, diuers doe wonder greatly at Annibals corage and noble mind: who after he had sacked the citie of SAGUNTUS, came boldly from the furdest part of the world into ITALY, and brought with him a great army of footemen and horsemen, and came to make warre with a great state and common wealth, the which his predecessors alwayes dreaded: and after he had wonne many battells, and slayne sundry Consuls and Captaines of the ROMANES, he came and camped hard by the citie of ROME itselfe, and procured straunge kings and farre nations to make warre with the ROMANES. He that was able to doe so great things as these, men can not otherwise thinke of him, but that he was a great and valiant Captaine. Others also speaking of Scipio, doe greatly praise and commend him for the foure Chieftaines he ouercame, and for the foure great armies which he defeated, and put to flight in SPAYNE, and also for that he ouercame and tooke that great king Syphax prisoner. In fine, they come to praise that famous battell in the which Scipio ouercame Annibal at ZAMA. For if Fabius (sayd they) were praised, because he was not ouercome by Annibal: what estimation will they make of the AFRICAN, that in a pitched battell ouercame that so famous & dreadfull Captaine Annibal, and also did ende so daungerous a warre? Besides also, that Scipio did alwayes make open warre, and commonly fought with the enemy in plaine field. Where Annibal in contrary maner did alwayes vse craft and subtelty, and was full of stratageames & policie. And therefore all Authors, both Greake and Latyne, doe count him very fine and subtell. Furthermore, they greatly commend Annibal for that he mayntayned his army of so sundry nations, so long time in peace, as he had warre with the ROMANES: and yet that there was neuer any mutinie or rebellion in his campe. On the other side they blame him againe, bicause he did not follow his victory, when he had ouercomen the ROMANES at that famous battell of CANNES: and also bicause he spoyled his souldiers with too much ease, and the pleasures of CAMPANIA and APVLIA, whereby they were so chaunged, that they seemed to be other souldiers then those that had ouercomen the ROMANES, at the sundry battells of TREBIA, THRASYMENE, and CANNES. All writers doe reproue these thinges in Annibal, but specially his crueltie. For amongest other thinges, what crueltie was it of him to make a woman with her children to come from ARPI to his campe, and afterwardes to burne them aliue? What shall a man say of them whome he cruelly put to death, in the temple of Iuno Lacinia, when he departed out of ITALY? For Scipio AFRICAN on the other side, if we shall rather credit the best authors that write, then a number of other detracters and malitious writers: we may say he was a bountifull and temperate Captaine, and not onely liuely and valiant in fight, but also curteous and mercifull after victorye. For oftentimes his enemies proued his valiantnes, the vanquished his mercy and clemency, & all other men his faithfulnes. Now therfore, let vs tel you what his continency & liberalitie was, the which he shewed in SPAYNE vnto a young Lady taken prisoner, and vnto Luceius Prince of the CELTIBERIANS: doth it not deserue great prayse? Nowe for their priuate doings, they were both vertuously brought vp, and both of them imbraced learned men. For as it is reported, Annibal was very familiar with Sosilus LACEDÆMONIAN, as the AFRICAN was with Ennius the Poet. Some saye also, that Annibal was so well learned in the Græke tongue, that he wrote an historie in Græke touching the deedes of Manlius Volso. Now truely I doe agree with Cicero, that sayd in his booke de Oratore, that Annibal heard Phormio PERIPATETICIAN in EPHESVS, discoursing very largely of the office and duety of a Chieftaine and generall, and of the martiall lawes & ordinaunces: and that immediatly after being asked what he thought of that Philosopher, he should aunswer in no very perfit Græke, but yet in Græke, that he had seene many old doting fooles, but that he had neuer seene a greater doterd then Phormio. Furthermore, both of them had an excellent grace in their talke, & Annibal had a sharpe tawnting wit in his aunswers. When king Antiochus on a time prepared to make warre with the ROMANES, and had put his army into the field, not so well furnished with armor and weapon, as with gold and siluer: he asked Annibal, if he thought his army sufficient for the ROMANES? yea (Sir) q. he, that they be, were the enemies neuer so couetous. This may truely be sayd of Annibal, that he obtayned many great victories in the warres, but yet they turned to the destruction of his contry. Scipio in contrary manner did preserue his contry in such safetie, and also did so much increase the dominions thereof, that as many as shall looke into his desert, they can not but call ROME vnthankefull, which liked rather that the AFRICAN (preseruer of the citie) should goe out of ROME, then that they would represse the fury and insolency of a few. And for myne owne opinion, I can not thinke well of that citie, that so vnthankfully hath suffred so worthy and innocent a person to be iniured: and so would I also haue thought it more blame worthy, if the citie had bene an ayder of the iniurye offred him. In fine, the Senate (as all men doe report) gaue great thankes vnto Tiberius Gracchus, bicause he did defend the Scipions cause: and the common people also following the AFRICAN, when he visited all the temples of ROME, and left the Tribunes alone that accused him, did thereby shewe how much they did loue and honor the name of the Scipioes. And therefore, if we should iudge the Citizens harts and good wills by those things, men would rather condemne them for cowards, to haue suffered such outrage, then vnthankfull for forgetting of his benefits: for there were very few that consented to so wicked a deede, and all of them in manner were very sory for it. Howbeit Scipio, that was a man of a great minde, not much regarding the malice of his enemies: was content rather to leaue the citie, then by ciuill warres to destroy it. For he would not come against his contry with ensignes displaied, neither would he solicite straunge nations and mighty kings to come with force, and their ayde, to destroy the citie, the which he had beautified with so many spoyles and triumphes: as Martius Coriolanus, Camillus, and diuers others did, by record of auncient stories. For we may easily perceiue how carefull he was to preserue the libertie

All which honors afterwardes were giuen by the Citizens vnto Cæſar, that had ouercomen Pompey. Theſe were the ciuill vertues of the African, which were great and true prayſes of continency. Now therefore, to deliuer you the ſumme and effect of all theſe thinges: theſe two ſo famous Captaines are not ſo much to be compared together in their ciuill vertues (in the which Scipio chiefly excelled) as in the diſcipline of warres, and in the glory of their famous victories. To con-
